In view of the specific facts found, showing that the defendant neither has nor claims any beneficial use whatever of the part of the ditch or its branches situated below his land, the general preliminary statement that he is the owner of the stated interest as tenant in common in the "ditch and its branches, known as the 'Arroyo Ditch,'" cannot be taken according to its full meaning. He may have some sort of a title to that part of the ditch, but if so it is not derived from the prescriptive use by which the right to the ditch and water was originally acquired, and its origin must be ascribed to the inaccurate phraseology of a subsequent judgment between the interested parties, introduced in evidence, whereby the undivided interest of each party in the Arroyo ditch was determined, or perhaps to a misapprehension of the legal effect of that judgment. At all events, the specific facts found and amply supported by the uncontradicted evidence, conclusively show that if the defendant has any title to the ditches and water below his land, it can be nothing more than a barren legal title, without any beneficial use or right whatever, a title which, of itself, would raise no implied promise to pay for improvement made thereto without his consent. It is further asserted that the defendant is liable under the provisions of the act of 1889 relating to tenancies in common in waters. St. 1889, p. 202, c. 168. In substance that act provides that where two or more persons construct a common ditch and use the same for the irrigation of their lands, each shall be liable to the other for the reasonable expense of maintaining and repairing the same in proportion to his share in the use of the water, and that if either neglects, after demand in writing, to pay his proportion of such expenses, he shall be liable therefor in an action by the party who has paid the sum with 2 per cent. interest from the time such demand was made. To this claim what we have heretofore said is a sufficient answer. Conceding, for the purposes of argument only, that the fluming and cementing done could, under the circumstances, be classed as "maintaining and repairing," the plaintiff has no case; for it asks contribution to the cost of work done chiefly on a part of the ditch of which defendant has no beneficial use, and by which he is not benefited, and the evidence furnishes no means of ascertaining separately the cost for which, if any, the defendant might be held liable under that statute.

It is claimed that some of the other findings are conflicting with each other, and that others are contrary to the evidence. We do not think it necessary to discuss these points at length. We have examined the findings and have read the evidence with some care, and we are satisfied that the findings can be easily reconciled with each other and that there is sufficient evidence to support all the material facts in issue.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

In re DEAN'S ESTATE, (Sac. 1,423.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 26, 1906. Rehearing Denied August 23, 1906.)

1. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT—APPEARANCE—NOTICE.

A court should not dismiss an action as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 3, for plaintiff's failure to appear on the trial except on proof of the service of five days' notice of trial required by Code Civ. Proc. § 594.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Dismissal and Nonsuit, §§ 150-152.]

2. Appeal—Prejudice—Presumptions.

Where, on direct appeal from a judgment of dismissal, it affirmatively appears that the dismissal was made without any showing to the court of notice to plaintiffs of the time of trial or waiver of such notice, prejudice would be presumed, and the judgment of dismissal reversed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 4038, 4045, 4046.]

3. Trial—Notice.

Trial of a will contest was fixed for November 14, 1904, at which time a motion for continuance was granted on payment of costs, and an order made continuing the case for trial to February 7, 1905. On January 13, 1905, defendants gave notice of an application to be made on January 23d, for an order for additional security for costs, which order was granted on January 24th, and stayed all proceedings until the undertaking was filed, and directed the filing thereof within 10 days. No order was thereafter made resetting the case for trial, and no notice was given as to the time of trial, which was moved by defendants on February 7th. Held, that the order for additional security for costs vacated the order setting the case for trial on February 7th, so far as to require that the matter be again set for trial, or the giving of a new notice of trial.

4. Costs—Security—Time to File.

Where, after a will contest had been set for trial, contestants were ordered to give additional security for costs, a provision of the order requiring such security to be furnished within 10 days was ineffectual for any purpose, contestants being entitled by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1036, 1037, to 30 days, after the making of the order within which to comply therewith.

5. Trial—Notice.

Where contestants in a will contest were directed to give additional security for costs, and all proceedings including the trial were stayed contestants complied with the order, which they were entitled to do within 30 days, the giving of the undertaking by their coplaintiff before the expiration of such time, and on the day the case had been previously set for trial, did not justify a trial and dismissal of the proceedings on that day for contestant's failure to appear, without a further notice of trial.

6. Appeal—Judgment—Record—Affidavits.

An affidavit of one of defendant's attorneys, used on the hearing of a motion to set aside a judgment of dismissal, constitutes no part of the record on appeal from the judgment, and cannot be considered thereon, though properly authenticated.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 2394-2396, 2408.]

7. Dismissal and Nonsuit — Validity — Subsequent Acts.

Where a will contest was erroneously tried and dismissed in contestant's absence and without proper notice of trial being given contestants, it was immaterial that after submission of the motion to dismiss, and prior to the actual dismissal, the judge asked one of contestant's attorneys whether he had notice of the motion to dismiss, and desired to take any steps thereunder prior to the ruling, and that the attorney replied that he would not do anything in the matter at present.

8. New Trial—Motion—Scope of Remedy.

Where a will contest was dismissed for contestant's failure to appear, and no trial of the issues of fact was ever had, the case was not one for a motion for a new trial.

9. Appeal — Exceptions, Bill of — Affidavits—Incorporation.

In order to make a record of a showing by affidavits sufficient to establish error in the decision of a motion on which affidavits were or could have been used, the affidavits used and the evidence taken on the hearing, must be authenticated by being incorporated in a bill of exceptions.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Contest of the will of Thomas Claiborn Dean, deceased. From an order or judgment of dismissal, and from an order refusing to vacate such order and grant a new trial, contestants prosecute separate appeals. Reversed.

James T. Boyd, A. N. Salisbury, E. D. McCabe, B. F. Fowler, and J. W. Knox, for appellants. F. W. Henderson, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. These are two separate appeals on one transcript; the first taken April 11, 1905, from an order or judgment of dismissal (made February 11, 1905) of certain proceedings instituted for the revocation of the probate of a document purporting to be the last will of deceased, and the second, taken June 6, 1905, from an order refusing to vacate said order or judgment and grant a new trial (made May 29, 1905). The dismissal was granted on motion of the defendants upon the ground that the plaintiffs failed to appear on the trial. The appellants are all of the 23 contestants, except one, Nathan Morrison, who, at the time the matter was called for trial, was represented by separate attorney, appeared at the time set for the trial, and there practically abandoned his contest. Originally there were two groups of contestants, one of 21, including Morrison, represented by one set of attorneys, and the other of two, represented by another set of attorneys. Whether or not the lower court erred in giving judgment of dismissal must be determined solely in the light of the facts shown by such papers in the transcript as may properly be held to constitute a part of the judgment roll and the settled bill of exceptions. Certain affidavits contained in the transcript, purporting to have been subsequently filed and used on the motion to set aside the judgment and grant a new trial, which affidavits are not contained in any bill of exceptions, cannot, of course, be considered in the determination of such question.

Most of the plaintiffs were nonresidents of the state of California. By the bill of exceptions settled for use on appeal from the judgment, the following facts appear: Prior to answers filed, a demand that plaintiffs give security for the costs and charges that might be awarded against them, as provided by section 1036 of the Code of Civil Procedure, was regularly served and filed, and plaintiffs subsequently regularly complied with this demand. Issues of fact having been joined, a demand for a trial by jury was regularly made by defendants, and November 14, 1904, was fixed for the trial of the contests. At the last-named time, a motion of plaintiffs for a continuance on the ground of absence of plaintiffs and witnesses was granted on payment of certain costs, and an order was made continuing the trial to February 7, 1905, at 10 o'clock a. m. On January 13, 1905, defendants gave notice of an application, to be made on January 23, 1905, for an order for an additional undertaking in the sum of $1,500, as security for costs, and for a stay of proceedings until the same should be given. This application having come regularly on for hearing, the court, on January 24, 1905, made an order: First, requiring plaintiffs to file such an additional undertaking in the sum of $300; second, staying all proceedings until such undertaking was filed; and, third, directing that said undertaking be filed within 10 days. The attorneys for plaintiffs notified the court that it would be necessary for them to have 30 days within which to file such undertaking, on account of the absence of their clients from the state, and claimed that they were entitled to such 30 days under the provisions of section 1037 of the Code of Civil Procedure. No order was made on January 24, 1905, or subsequent thereto, relative to the time of trial of said contest, and no notice was ever given to appellants at or subsequent to the proceedings of January 24, 1905, as to the time of trial. On February 6, 1905, one J. J. Griffin was regularly substituted as attorney for plaintiff Nathan Morrison, who had hitherto been represented by the attorneys for the group of 21 contestants, and who appears to have been a resident of California. On February 7, 1905, at 10 a. m., said plaintiff Morrison filed the necessary additional undertaking. This was filed without any notice to any of the other plaintiffs or their attorneys, and none of them knew anything about his intention to file the same or about the filing until after the submission of the motion to dismiss. At 10:10 a. m. on February 7, 1905, the proceeding was called for trial by the court. None of the plaintiffs or their attorneys were present, except Morrison and his attorney. When the matter was called, defendants answered "ready," as did plaintiff Morrison, who further stated that he had no evidence to offer. Defendants, having shown to the court that the additional undertaking had been filed that morning, moved that the proceeding be dismissed for failure on the part of the plaintiffs to appear at the time set for the trial of the cause. No proof whatever was made as to any notice given to appellants as to the filing of the undertaking by Morrison, or as to any intention on the part of defendants to ask for the trial of the contest at that time. The court thereupon ordered the matter submitted, and, subsequently, on February 11, 1905, made its order granting the motion, whereupon the clerk of the court noted said order on his register of actions.

Other facts, such as that the trial of another case was actually in progress before the court on February 7th, at the time this case was called for trial, and that, although a jury had been demanded, no jury had been summoned or was in attendance, and that no witnesses were in attendance, also appear; but these facts would probably be material only on a subsequent motion to relieve from the judgment on the ground of surprise, inadvertence, and excusable neglect. The facts already stated are the only matters shown by the record that are material in determining as to the correctness of the action of the lower court in giving judgment of dismissal. Section 594 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "Either party may bring an issue to trial or to a hearing, and in the absence of the adverse party, unless the court, for good cause otherwise direct, may proceed with his case, and take a dismissal of the action, or a verdict or judgment as the case may require; provided, however, if the issue to be tried is an issue of fact, proof must first be made to the satisfaction of the court that the adverse party has had five days' notice of such trial." A court should not dismiss an action under subdivision 3 of section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for failure of the plaintiff to appear on the trial, except upon proof made in compliance with the above quoted proviso of section 594 of the Code of Civil Procedure, designed to prevent the manifest injustice of dismissing a party's action, or trying it in his absence, because of his failure to appear at a time at which he could not be held to have had notice that the trial would be had, or that any proceeding would be taken against him. When upon direct appeal from the judgment of dismissal, it affirmatively appears that such a dismissal has been had against a party, without any showing having been made to the court of notice had by such party of the time of trial, and waiver of such notice on his part is not shown, it seems clear that the judgment of dismissal is erroneous, and should be reversed. In the absence of a showing to the contrary, such an error must be deemed prejudicial.

We are not here concerned with the question as to what would constitute a sufficient notice, or sufficient proof of such notice, to authorize a court to proceed to a disposition of a cause in the absence of a party. Here there was no notice whatever other than that afforded on November 14, 1904, by the order continuing the trial, on motion of plaintiffs, to February 7, 1905, at 10 o'clock a. m.

If it were not for the subsequent proceedings had in January, 1905, this order, made on motion of plaintiffs, would undoubtedly be held effectual to dispense with further notice of the time therein designated. But we are satisfied that it must be held that the subsequent order of January 24, 1905, made on the motion of defendant, practically vacated the order fixing February 7th for trial, so far as the same could be held to operate as notice to appellants that the trial would then be had, and left the matter either to be again set for trial when the undertaking required was given, or triable at the original date only upon new notice showing that a trial would then be had or insisted on by the defendants, who had procured the stay of the proceedings. Under the provisions of sections 1036 and 1037, plaintiffs had 30 days from the making of the order of January 24, 1905, within which to give the additional undertaking thereby required, and the direction in such order that such undertaking be given within 10 days was ineffectual for any purpose whatever. Under said sections, a failure on the part of plaintiffs to give the additional undertaking within 30 days would warrant the dismissal of the proceedings, and this was the only penalty prescribed by law for a failure to give security. By the order made, in accord with the demand of defendants and in strict accord with the provisions of section 1036 of the Code of Civil Procedure, all proceedings including the trial, were directed to be stayed until plaintiffs should give such additional undertaking. Plaintiffs were thus notified by the express terms of the order of the court, that if compliance with said order for additional security was insisted on by defendants, which, in the absence of notice to the contrary, they had the right to assume would be the case, no trial could be had until they gave the additional undertaking, the giving of which might legally be deferred, and so far as appellants are concerned was deferred, until long after the time originally fixed for trial. Under such circumstances, it appears too clear for question that these appellants cannot be held to have had any notice that the trial would or could be had on February 7, 1905. Not having themselves given the required undertaking, having no notice that their seceding resident coplaintiff intended to pursue the most remarkable course of assuming the burden for them and giving such bond, in order that the stay directed might be avoided and judgment given against them, and having no notice that defendants would waive the benefit of the order they had themselves obtained staying proceedings until given security for costs, they had the right to rely on the order of January 24, 1905; and, so relying, to assume that the trial could not be had at the time originally appointed, and that no proceeding against them would be taken at that time in such matter, without notice. The mere giving of the undertaking by their co-plaintiff Morrison on February 7th was no more effectual in this regard than would have been a waiver at such time by defendants of the benefit of the order requiring additional security. Appellants were entitled to notice of any change in existing conditions which would render a trial of the issues possible. In view of the order of January 24, 1905, the trial court, before dismissing the proceedings for failure of appellants to appear, should have required proof that appellants had notice that the additional security would be waived and a trial insisted on by defendants at the time originally set, or notice that their coplaintiff had given such an undertaking as would make a trial possible under the terms of that order. The record on appeal from the judgment of dismissal shows that no such proof was made to the court, and also fails to show that appellants had any such notice in fact.

We are not unmindful of the fact that in an affidavit of one of defendants' attorneys, said to have been used on the hearing of the motion to set aside the judgment of dismissal, it is stated that appellants did have notice that defendants would, if such undertaking were not filed by February 7th, at 10 o'clock a. m., waive the additional security, and insist upon a trial, but this affidavit, as already stated, constitutes no part of the record on appeal from the judgment, and it cannot be considered thereon, even if it were properly authenticated. The statement in the bill of exceptions to the effect that within a day or two after the submission of the motion to dismiss, and prior to the actual dismissal, the judge of the trial court asked one of the attorneys for one group of contestants whether he had notice of the motion to dismiss, and whether he desired to take any steps therein prior to the ruling of the court thereon, and that the attorney replied that contestants would not at the present time do anything in the matter, but would simply let it stand as it was, is entirely immaterial. Whether or not the dismissal should be granted depended upon the facts existing and the showing made at the time of the making and submission of the motion, and plaintiffs were not required by this subsequent notice from the judge to take any proceedings in order to save their legal rights. If the motion made and submitted without notice, and in their absence, was erroneously decided, they could then take such proceedings as the law afforded them for a review of such decision. The statement of the attorney to the judge was nothing more, in effect, than a statement that appellants would stand on their legal rights.

In view of our conclusion that the judgment of dismissal must be reversed, it is unnecessary to consider the appeal from the subsequent order refusing to vacate the judgment and grant a new trial. Of course, in view of the fact that no trial at all had been had of the issues of fact, and the proceeding had been dismissed without any trial for failure of appellants to appear, the case was not one for a motion for a new trial, and so far as the motion made was one for a new trial, it was undoubtedly properly denied. It is possible, however, that the motion made be properly considered as having been partially for relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, on the ground of excusable neglect, surprise, etc. Whether it could be so considered, and whether the showing made on the hearing of the motion was such as to require the lower court to grant the relief sought, are, as already said, immaterial, in view of our conclusion upon the appeal from the judgment. In respect to that showing, it is, however, proper to note that affidavits printed in the transcript and claimed to have been used on the hearing, are not incorporated in any bill of exceptions, and some of them are not even indorsed by the judge as having been used on the hearing. It has several times been pointed out by this court that, in order to make a record of a showing by affidavits sufficient to establish error on the part of the lower court in the decision of a motion upon which affidavits were or could have been used, in the face of the presumption of correctness and regularity which attaches as to the action of lower courts upon such motions, the affidavits used and evidence taken on the hearing below must be authenticated by being incorporated in a bill of exceptions. The indorsement of the judge on certain affidavits, to the effect that the same were used on the hearing is not sufficient, for it does not show or raise any presumption that such affidavits constituted all the affidavits used and evidence taken, and the presumption in favor of the order is that other affidavits and evidence were received on the hearing, sufficient to support the order made. The only way by which this presumption can be overcome is by a bill of exceptions purporting to show all the material evidence received, whether by affidavit or otherwise. Rule 29 of this court (78 Pac. xii), in terms, requires that "in all cases of appeal to this court from the orders of the superior courts, the papers and evidence used on the hearing of the motion must be authenticated by including the same in a bill of exceptions, except where another mode of authentication is provided by law." There is no other mode provided by law for the authentication of affidavits used on the hearing of such a motion, as was here made. See Skinner v. Horn 144 Cal. 278, 77 Pac. 904; Cahill v. Baird, 138 Cal. 691, 72 Pac. 342; Melde v. Reynolds, 120 Cal. 234, 52 Pac. 491; Ramsbottom v. Fitzgerald, 128 Cal. 75, 60 Pac. 522. It devolved upon plaintiffs appealing from the order denying their motion, to have settled a bill of exceptions showing the evidence taken upon the hearing of such motion.

The judgment or order of dismissal appealed from is reversed.

In re DAVIS' ESTATE. (Sac. 1,475.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 26, 1906.)

1. ADMINISTRATORS—APPOINTMENT—CONCURRING JURISDICTION—ATTACHMENT.

Where a nonresident died, leaving property in two or more counties, the public administrator of the county first filing a petition in the superior court for administration of the estate is entitled to appointment, precluding a court of another county from taking jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 22, Cent. Dig. Executors and Administrators, §§ 24, 132–140, 177.]

2. SAME—APPOINTMENT—RIGHT TO CONTEST.

Where the superior court of a county appointing a public administrator as administrator of the estate of a nonresident had no power to appoint him because proceedings had been previously instituted for the appointment of another in another county, the administrator so illegally appointed was not a party in interest entitled to oppose the appointment of an administrator in the county in which jurisdiction had attached.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 22, Cent. Dig. Executors and Administrators, § 95.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Contest between the public administrator of Tulare county and the public administrator of Fresno county to determine which of the two was entitled to administer on the estate of Jane Davis, a nonresident deceased person. From a judgment in favor of the public administrator of Tulare county, the administrator of Fresno county appeals. Affirmed.

Everts & Ewing, M. F. McCormick, Truman & Oliver, and Bishop, Wheeler & Hoefler, for appellant. Carter P. Pomeroy, Hannah & Miller, Herman O. Miller, and Frank H. Short, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. As stated by the appellant in his brief, "this action is a contest, simply, between the public administrator of Tulare county and the public administrator of Fresno county as to which one has the better right, under the existing circumstances, to administer the estate." The decedent was a resident of the state of New York, and left estate in various counties of this state. The appellant, Chittenden, the public administrator of Fresno county, appeals from an order of the superior court of Tulare county appointing the respondent, Dungan, the public administrator of Tulare county, administrator of the estate. The appellant had theretofore been appointed as administrator of the same estate by the superior court of Fresno county, although his petition for appointment was filed several days later than Dungan's petition in Tulare county. The appellant's main contention is that the superior court of Fresno county, having first heard and passed upon an application for letters of administration, had sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the estate, and that the superior court of Tulare county was without jurisdiction to make the order appealed from. The facts concerning the proceedings in the two courts appear more fully in the opinion of this court in Dungan v. Superior Court (Cal.) 84 Pac. 767, which was a controversy between the same parties, and raised the same point here involved. It was there held that "jurisdiction in such matters attaches upon the filing of the first petition, to the superior court in which the petition is filed, and continues during the pendency of the proceeding thus instituted, and that this jurisdiction is exclusive, precluding any other court from effectually acting in the matter." That ruling is conclusive against the appellant's argument as to jurisdiction.

If, then, the superior court of Fresno county had no power to appoint an administrator, pending the proceedings in Tulare, the appellant had no interest in opposing the appointment of another in Tulare county. He was not himself an applicant for letters in the latter county, but was merely opposing any action by the court. In view of the determination that the Tulare county court had the power to appoint, the appellant, who did not himself seek appointment, is not affected by the grant of letters to any one else. He was not a "person interested," and had no standing to oppose Dungan's appointment. Code Civ. Proc. § 1374. It is, therefore, unnecessary to consider the point urged that the court below was without power to appoint an administrator except upon probate of the will said to have been left by the decedent.

The order is affirmed.

OLDHAM v. RAMSNER et al. (Sac. 1,412.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 13, 1906.)

1. Quieting Title—Evidence—Admissibility.

In a suit to quiet title to certain numbered lots in M.'s addition to the city of S., lying without the city, a tax deed to lots so numbered in M.'s addition "* * * lying within the city," and showing the assessment to have been against such numbered lots in M.'s addition "lying within the city," was inadmissible, there being nothing on the face of the description tending to show any error in description, and the courts not being able to take judicial notice that there was no M.'s addition within the city.

2. Trial—Evidence—Offer of Proof—Purpose of Admission.

Where, in a suit to quiet title, defendant offered a tax deed, which, on its face, did not embrace the land in controversy, its exclusion was not error on the ground that it should have been admitted for the purpose of allowing him to show other facts to make certain the description, or by way of estoppel, where, in offering the deed, he did not state any such intention or offer any such additional evidence.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Frank H. Smith, Judge.

Suit by Florence B. Oldham against John L. Ramsner and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant Alonzo Hewlett appeals. Affirmed.

Joshua B. Webster and Charles H. Fairall, for appellant. Buck, Miller & Clark and Miller & Clark, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. Plaintiff instituted this action to quiet her title to certain land, and obtained judgment, and defendant Hewlett appeals from such judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The land involved in this action is all of the land situated in San Joaquin county, state of California, particularly described as follows, to wit: All of lots numbered 9 and 10 in block C in McCloud's addition to the city of Stockton, according to the official map or plat of said McCloud's addition to the city of Stockton, on file in the office of the county recorder of the county of San Joaquin, state of California. It was admitted that this property was a part of the school district containing the city of Stockton, and was assessed by said city for school purposes for the year 1900, but that it was wholly outside of the corporate limits of said city of Stockton. Upon the trial, plaintiff showed ownership of this property in one Mary E. Baright, and then introduced in evidence a deed of conveyance thereof from said Mary E. Baright to her, executed and recorded prior to the commencement of the action. Appellant's sole claim was that he acquired the title of said Mary E. Baright to said property, under a tax sale thereof made by the city of Stockton based upon an assessment for school purposes for the year 1900. For the purpose of showing this he offered in evidence a tax deed from the tax collector of the city of Stockton to one John L. Ramsner, proposing to follow this with a deed from Ramsner to himself. The plaintiff's objection to the introduction of this deed was sustained, and the only question presented by this appeal is as to the correctness of this ruling.

Several points are made by plaintiff in support of this ruling, but it will be necessary to consider only one. According to the deed, the land sold by the tax collector at the tax sale and conveyed by said deed was described as follows, viz.: "Lying and being within the said city of Stockton, county of San Joaquin, state of California, described as follows, to wit: Lots nine (9) and ten (10), block C in McCloud's addition." Upon the face of the deed, it further appeared that the assessment upon which the deed is based was of land lying "within the city of Stockton," and that the only other description thereof in the assessment was: "Lots nine (9) and ten (10) block C in McCloud's addition." It is claimed by plaintiff, that this deed did not purport to convey the land described in the complaint and involved in this action, and we are of the opinion that this claim must be held good. It appears very clear that the deed did not, upon its face, refer to or purport to convey any of the land in controversy. That land lay wholly without the city of Stockton, while the deed was plain to the effect that the land assessed, sold and thereby conveyed was within said city. The remainder of the description is not such as to warrant the rejection of the words "lying and being within the said city of Stockton" as a superfluous recital, or the substitution of the word "without" for the word "within." There is absolutely nothing on the face of the description given in the deed from which it can be concluded that there is any error in such description, or that the same does not correctly describe property in the city of Stockton. It is entirely within the possibilities that there may be a "McCloud's addition to the city of Stockton" without the city, and a "McCloud's addition" within the city, and we cannot take judicial notice that this is not the case. Under the plain and explicit words of the deed, the only land assessed by the assessor, sold by the tax collector, and conveyed by the deed. was certain land lying within the city, and we are not at liberty, in plain disregard of these words, to construe the description as including only lands lying outside the city. To so do would be to include in the deed land not now affected thereby. It is, of course, not disputed that no right can be asserted under a tax deed, except as to such property as is described therein.

It is claimed that, admitting the description to have been insufficient, the deed should still have been admitted, for the purpose of allowing appellant to show other facts "to make certain the description of the land, or by way of estoppel," such as that the property in controversy was commonly known in the community in the way it was described in the deed; that there was only one McCloud's addition in the county; that the owner made the return to the assessor and is estopped; and that taxes of former years had been levied by the same description, and had been paid. In regard to this claim, it is sufficient to say that, if it be assumed that any such evidence would have been admissible, appellant did not offer the same, or even state to the court, in connection with his offer of the deed, his intention to so do, though one of the specific objections made to the deed was that it did not purport to convey any of the property described in the complaint, but only property within the city of Stockton. Appellant simply offered a deed which, upon its face, did not refer to any of the land in controversy, and which, therefore, was not admissible, in the absence of other evidence showing its relevancy to the issues. In view of what we have said, the trial court did not err in excluding from evidence the deed from the tax collector to Ramsner. There was, of course, no error in refusing to admit the deed from Ramsner to plaintiff, for the deed from the tax collector being refused admission, there was nothing to show any title in Ramsner.

ESTUDILLO et al. v. SECURITY LOAN & TRUST CO. OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA et al. (L. A. 1,434.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 16, 1906.)

1. PLEADING — DEMURRER — AMENDMENT — ORDER.

Where a demurrer was amended, it superseded the original demurrer, so that an order subsequently entered providing that the demurrer be sustained and time given to amend the complaint related to the demurrer as amended.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, §§ 816–818.]

2. EVIDENCE—JUDICIAL NOTICE—FORMER ADJUDICATION.

On appeal from an order sustaining a demurrer to a complaint in a suit in equity to set aside a judgment, judicial notice could not be taken of the record on an appeal from an order denying a motion to set aside such judgment between the same parties.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, §§ 62–65.]

3. JUDGMENT — VACATION — FRAUD — REMEDIES —EQUITY SUIT—MOTION.

Where a foreclosure decree was taken against plaintiffs for an excessive amount, by means of a fraudulent and collusive agreement between plaintiffs' attorney and the attorney for the holder of the mortgage, plaintiffs were entitled to maintain a separate suit in equity to vacate such judgment, though they had notice of its entry and of fraud in its procurement in time to have moved to set the same aside on affidavits, as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 30, Cent. Dig. Judgment, §§ 768–771.]

4. SAME—RES JUDICATA.

Where the plaintiffs moved to set aside a judgment against them on the ground of want of authority in their attorneys to stipulate for judgment, the overruling of such motion was no bar to a subsequent suit in equity to vacate the judgment as entered under a fraudulent and collusive agreement between plaintiffs' attorney and the attorneys for the holders of the mortgage.

5. SAME—LACHES.

The period of limitation for actions for relief on the ground of fraud being three years from the discovery of the fraud, a suit to vacate a judgment for fraud brought less than two years after its commission was not barred by laches.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 30, Cent. Dig. Judgment, §§ 863–866.]

6. SAME—CONDITIONS—ABILITY TO REFUND.

The ability of certain mortgagors to pay the amount found due on an accounting was not a condition to their right to maintain a suit to vacate a foreclosure decree collusively and fraudulently entered for an amount largely in excess of that due.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 30, Cent. Dig. Judgment, § 853.]

McFarland, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Suit by Francisco Estudillo and another against the Security Loan & Trust Company of Southern California and another. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

J. F. Conroy, for appellants. R. H. F. Variel and John G. North, for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. The plaintiffs, who are husband and wife, mortgaged certain lands to secure an indebtedness to the defendant loan and trust company, a corporation. Under a judgment of foreclosure, entered upon their default, the mortgaged premises were sold to the corporation by its codefendant, Keefe, acting as special commissioner under the decree. The object of the present action is to obtain a decree vacating the foreclosure sale, canceling the certificates and deeds executed and recorded in pursuance of the sale, requiring the corporation to account for moneys received by it from the plaintiffs and from others to their use, which should have been credited upon the mortgage indebtedness, and for general relief. The grounds upon which this relief is claimed are, first, that the foreclosure decree was fraudulently obtained for an excessive amount; and, second, that the sale of the mortgaged premises was unfairly and illegally conducted by the commissioner acting in collusion with the mortgagee, for the purpose, and with the effect, of discouraging competition of bidders, and thereby enabling the mortgagee to become the purchaser at a price much below the actual value of the lands. The complaint was filed in December, 1900. The defendants first filed a general demurrer for want of facts. Afterwards, but before any action upon that demurrer, they filed, as of course, an amended demurrer, specifying more particularly their objections to the complaint for want of facts, and adding the special objection that several separate and distinct causes of action had been united and combined in the complaint without a separate statement. An order was subsequently entered in the cause in these terms: "It is ordered that the demurrer be sustained and ten (10) days given to amend the complaint." Plaintiffs declined to amend, and judgment was entered dismissing the action. From the judgment so entered plaintiffs appeal.

The first point urged in support of the appeal is that the judgment was erroneously entered because it appears that the only demurrer in the case has never been disposed of. The appellants contend that the amended demurrer superseded the original, and that the order of the superior court is by its terms confined to the original, leaving the amended demurrer still standing as an obstacle to any final judgment. It is true the amended demurrer did supersede the original, and thereby completely disposed of it. The order of the court subsequently entered therefore had nothing to operate upon except the amended demurrer, and is to be construed as sustaining it. This is doing no violence to the terms of the order. A demurrer is none the less a demurrer because it has been amended, and the last amended demurrer in a case, being the only demurrer, is properly designated as "the demurrer." The entry of the judgment cannot be held to have been even irregular, so far as this objection is concerned.

The more serious objections to the judgment remain to be considered, and among these the first in order and importance is the claim that the allegations of the complaint, if true, were sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs to a decree vacating the foreclosure judgment upon the ground that it was procured by fraud. Assuming the truth of what is alleged, there can be no doubt that the decree of foreclosure was procured by a fraud practiced upon the court of a character entitling the plaintiffs to the relief which they are seeking in this action, and the only question is whether their complaint does not also show that they are debarred from any relief in equity by the fact that they had a complete remedy by motion in the foreclosure suit—a proceeding which they took and in which they litigated unsuccessfully the same matters which they are endeavoring to relitigate here. The facts alleged are that plaintiffs borrowed of the loan and trust company $12,675 in May, 1892, giving their note for that principal sum, and also separate interest notes, payable semiannually for a period of three years. To secure the notes they mortgaged a tract of land containing 950 acres, which had been surveyed and platted into lots and blocks as an addition to the town of San Jacinto, in Riverside county. They received in cash only $1,874.44; the balance of the loan being retained by the loan and trust company to satisfy alleged prior liens upon the land. They have never had any account of the application of the moneys so retained, and charge that they were more than sufficient to satisfy the liens. Between the date of the loan and the 25th of October, 1898, plaintiffs paid all the interest notes, and, besides, there had been paid by them and by others for their account various sums, amounting in the aggregate to $9,600, which the corporation has appropriated, and for which it has failed to account. The suit to foreclose was commenced October 22, 1898, and as shown by the default judgment subsequently entered the corporation alleged an indebtedness of nearly $16,000, with interest from May 1, 1898. The sum so claimed was, on any calculation, more than could have been due at that date, after deducting the payments alleged to have been made. These plaintiffs retained an attorney to defend the suit to foreclose, and communicated to him the facts constituting their defense. He interposed a demurrer to the complaint, which was subsequently overruled by his consent; time being allowed to answer. A week before the time to answer expired he signed and filed in the action the following stipulation: "The defendant Francisco Estudillo, and Felicitas Estudillo, his wife, named in said action, having appeared therein by their attorney, Wilford M. Peck, and demurred to the plaintiff's complaint, and said demurrer having been overruled by the above-entitled court on the 8th day of February, 1899, by an order duly entered in the minutes of said court: Now, therefore, it is stipulated and agreed by and between the plaintiff represented by its undersigned attorney, duly authorized thereto, and the said defendants Francisco Estudillo and Felicitas Estudillo, his wife, by their said attorney duly authorized thereto, that said defendants waive the service of notice of overruling of said demurrer, and further waive the right to and refuse to further appear or answer in said action, and that the plaintiff shall be entitled to take judgment in accordance with the prayer of its complaint, or as may otherwise be ordered by the court on the hearing of said cause. Dated February 21, 1899. R. H. F. Variel, Attorney for Plaintiff. Wilford M. Peck, Attorney for said Defendants." On the same day the cause was heard and judgment of foreclosure entered. The mortgage indebtedness according to the complaint and judgment amounted at that date to $18,464.98, to satisfy which and costs the lands were ordered sold. There was besides a personal judgment entered against these plaintiffs for $1,000 attorney's fee. According to the allegations of the complaint in this action, a much smaller sum remained unpaid on the mortgage debt than was found due by said judgment, and the mortgagee must be deemed to have known that it was taking judgment for an excessive amount upon the stipulation of an attorney who was sacrificing the interest of his clients in abandoning their valid defense to a large portion of the claim asserted against them. It is charged, and by the demurrer admitted, that the mortgagee knew prior to the date of the stipulation that said attorney had been instructed to file an answer for these plaintiffs, and that he had no authority to stipulate for a judgment by default. That the stipulation was collusive and fraudulent in fact and in intent is repeatedly charged, and is by the demurrer admitted. These facts so admitted constitute a fraud extrinsic and collateral to the issues in the cause which entitles the plaintiffs to relief in this action unless it shall be held that their sole remedy was by motion in the foreclosure suit to vacate the judgment on the ground of surprise and excusable neglect. Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

The facts relevant to this question are that plaintiffs first learned of the stipulation and subsequent proceedings on the 14th of April, 1899, and immediately discharged their said attorney, and on the 19th of the same month filed a motion to set aside their default and vacate the judgment. This motion was overruled by the superior court June 14th. An appeal from that order was taken to this court, and was still pending when the present action was commenced in December, 1900. The grounds upon which that motion was based are not stated in the complaint, but counsel in their briefs make frequent reference to the report of our decision on the appeal from the order (Security Loan & Trust Company v. Estudillo, 134 Cal. 166, 66 Pac. 257), from which it appears that the whole question mooted was that of the authority of the attorney to make the stipulation. It does not appear from that decision that any question of fraud on the part of the loan and trust company was litigated or involved in that proceeding unless it was necessarily involved in the question as to the authority of the attorney to stipulate. But we are clearly of the opinion that in this case we cannot take notice of the record on that appeal. We are here confined to the facts alleged in this complaint, which merely shows that the motion to vacate was made and overruled, and that an appeal from the order was pending when this action was commenced. It is alleged that the frauds and fraudulent conduct of the defendant corporation were discovered about the 10th of October, 1899, which was more than six months after the entry of the judgment. These alleged frauds consisted, in addition to what is above stated, in inducing the attorney to execute and deliver the stipulation for judgment, and to conceal his unauthorized proceedings in the action, in ignoring the proper description of the lands in the foreclosure judgment, and causing them to be described in the decree and order of sale as nine parcels or tracts, which could not be identified by reference to the recorded map of the premises, in naming the defendant Keefe as commissioner to make the sale, when he was clerk in the office of the corporation's attorney, and in causing him to do and to omit to do various things in connection with the sale in disregard of the rights of these plaintiffs, all with the intent and purpose of enabling the corporation to deprive plaintiffs of their lands.

If the right of plaintiffs to maintain this action depends upon their discovery of the frauds here alleged too late to make them the ground, or one of the grounds, of their motion to vacate the default judgment in the foreclosure suit, it must be held that their complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. They allege it is true that the frauds of the corporation defendant were discovered about the 10th of October, 1899, but they also allege that they had notice of the judgment and the stipulation upon which it was entered in April, 1899. Necessarily they also knew before that date of their instructions to their attorney to make their defense in the action and of his betrayal of their cause. They knew that the judgment was for an excessive amount and that the corporation must have been aware of the fact when its complaint was filed. They knew how the land was described in the decree, and the manner in which it had been arbitrarily subdivided for the purposes of the sale. They knew that Keefe had been appointed commissioner to make the sale, and what his connection with the corporation's attorney and with the litigation was. In short, they knew all the facts which they now allege for the purpose of showing the fraud, except the fact that the corporation induced their attorney to enter into the stipulation, and to conceal his proceedings. That their attorney was induced by the corporation to consent to the default judgment was a fact necessarily to be inferred from the facts which they knew, and since they discovered his proceedings in time to make their motion, his attempted concealment, whether collusive or not, is a circumstance entirely immaterial here.

We must therefore treat this complaint as showing, not that the alleged frauds were first discovered in October, 1899, but as showing that they were known to plaintiffs at the time they gave notice of their motion to vacate the default judgment. So regarding it, the question presented for decision is whether a party against whom a judgment excessive in amount has been entered upon a fraudulent and collusive agreement between his attorney and the opposing party can maintain a separate suit in equity to vacate such judgment, or enjoin its enforcement when it appears that he had notice of its entry and the fraud in its procurement in ample time to have moved for relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Upon this question there seems to be a conflict of authority in other jurisdictions, and we have not been referred to any decision of this court in a case clearly calling for a determination of the precise point. The general principle that equity will not interfere to vacate or enjoin the execution of a judgment at law when the party aggrieved has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by motion to vacate the judgment or quash the execution, or by an appeal, is recognized and applied in many cases, but the question whether a summary motion to be supported by affidavits is an adequate remedy, and therefore exclusive, in a case such as this, has not been directly involved or decided in any of the cases that have come to this court, with the possible exception of California Beet Sugar Co. v. Porter, 68 Cal. 370, 9 Pac. 313. That was a case very much like this, in which the superior court sustained a demurrer to the complaint, and where, on the appeal, respondent contended that the action was not maintainable because the plaintiff had a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by motion. In response to this objection the court said: "It has been held in Bibend v. Kreutz, 20 Cal. 109, Ketchum v. Crippen, 37 Cal. 223, and Ede v. Hazen, 61 Cal. 360, that so long as the statutory remedy by motion to set aside a judgment exists, the assistance of a court of equity cannot be invoked. But none of those cases involved the question of judgment fraudulently taken against an injured party and executed by a sale of his property." Further on the opinion says: "It is a general rule that if relief be obtainable against mistakes or errors of law or fact committed in a judicial proceeding the statutory remedies for relief must be resorted to in the proceeding itself. But, as the Supreme Court of the United States says in U. S. v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 65, 66, 25 L. Ed. 93, 'there is an admitted exception to this general rule in cases where, by reason of something done by the successful party to the suit, there was in fact no adversary trial or decision of the issue in the case. Where the unsuccessful party has been prevented from exhibiting fully his case by fraud or deception practiced on him by his opponent, as by keeping him away from court, a false promise of a compromise, or where the defendant never had knowledge of the suit, being kept in ignorance by the acts of the plaintiff, or where an attorney fraudulently or without authority assumes to represent a party and connives at his defeat, or where the attorney regularly employed corruptly sells out his client's interest to the other side, these and similar cases which show that there has never been a real contest in the trial or hearing of the case, are reasons for which a suit may be sustained to set aside and annul the former judgment or decree and open the case for a new and a fair hearing.'" From all this it would seem that the judgment of reversal in that case was intended to be rested upon a distinction as to the remedy between cases of judgments obtained by fraud of the plaintiff, and judgments suffered by reason of surprise or excusable neglect on the part of the defendant. It is not, however, entirely clear from the report that the question was necessarily involved, though it may have been. But, even if what was said in that case should be regarded as obiter, it is still entitled to respect, and in the absence of direct authority upon the question ought to be followed if no good reason appears for laying down a different rule; and no such reason is suggested. On the contrary, it appears to me to be a salutary rule. The burden of proof rests upon no one more heavily than upon a plaintiff seeking relief upon the ground of fraud, and he ought not to be unduly hampered as to the means of making proof. In support of a motion he is limited to ex parte affidavits of voluntary witnesses unless the court in its discretion permits a wider latitude. In a separate suit he may bring unwilling witnesses into court by subpœna, and he may take their depositions. The remedy is ampler and more efficacious, and the case is one which demands the amplest and most efficacious remedy. My conclusion is that the plaintiffs had the right to maintain this suit, notwithstanding they knew of the frauds alleged in ample time to have moved upon that ground.

But it is objected that they did move, and that their right to have the judgment vacated is res judicata. It does not, however, appear from this complaint that they moved upon the ground of the fraud here alleged, and the report of our decision on the appeal from the order denying the motion shows that it was made upon the ground of want of authority in their attorney to stipulate. The allegations of this complaint do not show that the order denying the motion to vacate is a bar to this action. In Black on Judgments it is said (section 321): "In an action to set aside a judgment on the ground of fraud, neither the judgment thus sought to be vacated nor an order refusing to set aside a default and permit an answer in that case can be set up as a bar to the action." From which it would seem to follow that in such a case as this the correct practice would be to move promptly under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, if defeated in that proceeding, to commence a separate action for relief upon the ground of the plaintiff's fraud—a practice to be commended as convenient and expeditious in case the motion should be granted, and as affording the injured party all the advantage of a regular trial of the issue of fraud if the more summary proceeding proved ineffectual. This is the course which plaintiffs have taken, and, if the practice is admissible, they cannot be charged with lack of diligence. They moved promptly for relief in the foreclosure suit, and before that motion was finally decided they commenced this action.

There has been no laches. The period of limitation for actions for relief on the ground of fraud is three years from the discovery of the fraud. This action was commenced less than two years after its commission. The cases cited by respondent in which the complaint has been held bad for failure to show how and when the fraud was discovered, and why it was not sooner discovered, were all cases in which the action was commenced more than the full period of limitation after the commission of the fraud. In such cases the doctrine of laches applies, but in a case like this the right to maintain the action is governed by the statute of limitations. Nor does the right to maintain the action depend upon the readiness and ability of the plaintiffs to pay the amount that may be found due on an accounting. They are entitled to a correct determination of the amount of their indebtedness and to have the mortgaged premises sold only under a proper decree. What has been said in the cases of rescission cited by the respondent as to the necessity of averring readiness and ability to restore what has been received under the contract has no application to such cases as this.

It follows from what has been said that the judgment of the superior court must be reversed, but in view of the further proceedings involved in this conclusion it is proper to add that if, upon a trial of the issues, it shall be found that the attorney who represented these plaintiffs in the foreclosure suit had authority from them and acted in good faith in stipulating for judgment according to the prayer of the complaint, and that no fraud was practiced by the defendant corporation in procuring the entry of the decree, the plaintiff will have no right to demand that the sale and other subsequent proceedings be vacated; for, if the decree was not in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, the defendants therein had a remedy by appeal, and that remedy was exclusive, and if it was in accordance with the prayer of the complaint they cannot now object to a sale made in the mode authorized by their formal consent. In other words, our conclusion is that, if there was in fact no fraud in the procurement of the judgment, the plaintiffs have no right of action.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the superior court to overrule the demurrer with leave to the defendants to answer.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

McFARLAND, J. (dissenting). I dissent, and adhere to the opinion delivered in department affirming the judgment. I think that the case clearly comes within the rule that equity cannot be invoked where there is a remedy at law. Appellants had an ample remedy for their alleged grievance by motion under section 473, Code Civ. Proc. They availed themselves of that remedy and were defeated; and they are now seeking to try all over again the matter there litigated. If their statements are true, they were the victims of the "surprise" which is made one of the grounds for relief in section 473; and it makes no difference that the surprise was the result of alleged fraud. Moreover, if the decision on the motion were no bar to the present action because of fraud involved, then in my opinion there is no sufficient averment in the complaint of facts constituting fraud. The mere averment that plaintiffs "procured" defendant's attorney to make the stipulation, etc., is insufficient.

The procurement may have been by proper and justifiable means.

Note.—The following is the opinion in department referred to in the dissenting opinion:

McFARLAND, J. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and, plaintiffs not offering to amend within the time allowed, judgment was entered for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment.

In appellants' points and authorities it is merely asserted that the complaint does state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and in support of the assertion a general reference is made to 11 paragraphs of the complaint, which are designated by numbers. There is nothing more in the points that can be designated as argument, and no authorities are cited except section 694, Code Civ. Proc. The complaint, with exhibits attached, occupies 70 pages of the transcript. The gist of the complaint, when seen through the mass of the matter set forth, seems to be this: That in May, 1892, appellants executed to the defendant, the Security Loan & Trust Company, a mortgage on certain described lots of land to secure certain promissory notes made by appellants to said company; that on October 22, 1898, said company commenced an action to foreclose said mortgage, and that appellants employed an attorney, W. D. Peck, to defend the action; that the attorney filed a demurrer to the complaint, which was afterwards, by his consent, overruled; that on February 21, 1899, the said attorney made and filed a stipulation on the part of the appellants that appellants would make no further defense to the action; that their default be entered, and that judgment might be rendered for plaintiff in said action as prayed for in his complaint; that on said 21st day of February, 1899, a judgment of foreclosure was rendered and entered; that the defendant herein, Thomas F. Keefe, was appointed a commissioner to sell the mortgaged premises; that on the 22d day of January, 1899, said Keefe did sell said premises to the respondent herein, the said Security Company, and gave it certificates of sale, and on January 22, 1900, executed to respondent deeds for the land so sold. The main purpose of the action is to have the said judgment of foreclosure set aside, and the said sale of the mortgaged premises vacated.

It is averred that appellants' attorney in the foreclosure case was not authorized to make the stipulation above noticed, and that he did so by the procurement of the plaintiff in said action, etc. But it is also averred that within the time allowed by section 473, Code Civ. Proc., appellants moved the court in which the foreclosure judgment had been entered to set aside the default and vacate that judgment, that the court made an order denying said motion, and that appellants had appealed from that order. It appears from the records of this court that the appeal from the said order was afterwards heard and the order affirmed, although that fact is not important here, and perhaps cannot be considered. Security L. & T. Co. v. Estudillo, 134 Cal. 166, 66 Pac. 257. At all events, the appellants by said motion to vacate the judgment had an ample remedy at law for their alleged grievance; and equity will not interfere where the remedy by law is ample.

It is averred that the commissioner sold the mortgaged premises in nine different parcels, whereas it should have been sold in different and more numerous parcels as demanded by appellants by written notice served on the commissioner, and that therefore the said sale was void. But, in the first place, there is no averment of facts showing that appellants were injured by the manner of sale; and, in the second place, it was decreed in the judgment that the sale should be made in nine named parcels, and the commissioner in making the sale followed the judgment, and, such being the case, the only remedy for the alleged grievance was an appeal from the judgment. In Ontario Land, etc., Co. v. Bedford, 90 Cal. 181, 27 Pac. 39, and Marston v. White, 91 Cal. 327, 27 Pac. 588, it is said that the provision of section 694, Code Civ. Proc.—that upon the sale under execution of land consisting of several well-known lots or parcels the parcels must be separately sold, and according to the direction of the judgment debtor if he be present at the sale—applies to a sale under a judgment of foreclosure only when the judgment is silent as to the method of sale; and while what is said in those cases may not be a direct adjudication on the subject still the rule must undoubtedly be as there stated. That part of the judgment in the foreclosure suit which directs how the mortgaged premises shall be sold is certainly not void; and, if it was erroneous, the only remedy was by appeal from the judgment.

The foregoing are the main points in the case, and we see nothing else necessary to be specially noticed. The complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action and the demurrer was properly sustained.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

FORSYTHE v. LOS ANGELES RY. CO. et al. (L. A. 1,733.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 17, 1906. Rehearing Denied Sept. 13, 1906.)

1. CARRIERS—INJURY TO PASSENGERS—NEGLIGENCE.

Where a passenger on a street car, free from contributory negligence, was injured in a collision between the car and a wagon of a third person, the negligence of the third person was no defense where the street railway company's negligence, in whole or in part, caused the injury, it owing to the passenger the highest care.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1211.]

2. Same.

In an action for the death of a passenger on a street car in a collision between the car and a wagon of a third person, the evidence showed that the motorman saw the wagon approaching the track but did not check the speed of the car till he was so close to the wagon that a collision was inevitable. Held that, though it might have been the duty of the driver of the wagon to have stopped until the car had passed, the motorman did not exercise the highest care toward the passenger because he failed to stop the car, though knowing that a collision would ensue.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1211.]

3. Appeal—Party Aggrieved.

In an action for the death of a passenger on a street car, in a collision between the car and a wagon of a third person, brought against the railway company and the third person, judgment was rendered against the company and in favor of the third person. Held, that the company was not a party aggrieved by the refusal to render judgment against the third person; there being no right of contribution between the codefendants.

4. Contribution — Torts — Joint Wrongdoers—Statutes.

Code Civ. Proc. § 709, providing that where property liable to an execution against several persons is sold thereon, and more than a due proportion of the judgment is satisfied out of the proceeds of the property of one of them, he may compel contribution from the others, etc., does not change the rule that there is no right of contribution between joint tort-feasors, but merely gives to a judgment debtor entitled to contribution the summary remedy of using the judgment itself to enforce contribution in the manner prescribed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 11, Cent. Dig. Contribution, §§ 6–9.]

5. Appeal—Motion for New Trial—Review of Evidence.

Where, in an action for negligence, plaintiff does not move for a new trial, the court, on appeal, cannot consider the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to show negligence.

6. Trial—Findings — General and Special Findings—Consistency.

In an action for the death of a passenger on a street car, in a collision between the car and a wagon of a third person, brought against the street railway company and the third person, the court found that the death of the passenger was not caused by the negligence of the third person, but solely by the negligence of the company. The court further found that the driver of the wagon saw the car approaching when it was about 125 feet distant from the point of the accident and did not stop his team until too late. Held that, as the car was operated on a street, it could not be said that the driver of the wagon did not exercise reasonable judgment in determining that he could pass the crossing before the car would reach him, and a judgment in favor of the third person was authorized.

7. Same.

The finding of the ultimate fact prevails in support of the judgment, notwithstanding a finding of probative fact which tends to show that the ultimate fact is against the evidence.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Sarah C. Forsythe, administratrix of J. W. Forsythe, deceased, against the Los Angeles Railway Company and another. There was a judgment for plaintiff against defendant Los Angeles Railway Company and in favor of defendant Los Angeles Hay Storage Company, and plaintiff and defendant Los Angeles Railway Company appeal. Affirmed.

Valentine & Newby and Bicknell, Gibson, Trask, Dunn & Crutcher, for appellant. E. W. Freeman, A. D. Laughlin, and Henry J. Stevens, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. On the 16th day of March, 1903, J. W. Forsythe, since deceased, was a passenger on a street car of the defendant the Los Angeles Railway Company, which was running southerly on Main street in the city of Los Angeles. He was seated in the front part of the car on the easterly side, and in a seat provided by the railroad company for passengers. As the car was crossing Seventh street there was a collision between the car and a large, heavily loaded wagon of the other defendant, the Los Angeles Hay Storage Company, and driven by one of its employés; and by this collision the said Forsythe received injuries from which he afterwards died. This action was brought by his administratrix, who is also his widow, against both of said defendants to recover damages for his death, the plaintiff alleging that the death was caused by the negligence of both the said defendants. (For brevity, the said first-named defendant will be hereafter called the "Railway Company," and the other defendant the "Storage Company.") The case was tried without a jury, and the court found that the injuries were caused by the negligence of the said Railway Company, and that the other defendant, the Storage Company, was not guilty of any negligence in the premises. It found the amount of the damage to be $4,000, to which finding no exception is taken, and it rendered judgment for plaintiff against the Railroad Company for the aforesaid amount of money, but rendered judgment for costs against plaintiff in favor of the Storage Company. The defendant the Railroad Company, made a motion for a new trial, which having been denied, it appeals from the order denying said motion, and also from the judgment. The plaintiff, being dissatisfied because judgment was not given her also against the Storage Company, moved the court, under sections 663 and 663½ of the Code of Civil Procedure, to amend the conclusions of law so as to show that plaintiff was entitled to judgment against both defendants, and, this motion having been denied, the plaintiff appeals from the order denying it, and also from that part of the judgment which is in favor of the said Storage Company and against plaintiff, and which adjudged that the plaintiff take nothing against said defendant, and that the latter recover its costs against plaintiff. Plaintiff did not make any motion for a new trial.

1. Appeals of the Railway Company.

This appellant saved a few exceptions to rulings as to the advisability of evidence, but we do not think it necessary to notice these exceptions in detail, because they relate to trivial matters which could have had no effect upon the decision of the case. The main contention is that the evidence is not sufficient to support the finding that the collision was caused by any negligence of appellant, but this contention is not maintainable. No doubt the appellant makes a strong showing that the other defendant, the Storage Company, was guilty of negligence which contributed to the accident, and, in an action brought by the Storage Company to recover damages from the Railway Company for injury done to its team by the collision, the Railroad Company would perhaps have a good defense in the contributory negligence of the plaintiff in such an action. But the deceased was not guilty of any contributory negligence, and, if the negligence of the Railway Company was a cause of the damage, it has no defense to this present action in the fact that the negligence of the Storage Company also contributed to that damage. This appellant must show that it was not guilty of any negligence which, in whole or in part, caused the injury; and we do not think that it makes such showing. It must be remembered that the deceased was a passenger on appellant's car, and that it owed him the very highest care. Immediately before the accident the driver of the hay wagon going westerly along Seventh street was about 40 feet distant from the point of the accident when he was seen by the motorman of the car of the appellant, which was coming at the rate of about eight miles an hour southerly on Main street towards the place where the driver would cross Main street if he kept on his course. The motorman was about 125 feet from the point of the accident when he saw the driver of the wagon thus closely approaching the crossing. Neither the driver nor the motorman made any effort to avoid the collision until it was too late to accomplish that result. The court found, and the evidence supports the finding, "that said motorman, seeing said hay wagon, did not check the speed of said car until it reached Seventh street, when he threw off the current; that neither the said driver nor the said motorman made any attempt to stop his respective vehicle until the same was so close to the said point of accident that a collision was inevitable"; that the motorman did not apply his air brakes until he was nearly at the center of Seventh street, when he did apply the brakes and "stopped the car within 15 or 20 feet," and that "when the said motorman applied the air brakes both the said car and the said hay wagon were within a few feet of the point of collision." Appellant contends that it was the duty of the driver of the wagon to stop until the car had passed, and that therefore the motorman was not negligent in continuing at the usual speed; and there is a good deal of argument on the question whether or not the car had a right of way over the crossing superior to that of the wagon. These questions would be significant in an action brought by one of the two defendants against the other for damage to the plaintiff in such an action caused by the collision. But in the case at bar the railroad company should have exercised the highest care towards the deceased; and it certainly cannot be truly said that the motorman did exercise the highest degree of care to protect his passengers, when, seeing the team closely approaching the crossing, with no evidence of the driver's intention to stop, and, knowing that if he continued on his course a collision would be inevitable, he made no reasonable effort to avoid such collision. Whatever chances he might have taken as to liability for damages to the team and driver, he had no right to expose his passengers to the danger of a collision which seemed likely to occur and which he might have easily prevented.

This appellant further contends that even if the judgment against it could be considered as right, still the court erred in not also rendering judgment against the other defendant, the Storage Company, because, as is claimed, the evidence showed that the said other defendant was also guilty of negligence which contributed to the injury. But the appellant is not a party aggrieved by the refusal of the court to give judgment against the Storage Company, even if such refusal could be considered erroneous as against plaintiff. It is beyond doubt the well-established general rule that there is no right of contribution between joint tort-feasors. Appellant contends that this rule has been changed by section 709 of the Code of Civil Procedure; but we do not think so. That section does not pretend to deal with the matter of the right of contribution between tort-feasors. Its plain intent is to simply provide that, when there is a judgment against two or more defendants who are entitled to contributions from each other and one pays the whole or more than his proportion thereof, "the person so paying or contributing is entitled to the benefit of the judgment to enforce contribution or repayment, if within ten days after his payment he files with the clerk," etc. It simply gives to a judgment debtor entitled to contribution the summary remedy of using the judgment itself to enforce the contribution, and relieves him of the necessity of pursuing some more tedious and inadequate proceeding for enforcing said contribution. It is only an amendment to the law of procedure; and the general rule is that an amendment to or provision in the law of procedure does not change the substantive law, unless the language used necessarily leads to that result. And it certainly cannot be said that the Legislature while enacting section 709 as a part of the law of procedure necessarily intended to change, or did change, the fundamental principle that there is no right of contribution between joint tort-feasors. Moreover, the section in terms relates only to cases where judgments had been rendered, and therefore it does not apply to the case at bar.

2. The appeals of the plaintiff.

On these appeals plaintiff contends that the court should have given her judgment against the Storage Comany as well as against the railroad company. As this appellant did not move for a new trial we cannot, on her appeal, consider the question of whether or not the evidence shows negligence on the part of the Storage Company; we can look only at the findings. Appellant contends that upon the findings judgment should have gone against the Storage Company. But the court found the ultimate fact that the collision and the injuries to the deceased "were not caused by the negligence of the defendant, Los Angeles Hay Storage Company, or by any of its agents, servants, or employés, but solely by the negligence of the agents," etc., of the railroad company. Appellant contends that this finding of the ultimate fact should be considered as overcome by certain findings of probative facts which are claimed to be inconsistent with the finding of the ultimate fact; but this contention cannot be maintained. The findings of the probative facts relied on are that the driver of the wagon saw the car approaching when it was about 125 feet distant from the point of the accident and did not stop his team, but did afterwards, when it was too late, attempt to stop, but "the wagon was loaded with three or four tons of hay and was of unwieldy bulk and weight, and was then so close to the track, and to the car of said defendant, the Los Angeles Railway Company, that before the wagon could be entirely stopped the end of its tongue struck said car and scraped along its side." In the first place, it does not clearly appear that these findings of the probative facts are inconsistent with the finding of the ultimate fact. The railroad operated by the railroad company was a street railroad, not a steam railroad running through the country at great speed and with heavy trains which cannot, like a street car, be stopped within a short distance; and, under the circumstances detailed by the findings, we could not well say that the driver of the wagon did not exercise reasonable judgment in determining that he could pass the crossing before the car would reach him, and in not trying to stop sooner that he did. But, in the second place, the general rule is that the finding of the ultimate fact prevails in support of the judgment notwithstanding a finding of a probative or evidentiary fact which tends to show that the ultimate fact was found against the evidence. And findings of probative facts will not invalidate the finding of an ultimate fact unless the latter is based on the former, and is entirely overcome thereby, and unless, also, it appears that these findings of probative facts dispose of all the facts involved in the pleadings, and that the facts found constitute all the facts in the case. Semple v. Cook, 50 Cal. 26; Smith v. Acker, 52 Cal. 219; Wood v. Pendola, 78 Cal. 287, 20 Pac. 678; Commercial Bank v. Redfield, 122 Cal. 407, 55 Pac. 160, and cases there cited. And such a condition is certainly not presented in the case at bar.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

3 Cal. App. 668

MADERA RY. CO. v. RAYMOND GRANITE CO. et al.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 29, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 26, 1906.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN—PROCEEDINGS—PUBLIC USE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1238, providing that the right of eminent domain may be exercised in behalf of certain public uses, including railroads, and section 1241, declaring that before property can be taken it must appear that the use is authorized and the taking necessary therefor, in condemnation proceedings by a corporation organized under the general laws to operate a railroad, the burden is on the corporation to show a public use.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 18, Cent. Dig. Eminent Domain, § 530.]

2. SAME—WHAT CONSTITUTES PUBLIC USE.

The public use requisite to the exercise of the power of eminent domain need not be a use by the entire community, or any considerable portion of it; but it must be common.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 18, Cent. Dig. Eminent Domain, § 54.]

3. SAME—RAILROADS.

Neither the length of the railroad, nor the fact that it is a spur, bears any necessary relation to the question of public use.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 18, Cent. Dig. Eminent Domain, §§ 59, 66.]

4. RAILROADS — CONSTRUCTION—STATUTES — —LENGTH OF ROAD.

Civ. Code, § 468, requiring every railroad after commencing construction to complete, each year, five miles of road, failing in which the right to extend the road beyond the point then completed is forfeited, does not limit the right to construct a road to one not less than five miles in length.

5. SAME—RIGHT OF WAY—RIGHTS IN HIGHWAYS.

Under the express provisions of the statute, railroad corporations may construct their roads across or along highways.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 41, Cent. Dig. Railroads, §§ 260–265.]

6. APPEAL—REVIEW—INVITED ERROR.

An appellant cannot complain of the admission of evidence introduced by him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, § 3597.]

7. Eminent Domain—Proceedings—Defenses.

In condemnation proceedings by a railroad, the good faith of the corporators in forming the corporation cannot be called in question.

8. Same.

A corporation not organized for railroad purposes was authorized by the supervisors of a county to build a railroad along a certain highway, but subsequently the building was enjoined. Thereafter a railroad company was incorporated and petitioned for a franchise to build along the highway; the petition being accompanied by a waiver of the franchise granted the other corporation. Held, in condemnation proceedings by the railroad to condemn a right of way along the highway, that the owner of the land could not object on the ground that the former corporation had not conveyed to the railroad its right of way, under Civ. Code, § 494, relating to sales of property by one railroad to another.

9. Same—Public Use—What Constitutes.

The fact that the advantage of a railroad inures to a particular individual or class of individuals does not render the use not public.

10. Same.

The fact that a railroad corporation has been formed to build a road to connect with another one, and be a branch thereof, does not render the use by such corporation not a public one.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 18, Cent. Dig. Eminent Domain, § 66.]

11. Same.

The fact that all the stockholders in a railroad company were stockholders in a corporation which would be primarily benefited by the construction of the road did not show the use not a public one.

12. Same.

The fact that a railroad company had not cars with which to operate its road, and intended to arrange with another road to operate the former one, did not show the use by the road in question not a public one.

13. Same—Proceedings—Evidence—Sufficiency.

In condemnation proceedings by a railroad, evidence considered, and held sufficient to show the use a public one.

14. Depositions—Objections—Right to Object.

Code Civ. Proc. § 2034, provides that, when a deposition has been taken, it may be read by either party, and is then deemed the evidence of the party reading it. Held, that where defendant took plaintiff's deposition, and called for a copy of records of plaintiff, which were incorporated into the deposition, and plaintiff offered the deposition in evidence, an objection that the copy was not the best evidence was untenable.

15. Same.

Code Civ. Proc. § 2032, provides that a deposition may be used by either party on the trial, subject to all legal objections except "to the form of an interrogatory." Defendant took plaintiff's deposition, but plaintiff offered it in evidence, and during the reading thereof objected to a question which called for the "deliberate judgment" of a witness as to a matter, and not as to the facts of the matter. Held, that plaintiff was not estopped to object to the question.

16. Eminent Domain—Proceedings—Damages—Evidence—Admissibility.

In proceedings by a railroad to condemn a right of way along a highway over defendant's lands, it was proper, on the question of defendant's damages, to exclude evidence as to the condition in which the highway was left by plaintiff's grading at points other than that along defendant's land.

17. Same.

In condemnation proceedings by a railroad to condemn a right of way along the highway over defendant's land, there was no prejudicial error in admitting on behalf of plaintiff the testimony of a witness on the question of damages when the condemnation for the highway was before the court, the court limiting the testimony to the value of the land, and on condition that it be shown that the value had not changed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 18, Cent. Dig. Eminent Domain, § 542.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Proceedings by the Madera Railway Company against the Raymond Granite Company and another for the condemnation of lands, and, from the judgment of condemnation, the granite company appeals. Affirmed.

Robert L. Hargrove, for appellant. C. H. Oatman and T. C. West, for respondent railway company. R. R. Fowler, Dist. Atty., for respondent county.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Condemnation of land for right of way. The complaint alleges the due incorporation of plaintiff under the laws of this state "for the purpose, among other things, of constructing, owning, maintaining and operating a single track railway of a standard gauge, to be operated by steam, for the carrying of passengers and freight thereon and thereover for hire, commencing at 'Curtis' Station' situated at the intersection of the branch of the Southern Pacific Railroad known as Knowles Spur at the crossing of the 'McLennan Road' in section No. 22, township 8 south, ranch 19 east M. D. B. & M.; thence in a southerly direction along said McLennan Road to 'McGowan Station,' situated about eight hundred feet south of Madera Granite Company's quarry in the southeast quarter of section 27," said township and range. The complaint describes with particularity the strip of land required, as shown on a map attached to the complaint and marked "Exhibit A," copy of which is attached to the transcript. The area of land sought to be condemned is .62 acres, and "the same does not include the whole, but is only a part of an entire tract of land" and is situated in Madera county. That defendant company "is the owner of an interest in said tract of land, hereinbefore particularly described, and also the larger tract of land of which it is a part." That the defendant county "is the owner of an easement over said tract of land, and the same is now used as a highway for vehicles and pedestrians to pass over. That the said tract of land herein sought to be taken consists of the west half of said highway and will not in any manner impede or interfere with the use of said highway." It is also averred that "the taking of said strip of land is for a more necessary public use than that to which it has already been appropriated," and that the "said railroad of plaintiff has been located in the manner which will be the most compatible with the greatest public good and the least private injury," and "that the taking of said strip of land is for a public use, to wit, the right of way of said railroad of plaintiff." Defendant county made no answer, and its default was duly entered. Defendant company answered, denying specifically that the plaintiff was incorporated for the purposes alleged, and also denied practically all the averments of the complaint; avers that plaintiff was incorporated "by the officers and agents of the Madera Granite Company for the convenience, use and benefit of said Madera Granite Company," a corporation operating a granite quarry near the terminus of plaintiff's said railroad; that said railroad commences "at a fictitious place called 'Curtis Station' and terminates on the private land of said Madera Granite Company less than one mile distant; that there are no such stations as 'Curtis' or 'McGowan' stations;" that said Madera Granite Company "is and has been for a long time extracting rock from its private land marked McGowan Station for market, and is and for a long time has been hauling the said rock by wagons and teams over said McLennan road to the said railroad of the Southern Pacific Company, and from there transports the same over said Southern Pacific's railroad to market"; that plaintiff was incorporated for the sole purpose of taking advantage of the law of eminent domain and of commencing this suit for the private benefit of the Madera Granite Company; that said railroad does not terminate or commence at public places; that its termini are on private grounds, and so situated as to be of no benefit to the public; that defendant company owns all the land about the place called Curtis Station, and the station called McGowan is upon lands of plaintiff, and no public roads lead to said station except said McLennan road, which terminates at that station; that "plaintiff has no passenger cars, locomotives, or cars at all, nor does it intend to operate any to carry any freight or passengers for the convenience of the public or otherwise"; that the purpose of building said railroad was to transport the rock of said quarry of the Madera Granite Company to the Southern Pacific's railroad; that plaintiff has made high fills and grades upon said strip of land in such manner as to prevent defendant from crossing said highway to and from its adjoining lands and to prevent the use of the west half of said highway for teams and wagons. The court made findings substantially as alleged in the complaint: That defendant company is the owner in fee of the land sought to be taken, subject to the easement thereover for the McLennan private road, which said easement is owned by defendant county, and the same is a public highway; that the interest of defendant company in said strip of land is of the value of $125,000, and the damage to the contiguous land of defendant company is the sum of $500. The court further found against defendant company on the specific facts alleged in defense. Thereupon the court made its preliminary order and judgment of condemnation, which was thereafter followed by its final judgment of condemnation. From this latter judgment, and from the order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant company appeals.

The transcript comprises about 500 pages, appellant's brief about 150 pages, and respondent's brief half the number. Obviously some way must be found to bring into reasonable compass the salient questions of law and fact before us. There are certain principles of law governing condemnation cases, discussed by the respective parties, which may as well be disposed of here as elsewhere.

1. "The right of eminent domain may be exercised in behalf of the following public uses: (4) * * * Steam * * * railroads. * * *" Code Civ. Proc. § 1238. Counsel for respondent contends that this declaration of the Legislature raises the presumption that the railroad in controversy must be presumed to be a public use, and that the burden of proving the contrary is upon the defendant. It was held in Napa Valley R. R. v. Napa County, 30 Cal. 435, that "railroads concern the public interest as matter of legal judgment; and however that conclusion be opposed to the fact in the case at bar makes no difference, the action of the Legislature on the question not being open to review by the judicial department of the government." So held, also. in S. & V. R. R. Co. v. City of Stockton, 41 Cal. 147. In both these cases, however, the railroads in question were authorized by special act of the Legislature, and it would have been an unwarranted interference with legislative discretion for the courts to inquire into the policy or wisdom of the Legislature, in declaring that the building of these particular roads concerned the public interest. The early case of Contra Costa R. Co. v. Moss, 23 Cal. 324, is of this class, also. Another class of cases is found in our reports, of which County of San Mateo v. Coburn, 130 Cal. 631, 63 Pac. 78, 621, is an example. There the board of supervisors had determined the necessity of opening a public road by a certain route, and later found it necessary to bring the action to condemn a right of way over a portion of the land required for the road. "Roads" are among the public uses declared by the Code section above cited. And it was held that the court could not inquire into the necessity for the highway, its location, and extent, as these were matters of a political or legislative character. But in that case it was shown that the statute (Pol. Code, § 2681 et seq.) "has established a tribunal for determining these questions. * * * If this tribunal proceeds in accordance with the provisions of these sections, it acquired jurisdiction to determine these questions, and its determination is not subject to collateral attack. In a proceeding thereafter by the public to condemn a right of way for this public road, the court is not authorized to review the action of the board of supervisors in determining these questions"—citing Wulzen v. Board of Supervisors, 101 Cal. 15, 35 Pac. 353, 40 Am. St. Rep. 17; County of Sisikiyou v. Gamlich, 110 Cal. 94, 42 Pac. 468; Lewis on Em. Domain, §§ 238, 239. See, also, Pool v. Simmons, 134 Cal. 621, 66 Pac. 872. Where, however, the public use is declared by general statute, enumerating the many objects that are thus designated, the courts are not precluded from determining from all the circumstances whether or not in the particular case the purpose is a public use. Lindsay I. Co. v. Mehrtens, 97 Cal. 676, 32 Pac. 802. Consolidated Channel Co. v. C. P. R. R. Co., 51 Cal. 269, was such a case. Plaintiff sought by condemnation to procure certain lands to serve as a site for a bedrock flume to carry the dirt and gravel from its mining claims, and also as a place of deposit for the tailings of its mine. The statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 1238) gave the right of eminent domain in behalf of flumes among other declared public uses. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained. It was contended that the legislative declaration that flumes are public uses is conclusive upon the judicial department of the government. The court said: "Without doubt it is the general rule that, where any doubt exists whether the use to which the property is proposed to be devoted is of a public or private character, it is a matter to be determined by the Legislature, and the courts will not undertake to disturb its judgment in this regard. This question was fully discussed and the doctrine established in the case of S. & V. R. R. Co. v. City of Stockton, 41 Cal. 147. But in the same case an exception to the general rule is recognized. It is said: 'A case might, indeed, be presented in which it might appear, beyond the possibility of question, that a tax had been imposed, or the property of a citizen had been taken for a use or purpose in no sense public;' or, in the language of Chancellor Walworth (5 Paine, 159), 'where there was no foundation for a pretense that the public was to be benefited thereby'; and in such case it would be our duty to interfere and offer a relief." In discussing the general rule it was said in County of San Mateo v. Coburn, supra: "It is not to be held, however, that the mere declaration by the Legislature that the object for which private property may be taken is a public use will preclude the owner from contesting the right to deprive him of his property. If it is sought to condemn the property for a use which is evidently private, or to accomplish some purpose which is not of a public character, courts will disregard the legislative declaration that such use is public. * * * If it can be shown by extrinsic evidence that the end sought to be accomplished is not of a public character, but is solely for private purposes, the condemnation will be denied as being in excess of the legislative power"—citing matter of Niagara Falls, etc., Ry. Co., 108 N. Y. 375, 15 N. E. 429. While it is true that, when the uses are in fact public, the necessity or expediency of taking private property for such uses, the extent to which the right may be delegated, and the instrumentalities to be used, are questions belonging to the political and legislative branches of the government, nevertheless the question whether the uses are in fact public, justifying the taking in invitum of private property therefor, is a judicial question to be determined by the courts. Lewis, Eminent Domain, § 158. Our statute would seem to set the question at rest. Section 1241, Code Civ. Proc., declares that: "Before property can be taken it must appear: (1) That the use to which it is to be applied is a use authorized by law; (2) that the taking is necessary to such use." As the necessity for the taking of the particular property must be made to appear by proof, at least prima facie, the burden is upon the plaintiff to show "that the taking is necessary to such use." Lewis, Em. Domain, § 426. It was said in Lindsay I. Co. v. Mehrtens, supra: "Whoever, under the claim of an agency of the state, would deprive the owner of any of his property by virtue of the exercise of eminent domain, must show, not only that the use for which he seeks to appropriate it is a public use, but also that the Legislature has authorized the taking of property for that particular use, and in the mode in which he is seeking to appropriate it." Unquestionably the owner of the land sought to be condemned may show that the use and its purpose are private, and not public. The existence of the corporation plaintiff proves no more than would the existence of a natural person seeking to condemn under authority of the statute.

2. It was said in County of Madera v. Raymond Granite Co., 139 Cal. 128, 72 Pac. 915, approving the doctrine laid down in Sherman v. Buick, 32 Cal. 253, 91 Am. Dec. 577: "Whether a way be public or private does not depend on the number of people who use it, but upon the fact that every one may lawfully use it who has occasion." Mr. Lewis states the rule as follows: "It is not necessary that the entire community, or any considerable portion of it, should directly participate in the benefits to be derived from the property taken." Lewis, Em. Dom. § 161. The public use required need not be of the whole state or any considerable portion of it, but the use and benefit must be in common, not to particular individuals. Every public use is in more or less degree local and benefits a particular section more than others. This is true of railroads, as well as of ordinary highways. The cases are numerous sustaining this rule. See notes to Lewis, Em. Dom., supra. See, also, Lindsay I. Co. v. Mehrtens, supra.

3. Neither the length of the road nor the fact that it is a branch or spur bears any necessary relation to the question of public use or of the public interest to be subserved by it, except possibly as a circumstance bearing upon the alleged fact that the road is solely for the private use of plaintiff. Contra Costa Railroad v. Moss, supra. Short roads as connecting links between independent railroad systems, or as branches and feeders to established systems, are often necessary and fall within the general rules governing condemnation quite as completely as main lines of road. It is the public purpose that is to govern, and not the length of the road, whether it is a road connecting two established roads or a branch of an established road, or a branch connecting with another branch road. Appellant cites section 468 of the Civil Code and claims among its errors of law that the articles of incorporation of plaintiff were inadmissible because the above section provides that commercial railroads shall be at least five miles long, and in this case it was impossible to comply, as the road is less than one mile in length. This section requires every railroad corporation, every year after it has begun construction of its road, "to complete and put in full operation at least five miles of its road, until the same is fully completed," failing in which "the right to extend its road beyond the point then completed is forfeited." This section is not to be construed as limiting the right to construct a road to one not less than five miles in length. The most that could be claimed for the section is that, when the road is five miles long or more, the corporation must comply with the statute.

4. The meaning of that part of subdivision 3, § 1241, Code Civ. Proc., is called in question, reading: "If already appropriated to some public use, that the public use to which it is to be applied is a more necessary public use." The point has reference to the McLennan road over which plaintiff seeks a right of way, and it is contended by appellant that only by direct and specific legislative enactment and authority can property be taken which is already applied to a public use; that the question whether or not the intended use is "a more necessary public use" is a question for the Legislature to decide, and not the courts. We are referred to a discussion of the question by Mr. Lewis, in his work on Eminent Domain (sections 262–276). Conceding the general doctrine to be as illustrated by Mr. Lewis, the Legislature of this state has specifically and directly authorized railroad corporations to "construct their roads across, along or upon * * * any * * * avenue or highway; * * * but the corporation shall restore the * * * road * * * highway * * * thus intersected, to its former state of usefulness as near as may be, or so that the railroad shall not unnecessarily impair its usefulness or injure its franchise." Arcata v. Arcata & M. R. R. R. Co., 92 Cal. 639, 28 Pac. 676; S. P. R. R. Co. v. Ferris, 93 Cal. 263, 28 Pac. 828, 16 L. R. A. 510. See, also, Montgomery v. Railway Company, 104 Cal. 186, 37 Pac. 786, 25 L. R. A. 654, 43 Am. St. Rep. 89. Mr. Lewis (section 270) cites Springfield v. Conn. River R. R. Co., 4 Cush. (Mass.) 63, to the effect that authority to construct a railroad between certain termini does not authorize the appropriation of a highway longitudinally. He adds, however, that "the Legislature may of course authorize the condemnation of additional easements in public highways, as for railroads, electric lines," etc. This latter authority is clearly given by our statute.

5. Some question arose in the case as to the right of the defendant company to inquire into the good faith of the promoters of plaintiff company in forming the corporation and to show that it was in fact not a bona fide corporation. So far as we can discover defendant company was permitted to introduce such evidence as it had which bore upon the question, and, if it was error to admit it, appellant cannot complain. Possibly it was admitted upon the theory that it bore somewhat upon the question that the use, as claimed by appellant, was in fact private. Appellant states distinctly, "we do not attack Madera Railroad Company's articles as a corporation," and we may accept this declaration as conclusive. We do not think, however, that the good faith of the corporators in forming the corporation can be called in question collaterally in this proceeding so as to in any wise affect the validity of the corporate existence. The dissolution of the corporation or the forfeiture of its franchise can only be accomplished by quo warranto proceedings, as was the case of People v. Pittsburgh R. R. Co., 53 Cal. 694; or under the provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 803 et seq. (People v. Dashaway Association, 84 Cal. 114, 24 Pac. 277, 12 L. R. A. 117). For a discussion of the right to collaterally attack the validity of the corporation charter, see Kansas Railway Company v. Coal Co., 161 Mo. 288, 61 S. W. 684, 51 L. R. A. 936, 84 Am. St. Rep. 717. Whether or not the franchise will be taken away or the exercise of corporate acts be enjoined, upon a given state of facts, are questions not necessarily determinative of the question here, namely, whether or not the corporation is in fact seeking only by means of the right of eminent domain to enjoy the property sought to be taken, purely as a private use, and not in the interest of the public. The corporation may have a valid existence and may successfully resist all efforts to revoke its franchise, and yet the court may inquire whether the particular use involved in the condemnation is public or private. If the use be private, with which the public have no concern, and in which it has no interest, condemnation will be refused, regardless of the general right of the corporation to condemn by virtue of its corporate existence.

In view of the foregoing principles it remains to notice the facts developed by the evidence, and certain questions connected therewith and certain assignments of error. It appears that, by ordinance 74 of the supervisors of Madera county, the Madera Granite Company was authorized to build a railroad along the McLennan highway, and that company commenced the work of construction, but was enjoined from its further prosecution, or using this highway for railroad purposes. Subsequently, to wit, June 6, 1903, plaintiff company was duly incorporated, and thereafter it petitioned the board of supervisors for a franchise to construct and operate a railroad along the McLennan highway, which was accompanied by a waiver on the part of the Madera Granite Company of its franchise granted by ordinance 74, and on July 11, 1903, ordinance 86 was passed by said board of supervisors, granting the petition. It is now claimed that the Madera Granite Company did not convey to plaintiff its right of way granted it by ordinance 74 or any of its railroad property, and that the property under section 494, Civ. Code, still belongs to the Granite Company, and hence plaintiff has no standing in court. Section 494, Civ. Code, relates exclusively to sales and transfers of property of one railroad company to another railroad company. The Madera Granite Company was not organized as a railroad corporation, and had no authority by its charter to engage in railroad building, and probably for that reason the court enjoined its attempt to exercise the powers of a railroad corporation. However this may be, the section has no application to the facts, and hence we cannot see what cause defendant has for complaining that plaintiff is violating, if it is doing so, the private rights of the Granite Company.

Appellant contended at the trial for the right to introduce evidence showing that plaintiff, in constructing its road along McLennan highway, practically destroyed its usefulness to defendant company as an abutting owner and user of the highway. The trial court admitted the evidence offered in support of this defense, and in rebuttal thereof findings were made upon the issue favorable to plaintiff. The evidence was conflicting, with sufficient to support the findings.

There was considerable evidence tending to the point that the main object in building the road was to enable the owners of the Madera Granite Company to market its product. Circumstances may arise where it becomes of public benefit for branch railroads to be built primarily to reach some important industry about to be inaugurated or that is struggling along under difficulties for want of transportation facilities. The fact that the advantage of such road inures to a particular individual or a class of individuals will not render the use any the less public. And the fact that the stockholders of the Madera Granite Company were also stockholders of plaintiff company does not prove that the contemplated use is a private use. Lindsay I. Co. v. Mehrtens, supra. The doctrine, as we believe it to be, is well stated in Ulmer v. Lime Rock Railroad Company, 98 Me. 581, 57 Atl. 1001, 66 L. R. A. 387. That was a condemnation suit to condemn a right of way over certain land for a branch road to a lime quarry. The court said: "The mere fact that the primary purpose of such a branch is to accommodate a particular private business enterprise is by no means a controlling test. The character of the use, whether public or private, is determined by the extent of the right of the public to its use, and not to the extent to which that right is or may be exercised. If it is a public way in fact, it is not material that but few persons enjoy it. When such a branch track is first constructed, and the right of way necessary therefor is taken, it may in fact be used only for the business of the plant to which it is constructed, because at that time no other business enterprise may exist in that vicinity to furnish freight for transportation; but in the future other enterprises may spring up, either upon the line or the extension thereof, so that a branch track which in the first instance is primarily constructed for the accommodation of one may become of equal accommodation, benefit, and use to others. The tests decisive of this question as to whether a branch track of this character is to be constructed and operated for public or private purposes, deducible from the great weight of authority upon the question in this country, are these: If the track is to be open to the public, to be used upon equal terms by all who may at any time have occasion to use it, so that all persons who have occasion to do so can demand that they be served without discrimination, not merely by permission, but as of right, and if the track is subject to governmental control, under general laws as are the main lines of a railroad, then the use is a public one, and the Legislature may grant the power to exercise the right of eminent domain to a corporation which is to construct and operate such track; and, if the purpose of the railroad corporation in building any particular branch track is to operate the same in conformity with these requirements, then the power granted by the Legislature may be exercised in that particular case. This is in accordance with the almost unbroken line of decisions of the appellate courts of the various states of this country, a brief quotation from a few of which may be advantageous." Citing many cases.

Our statute does not define what is meant by "steam railroads," nor does it make any distinction between main lines and branches. A corporation may be formed to build a particular road which is to connect with another road and become a branch thereof. Such a corporation would have the right to condemn land for its right of way. Mr. Lewis says: "There appears to be no reason why lateral roads should not be constructed, if they are required to serve the public, as occasion requires." Lewis, Em. Dom. § 171. There was evidence that the Madera Granite Company was not the only person and its granite enterprise the only industry that might be served by this branch road. The defendant company employed a large number of men, as did the Madera Granite Company. There was evidence that a considerable business in marketing wood for fuel might be done by this road. There was evidence also that a grazing country surrounded this road and shipments of cattle might be made by this road; that the road passed through granite land which would with this branch road be profitable to work; that it would be an additional convenience to the neighborhood generally. It is made the duty by law for the railroad company to operate its cars "for the transportation of all such passengers and property as * * * offer or is offered for transportation," etc. (Civ. Code, § 481); and "in case of refusal * * * to take and transport any passenger or property or to deliver the same * * * must pay the party aggrieved all damages," etc. (Civ. Code, § 482). Failure to operate its road as provided by the act of April 15, 1880 (St. 1880, p. 43, c. 57), makes subject to forfeiture the right of the corporation or the individual owning the road to operate it. Section 17, art. 12, of the Constitution, provides, among other things: "Every railroad company shall have the right with its road to intersect, connect with or cross any other railroad, and shall receive and transport each the other's passengers, tonnage and cars, without delay or discrimination." Organized, as plaintiff is, to do a general carrier business, it can be compelled to exercise its assumed powers and duties. Appellant contends that the Knowles switch or spur, with which the branch in question is to connect, is no part of the main line of the Southern Pacific Company; that it is a branch of the Raymond branch of the Southern Pacific Company, and is but a switch running to defendant company's quarry. There is evidence that the Knowles spur was built by the Southern Pacific Company; that the right of way was obtained by defendant company, and conveyed to the Southern Pacific Company for a consideration paid by that company in switching charges; that it was constructed in 1889 and has been in use ever since by the Southern Pacific Company. Witness Knowles testified: "The Knowles spur is their track. Q. Mr Knowles, is there a regular train service to Knowles' spur? A. No, sir; there is no train service; only freight service, that's all. They carry passengers to Knowles spur in freight or box cars or whatever they have to take passengers to and from our store at Knowles spur. Q. Do they run regular trains on that spur? A. Well, not regular; no, sir. Not every day. If they have freight to get or take they run there. Q. Do you always notify them when they come down there [meaning Knowles spur]? A. Not always, they come there [meaning Knowles spur] often without being notified. Q. But do they run regular trains? A. They are supposed to come there whenever we have anything to ship. If there is any one to go, they never come after them. * * * Knowles station on the Southern Pacific map is where the Knowles spur starts from the Southern Pacific line." In the answer of the defendant company this Knowles spur is referred to as "the railroad of the Southern Pacific Company," and the road in question is referred to as commencing "at the said Southern Pacific Raliroad," and that the sole purpose of said Madera Railroad is to carry the rock of the Madera Granite Company from McGowan station "to the said railroad of the Southern Pacific Company on cars prepared by the said Southern Pacific Company for that purpose." There was much evidence pro and con the question whether the use was private or public—sufficient, we think, to have supported a finding either way by the court. In such condition of the record we must uphold the view of the evidence taken by the court. That plaintiff company has now no cars with which to operate the road; that it may or intends to arrange with the Southern Pacific Company to operate the road with its cars; that at the present time little or no business will come to the road except from the Madera Granite Company; that the present or prospective volume of business for the road from all sources would not justify its construction; that the owners, agents, and attorneys of the Madera Granite Company were active participants in organizing plaintiff company—are facts having some bearing, perhaps, upon the question of the nature of the use, but are by no means conclusive. Legitimate railroad enterprises are often projected into regions of little present profit, and ultimately prove unfortunate investments by lack of anticipated business. But they were nevertheless public in their objects; and we have seen that a public use may be shown where only a single enterprise is primarily to be benefited, and that the fact that the corporators in another company which is the chief beneficiary are also corporators of the railroad company is not at all conclusive as to the character of the use.

The point is much urged that the Madera Granite Company and plaintiff were composed of the same persons, seeking thus not only to discredit the plaintiff company, but also the good faith and objects of its corporators. Sufficient to say, as was said in Kansas Railway v. Coal Co., supra: "There is nothing in the letter or spirit or policy of the law which prohibits the same persons from forming and conducting two different corporations; one a business, and the other a railroad, company. * * * The charter of the plaintiff and the laws of this state expressly require the plaintiff to transport persons and freight, and the plaintiff can be compelled by mandamus to do so if it refuses. The fact that almost the entire volume of business now in sight for the plaintiff to do will be transportation of coal produced by the Kansas & Texas Coal Company does not destroy the character of the plaintiff as a railroad company, nor convert it into a private, and not a public, railroad; nor does it make the use to which the land sought to be condemned is to be applied any the less a railroad right of way, and therefore a public use." Upon the same general question, see Oregon Short Line v. Telegraph, 111 Fed. 842, 49 C. C. A. 663.

There are numerous errors of law assigned in the exclusion and admission of evidence. Many of them are inconsequential and need not be noticed. Others present rulings which, conceding error, were without prejudice to appellant. Still others are disposed of by the foregoing discussion.

Exception 2. Before the trial defendant company took the deposition of R. W. Campbell, secretary of plaintiff, and in the taking called for copies of certain records of the plaintiff company, which were produced and incorporated into the deposition. At the trial plaintiff offered this deposition in evidence, and, in reading it, objection was made to the admission of those record copies as not the best evidence, and defendant also demanded that the originals should be produced, citing section 1000, Code Civ. Proc. Having been introduced by defendant and made part of the deposition taken by it, the copies therein incorporated were as admissible as any other portions of the deposition. "When a deposition has been once taken, it may be read by either party at any stage of the same action or proceeding, * * * and is then deemed the evidence of the party reading it." Code Civ. Proc. § 2034. The demand made was substantially for all the books and papers and records of plaintiff, some few of which were specified, many of which were incorporated in the deposition, and all of which were at the office of the company in San Francisco, while the trial was going forward at Madera. There was no sufficient showing by affidavit or otherwise that these records and papers not appearing in the deposition were material to defendant's defense. As was said in Ex parte Clark, 126 Cal. 235, 58 Pac. 546, 46 L. R. A. 835, 77 Am. St. Rep. 176, the motion was "in effect a general omnibus order [motion] for the production of all of defendant's [plaintiff's] books, which has always been held to be unauthorized." Besides, the general purpose which the records were intended to establish appeared in many ways in the course of the trial.

Exception 3. During the reading of the deposition plaintiff objected to a question as immaterial and incompetent, which in fact it was, and the court sustained the objection. Section 2032 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "the deposition may be used by either party upon the trial * * * subject to all legal objections," unless the objection be "to the form of an interrogatory," which this was not. It is contended that "plaintiff, offering the deposition, was estopped from objecting to the same." The question called for the "deliberate judgment" of the witness as to a matter, and not the facts as to the matter, and was clearly immaterial and incompetent. The court did not err in its ruling.

Exception 12. Upon the question of defendant company's damage, defendant sought to show the condition in which the McLennan road was left by plaintiff's grading, at points other than along the land of defendant company, over which the right of way was being condemned, for the purpose of enhancing the damage to defendant company. The court sustained the objection to such evidence, and, we think, rightly.

Exception 13. Considering all the testimony brought out in connection with the ruling of the court complained of, we see no error, for defendant had the benefit of all the witness knew on the subject.

Exception 14. It was not error to admit at plaintiff's instance the testimony of the witness Knowles on the question of damage given in the condemnation suit when the McLennan private road was before the court. In admitting the testimony, the court limited it to the value of the land upon condition that it be shown that the value had not changed. Upon the question of damage the court held that a different element entered into the matter where the taking was for a railroad, and the damage might be different. Under the limitation made by the court the testimony worked no injury to defendant.

Exceptions were taken to certain rulings as violating the law as laid down in San Diego Land, etc., Co. v. Neale, 78 Cal. 63, 20 Pac. 372, 3 L. R. A. 83. We cannot see that the court departed materially from the rules established by that case.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

1. CONTRACTS—ACTIONS—PROOF OF ALTERATION—PLEADING.

Under the denial in the answer of execution of the contract sued on, defendants may prove that the contract contained material alterations made after it was signed.

Proof of information conveyed by one defendant to another in the absence of plaintiff, relating to the subject-matter of a letter, written by the defendant to whom the information was given, after the receipt of the information, and claimed by plaintiff to be an admission, is competent, as tending to show the meaning and intent of the words employed in the letter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Action by Frank B. Dennie against William A. Clark and another. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Tanner, Taft & Odell, for appellant. Will A. Strong and Works, Lee & Works, for respondents.

ALLEN, J. Action to recover the price and value of certain goods alleged to have been sold by plaintiff to the defendants under a written contract of sale and purchase. Trial to a jury. Verdict and judgment for defendants. Plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied, and appeals from the judgment and order.

Plaintiff by his complaint averred that the defendants, in writing, ordered from the plaintiff certain goods and merchandise to be shipped to Los Angeles, in which they agreed to pay the price and value thereof, less a discount of 20 per cent. and freight, one-third in three months, one-third in four months, and one-third in six months from date of shipment; that, pursuant to such order, plaintiff shipped the goods, and defendants received the same and paid the freight; that no part of the price and value had been paid to plaintiff by defendants. Defendants denied that they ever purchased the goods under a written contract, or otherwise; denied that they ever executed a contract in writing for the purchase of such goods; and by way of separate defense alleged that the only contract or agreement ever entered into between plaintiff and defendants was for the consignment by plaintiff to defendants of certain goods, to be by defendants sold on commission; that defendants were to advance the freight for plaintiff and to account to plaintiff for the amount of goods actually sold, less a commission of 20 per cent. thereon for handling; that the plaintiff was, by agent, to effect the sales, defray any expense, and report such sales to the defendants, who should fill orders for goods thus sold, and become responsible for the price and value of orders filled; that the only contract or agreement in writing ever entered into was that plaintiff should prepare upon a printed form a list of goods to be shipped under such agreement, and upon presentation by plaintiff of what purported to be such list defendants signed the same as evidence of willingness to receive such goods upon arrival at Los Angeles, and for no other purpose; and by way of counterclaim the defendants set up the contract, as in the separate defense averred, and averred that they advanced certain freight upon such goods and received the same in their warehouse, and plaintiff failed and refused to negotiate sales thereof, or to receive said goods from them, and they have been required to provide storeroom for them to their damage, for which they ask judgment.

Upon the trial plaintiff offered in evidence a written contract, in effect as claimed by plaintiff in the complaint. Defendants were permitted to introduce evidence that the written instrument so offered in evidence by plaintiff was never signed in the form presented; that many material alterations had been made therein; that it had been in plaintiff's possession continuously after signing, and that defendants had never had possession thereof. Further, that the only contract ever made was as set out in the special defense and counterclaim, and that the written agreement evidenced no contract ever entered into between plaintiff and the defendants. There was much conflict in the testimony, and many matters offered by plaintiff in the nature of admissions after the goods had been shipped, and testimony as to the acts of defendants connected with the paying of freight, and their control, not consistent with their claim as to the character of the instrument actually signed. It was the duty of the jury, however, to pass upon all of these questions of fact, and to determine the nature of the actual agreement; to determine whether the written agreement had been executed or not; and its finding, in effect, was that the agreement was as claimed by defendants, and that the written contract relied upon by plaintiff was never executed, and nothing appears in the record which would justify us in disturbing its verdict. None of the matters by way of admission, or acts performed by defendants in connection with the receipt of the goods and their custody over the same, amounted to an estoppel. There was no change of relation upon the faith thereof, and no prejudice resulted to plaintiff by reason of any reliance upon any acts or statement of defendant made or occurring after the delivery of the goods. Whatever force these admissions had was in connection with the main fact of the execution of the instrument. The evidence as to changes in the instrument after the same was signed was admissible under the issue raised by the denial of execution. The effect of this was not to introduce new matter, but to prove that the cause of action as alleged did not exist and had never existed. Landis v. Morrissey, 69 Cal. 86, 10 Pac. 258. That the making and delivery of the contract set out in the complaint was not the act of defendants. Hall v. Auburn Turnpike Co., 27 Cal. 257, 87 Am. Dec. 75. There was no admission that a cause of action once existed and a plea in avoidance, which would be a special defense, as in Michalitschke v. Wells Fargo & Co., 118 Cal. 688, 50 Pac. 847. Nor was any of the evidence offered by defendants received for the purpose of changing or varying a written contract, the execution of which was established, but was properly received to show that the contract actually agreed upon to be signed was different from the one offered in evidence by plaintiff, and as tending to show the alterations therein and their materiality, and particularly to show that the instrument offered in evidence by plaintiff was not an agreement ever entered into or contemplated by the parties, and in support of the special defense.

The evidence as to conversations between the defendants in the absence of plaintiff, or his agent, was admissible for the purpose of explaining certain written statements claimed by plaintiff to be admissions against his interests. The information conveyed to one of the defendants by the other relating to the subject-matter of such subsequent letter was competent as tending to show the meaning and intent of the words employed and the understanding of the writer of the letter as to the status of all parties.

We perceive no error in refusing charges 2 and 3 proffered by plaintiff. As to charge 2, it was inapplicable under the evidence, while charge 3 is open to the criticism of attempting to charge as to the weight and effect of the testimony before the jury. We find no error in the many other specifications not herein specially noticed.

LEWIS v. OGRAM. (L. A. 1,647.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 30, 1906. Rehearing Denied Aug. 27, 1906.)

BOUNDARIES — ESTABLISHMENTS — AGREEMENT BETWEEN OWNERS.

Where the government surveyor "flagged" the line between adjoining homesteads, and before the final survey the homesteaders executed an agreement reciting a "controversy as to the line" and that it was agreed that a fence erected should be the line and that one would not file on a certain part of his claim, and the fence was not within 10 chains of the flagged line, the agreement, being evidently intended to operate on title, was not within the rule as to the settlement of boundaries, the parties knowing that the true line was elsewhere, and hence was not binding.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Boundaries, § 216.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Taggart, Judge.

Action by Syra E. Lewis against Johnson Ogram. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. G. Griffith, for appellant. B. F. Thomas, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Lewis sued Ogram to recover damages for trespass on land alleged to be in his possession, described as the N. ½ of the N. W. ¼ of the N. W. ¼ of section 23, township 5, range 28. Ogram filed a cross-complaint in the usual form to quiet his alleged title against the claims of plaintiff. Issue was joined upon the averments of the complaint and cross-complaint, respectively, and after a trial the court gave judgment for the defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

The S. W. ¼ of section 14 lies north of and adjoins the N. W. ¼ of section 23. The official United States survey of the boundary line between the sections was not completed until February, 1900. In April, 1897, Lewis was residing upon the S. W. ¼ of section 14, and Ogram was residing upon the N. W. ¼ of section 23, each claiming the right, under the United States land laws, to file a homestead claim upon his particular tract when open for entry. The location of the division line between the two tracts was at that time uncertain, but both parties supposed it to be about 10 chains south of the true line as afterwards surveyed and established. Lewis was occupying all that part of the actual N. W. ¼ of section 23, lying between this supposed line and the true line, embracing substantially the N. ½ of said 40-acre tract, claiming and believing, until August, 1898, that it was a part of the S. W. ¼ of section 14, and that it was covered by his entry. In August, 1898, the government surveyor, at Ogram's request and with the knowledge of Lewis, "flagged" a line through between the two sections, on or near the true line, and set a post at the common section corner thus located at the west end line. The court finds that Lewis, thereafter, until this action was begun, continued in peaceful and exclusive possession of the 20 acres of section 23 in controversy, "but with full knowledge that the said portion of section 23 was not covered by his filing." The finding also states that the "exact location of the dividing line between said homestead of the plaintiff and the N. W. ¼ of the N. W. ¼ of section 23" was not known by either Lewis or Ogram until the official survey in February, 1900. In January, 1899, Lewis and Ogram orally agreed to establish a division line between their respective claims, and for that purpose measured 10 chains south from the aforesaid line "flagged" by the surveyor and, at that distance therefrom, built a fence at joint expense, as and for a division fence between their claims. On November 16, 1899, they executed the following agreement:

"Whereas there is a controversy between said parties hereto as to the boundary lines of their respective government claims including in part the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 23, township 5 north, range 28 west S. B. M., and whereas they are desirous of settling said controversy. Now therefore said parties do mutually agree as follows, viz.: That the said Ogram will not include in his filing any part of the north half of said parcel of land, and Lewis hereby agrees that he will not include any part of the south half of said parcel of land. The said parties further agree that the fence now subsisting and dividing their respective claims of said parcel of land shall be and remain the division line of their said claims irrespective as to what may be the true line that would divide said parcel of land in two equal parts lying north and south of such true division line. In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands this 6th day of November, 1899."

In February, 1900, the official survey was completed, showing that the 20 acres in dispute constituted the N. ½ of the N. W. ¼ of the N. W. ¼ of section 23, that it was not included in the homestead claim of Lewis, and that the line "flagged" through in August, 1898, was substantially correct. On April 5, 1900, Ogram filed his claim for a homestead upon the N. W. ¼ of section 23, including this 20 acres. In July, 1902, Lewis instituted in the United States land office a contest of the said entry of Ogram with respect to the 20 acres, setting forth as his ground for contest the same facts relied on by him in this action. A hearing of the contest was refused by the register and receiver, no appeal was taken from the ruling, and, on September 22, 1902, a patent was duly issued by the United States granting the land to the defendant Ogram.

The rule upon which Lewis, the plaintiff, relies is thus stated in the decisions of this court: "Where coterminous proprietors of land, in good faith agree upon, fix, and establish a boundary line between their respective tracts of land, in which they acquiesce, and under which they occupy, for a period equal to that fixed by the statute of limitations, the line as thus established is binding upon them." Cooper v. Vierra, 59 Cal. 283; White v. Spreckels, 75 Cal. 616, 17 Pac. 715; Helm v. Wilson, 76 Cal. 485, 18 Pac. 604; Dierssen v. Nelson, 138 Cal. 398, 71 Pac. 456. In other cases it is said that the occupancy in pursuance of the agreement need not continue for the period of the statute of limitations. This is obviously so where other conditions creating an estoppel exist. Cavanaugh v. Jackson, 91 Cal. 583, 27 Pac. 931; Helm v. Wilson, supra. This qualification, however, is not important in this case. Such an agreement, necessarily, is not valid for any other purpose than that of settling an uncertainty in regard to the common boundary. If adjoining owners agree on a division line, knowing that it is not the true line, and with the purpose of thereby transferring from one of them to the other a body of land which they know his true line does not embrace, the agreement will not be enforced. Such a transaction would not constitute an adjustment of uncertainties or doubts as to the line, but would be an attempt to convey or release land from one to the other. Land cannot be conveyed by the device of moving fences or changing the marks or monuments which define its limits. If an agreement having for its real object the transfer of the land, but relating by its terms solely to the boundary line and made with knowledge that the true line is elsewhere than at the place fixed, is oral, it would be void, being an attempt to transfer land without writing. If it is in writing it would be ineffectual to pass title, for it would lack the apt words of conveyance that are necessary to accomplish a transfer of real property. The authorities are to the effect that these agreements, when deemed valid, are of such a nature that they do not operate upon the title at all. It is said that "one party does not purport or attempt to sell or convey to the other any land" (Sneed v. Osborn, 25 Cal. 630); that such agreement is "not a contract for the sale or conveyance of lands, and has no ingredients of such a contract" (Boyd v. Graves, 4 Wheat. [U. S.] 413, 4 L. Ed. 628); that "adjoining owners who adjust their partition line by parol, do not create or convey any estate whatever between themselves; no such thought or intention influences their conduct; after their boundary line is fixed by consent they hold up to it by virtue of their title deeds and not by virtue of a parol transfer" (Hagey v. Detweiler, 35 Pa. 409); and that "agreements of this character * * * are not considered as extending the title. They do not operate as a conveyance so as to pass the title from one to the other, but proceed upon the theory that the true line of separation is in dispute, and to some extent unknown, and in such cases the agreement serves to fix the line to which the title extends." White v. Spreckels, supra.

The facts found clearly show that the agreement in question, although in terms purporting only to fix the division line, could have had no other object or purpose than to operate upon the title or right of possession of the parties to the land which they knew was not within the limits of Lewis' claim. There was, it is true, some uncertainty as to the "exact location" of the section line at the time the agreement was made, but it arose solely from the fact that the flagged line, although made by the government surveyor, had not then become official or final and was still subject to correction and change. The findings, properly construed, are not in conflict on this subject, as claimed by the appellant. There was no doubt or uncertainty over the fact that the so-called division line agreed upon was not the true line, nor anywhere within 10 chains of the true line, nor over the fact that the true line did not include in Lewis' claim any part of the 20 acres lying between the agreed line and the flagged line, the same 20 acres which Lewis now seeks to have transferred to him by virtue of the agreement. The agreement itself indicates this, for it does not recite that there was any uncertainty about the location of the line, but merely that there was a "controversy" about it, which, of course, may have arisen from some other cause. The findings place the absence of such doubt beyond question. Lewis knew that his claim extended only to the south line of section 14, and that it did not cover any of the 20 acres in question, which the agreed line would give him. He, therefore, must have known that the true line was not 10 chains south of the flagged line, but was either coincident with the flagged line, or somewhere to the north of it. The object and purpose of the agreement, therefore, could not have been to resolve or settle any existing doubts as to the exact location of the section line. This explains the finding that no consideration passed. If the agreement was made to settle a doubt about the division line, and in good faith to substitute an arbitrary line as the boundary, no other consideration than the mutual concessions of the parties would be necessary. The court below must, therefore, have believed that there was no such purpose and no such concession, and that, for the real object it was intended to accomplish, no consideration was given or received. The line agreed on, in view of the known facts, had no relation to the true line, and could not have been intended to represent the true line. There must have been some ulterior object. It may have been made for the purpose of allowing Lewis an opportunity to change his possession and, when the land was open for entry, file his claim to include this 20 acres, as he would have had the right to do. But he did not see fit to do this, and when the time within which he could have done so expired, Ogram, or any other qualified person, was at liberty to enter it.

Whatever the real purpose may have been, the agreement can have no present effect on the title. It does not, by its terms, purport to convey or transfer any land, or operate upon the title in any manner, and consequently does not effect an estoppel by covenant or agreement. And, being without consideration, it could not, in any event, operate to create such an estoppel. It had no relation whatever to the true line, nor to any doubt concerning the location of the boundary, and hence it does not come within the rule which makes an agreed line binding between the parties, not as a contract to convey, but as an attempt in good faith to make certain that which before was in doubt. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the court below was correct in its decision.

The judgment is affirmed.

JENISON v. REDFIELD et al. (L. A. 1,685.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 30, 1906. Rehearing Denied Aug. 29, 1906.)

1. Waters and Water Courses—Irrigation Districts—Right to Use Water Outside of District.

Under St. 1887, p. 29, c. 34, and St. 1897, p. 254, c. 189, providing for the organization of irrigation districts, and authorizing a landowner to assign his water rights, the object of which legislation is to enable owners of lands susceptible of irrigation from a common source and by the same system of works, to form a district composed of such lands, which when formed is a public corporation, a landowner, even though part of his rights are as an assignee, has no right to water for use beyond the limits of the district.

2. SAME.

The fact that a landowner for five years had used water beyond the limits of the district under a claim of a right to do so, and with the knowledge of the district, gave him no right to continue such unwarranted use.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. T. Allen, Judge.

Action by J. E. Jenison against Henry Redfield and others. Judgment for defendants, and new trial denied. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Kendrick & Knott, for appellant. J. H. Ardis and Stephens & Stephens, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action for damages alleged to have been suffered by plaintiff, a landowner of Walnut Irrigation district, by reason of the failure and refusal of defendants, directors of said district, to distribute and apportion to him his proportion of the water of said district. Defendants had judgment, and plaintiff appeals from such judgment, and also from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Walnut Irrigation district is a public corporation organized under what is known as the "Wright act" (St. 1887, p. 29, c. 34), and the acts supplementary thereto. See act of 1897, St. 1897, p. 254, c. 189. Plaintiff is the owner of 38 acres of land within the boundaries of said district, assessed on the last assessment of the property of the district at $4,100, and is also an assignee of the right to the water of one J. H. Burke, who owns 30 acres in said district, assessed at $3,000. The total assessed value of the property of the district was $94,450. Under the provision of the statute that "all waters distributed for irrigation purposes shall be apportioned ratably to each landowner upon the basis of the ratio which the last assessment of such owner for district purposes within said district bears to the whole sum assessed upon the district, provided, that any landowner may assign the right to the whole or any portion of the waters so apportioned to him" (section 18 of act of 1897, St. 1897, p. 259, c. 189), plaintiff, as owner and assignee of Burke, was entitled to $^{7100}/_{94450}$ of the waters of the district distributed for irrigation purposes. It appears that plaintiff owned considerable land outside of said district, upon which he had planted alfalfa and walnuts, and the real question presented by this case is as to whether he was entitled to receive from defendants any portion of his share of water for use upon said land without the boundaries of the district. There is no pretense that he was ever denied water for use upon such of his land as was within the district, and unless he was entitled to have the water to the extent of his share for the sole purpose of carrying the same beyond the limits of the district and irrigating lands outside thereof, the defendants in no respect failed or refused to apportion and distribute to him any water to which he was entitled. All the damage alleged, viz., $900, was damage arising by reason of the failure to have the water on land lying outside of the district. The trial court found that the defendant had not failed or refused to deliver any water to which he was entitled, and refused to admit evidence as to damage to plaintiff's land lying outside of the district by reason of lack of water, and these rulings present for determination the question already stated.

It is apparent that to sustain the claim of plaintiff, it must be held that the effect of our statutes relative to irrigation districts, is to make each owner of land within a district the absolute owner of the proportionate share of the water of the district to which his land entitles him, to do with as he sees fit, even to the extent of diverting all thereof from the irrigation of lands within the district. It seems very clear that such a conclusion would be opposed to the whole plan or scheme of the legislation for irrigation districts, converting a district organized, acquiring and holding water solely for a certain specified purpose, viz., the procuring and furnishing of water for the improvement by irrigation of the lands included therein, into a mere agency for the distribution of its water to individuals for use by them outside the district for any purpose whatever. Under plaintiff's theory, the use to which the water is to be appropriated, is entirely immaterial, and the irrigation district is, in effect, although constituted and avowedly acquiring its water for an entirely different purpose, nothing more or less than an ordinary water company, the original absolute owners of the property of which are the landowners, each owning such proportion thereof as the value of his land entitles him to, and at liberty to deal with it as he sees fit, without regard to the improvement of the land of the district. He may retain it, and use the water for any purpose and in any place, or he may transfer it to any other person for any kind of use, and thereupon such transferee succeeds to his rights and becomes entitled to the water. Such a construction of the provisions of the irrigation act entirely ignores the object of its enactment. The whole object of the legislation authorizing the organization of irrigation districts is to enable owners of lands susceptible of irrigation from a common source and by the same system of works, to form a district composed of such lands, which district when formed is a public corporation for the sole purpose of obtaining and distributing such water as may be necessary for the irrigation thereof, thus enabling each one to have for his land in the district, the benefit of a common system of irrigation, and bringing about the reclamation of the land of the district from aridity to a condition of suitability for cultivation. It was recognized that without such a common system the individual landowners might be unable to obtain water for the irrigation of their lands, and that a work which would be for the public benefit and general welfare, viz., the reclamation from aridity of large portions of the lands of the state, might never be accomplished if left to individual enterprise. The irrigation district legislation, under which a public municipal corporation may be created for the purpose of furnishing water for the irrigation of the land within the district, has been sustained upon the same ground as has the levee and reclamation district legislation, which is, in effect, that the land included within the limits of such a district, requires, by reason of its situation and condition, the protection or reclamation thus made possible, and that it is for the public welfare that such protection or reclamation should be afforded such land. See In re Madera Irr. Dist., 92 Cal. 296, 311-318, 28 Pac. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106.

The ultimate purpose of a district organized under the irrigation act is the improvement, by irrigation, of the lands within the district. It can, under the law, be organized and exist and acquire property only for such purpose. This we think is so clearly apparent as not to require further discussion here. Such a district holds all property acquired by it solely in trust for such ultimate purpose, and can divert it to no other use. See section 29 of the act of 1897, St. 1897, p. 263, c. 189. It has to do solely with the irrigation of lands within the district, and cannot appropriate water to any other purpose. The right of a landowner of the district to the use of the water acquired by the district is a right to be exercised in consonance with and in furtherance of such ultimate purpose, viz., for the improvement by irrigation of lands within the district, and in no other way. His right is always in subordination to the ultimate purpose of the trust. So far as he proposes to use the water for the irrigation of lands within the district, he is proposing to use it in furtherance of the purpose of the trust, and is entitled to have distributed to him for that purpose, such proportion as his assessment entitles him to. Section 18, Act 1897, St. 1897, p. 259, c. 189. To this extent only can he be held to be the owner of any share or portion of the water, except that, by virtue of the proviso of section 18 (St. 1897, p. 259, c. 189), he may assign the right to the whole or any portion of the share to which he is entitled. This does not mean, however, that he may make an effectual transfer of his share, free from the trust by which it is incumbered. It still remains subject to that trust, and, therefore, can be used only for the irrigation of lands within the district, and the irrigation district has no authority to distribute it for any other purpose. The right of assignment conferred by the act on a landowner is limited by the whole policy of the statute to an assignment for irrigation within the limits of the district. We do not understand the contrary to have been held in Board of Directors v. Tregea, 88 Cal. 334, 353, 26 Pac. 234.

We are satisfied that plaintiff was not entitled, either as owner or assignee of Burke, to have any water distributed to him by the defendants for use upon land without the limits of the district. As already stated, the record does not show that he has ever been denied water for use upon his land within the district. Plaintiff alleged in his complaint that for more than five years prior to the refusal of defendants to apportion and distribute to him water for the irrigation of his land outside the district, he had claimed the right to use and had used under such claim upon such land, more than three-fourths of the water allotted to him, and that such use by him had been adverse to the irrigation district and with its full knowledge. This allegation was, on motion of defendants, stricken from the complaint as irrelevant, and evidence offered in support thereof on the trial was excluded. There was no error in these rulings. If it be assumed that the statute of limitations runs against such a district, plaintiff could not establish title by prescription to this water as against the district in this action, and such plainly was not the object of the allegation or offered evidence. The allegation is not that he ever claimed to own the water as against the district, or in any other capacity than as a landowner of the district, but simply that he had claimed the right, as such landowner, under the law governing such districts, to use his share of the water on the lands outside the district, and had so used it for the five years under such claim and with the knowledge of the district. This could not give him any right by prescription to such use of the water, or afford him any ground upon which he could insist upon a continuance of the unwarranted use. It was wholly irrelevant in this action. In view of our conclusion upon the main question presented and already discussed, the other specifications of error in the record are immaterial, and require no discussion.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

1. Appeal—Review—Grounds of Action of Court Below—Presumptions.

The statement in the brief of appellant as to the ground on which a motion to set aside a judgment was granted is no part of the record; and in the absence of any other showing in the record of the grounds for the action of the trial court, if there is any ground consistent with the record on which such action may be sustained, the court will sustain it.

Code Civ. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. T. Allen, Judge.

Action by Edwin R. Fox against W. H. Townsend and others. From a judgment in favor of defendant, R. P. Mudge, rendered after setting aside a judgment in favor of plaintiff, he appeals. Affirmed.

See 83 Pac. 272.

Cole & Cole, for appellant. O. B. Carter, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. Plaintiff instituted this action to quiet his title as to various lots of land in the city of Los Angeles, against many defendants, including R. P. Mudge. As to most of said defendants, including Mudge, the only attempted service of summons was by publication. As to said defendants, they not having appeared, default was entered on October 3, 1902, and judgment was rendered on said default in favor of plaintiff and against said defendants on December 23, 1902. On July 3, 1903, the trial court made an order granting a motion of defendant Mudge to set aside a judgment as to him, and allowed him to answer to the merits of the original action, which he did on the same day, disclaiming any interest in the land described in the complaint, except one lot, as to which one lot he denied plaintiff's claim of ownership and alleged title in himself. On the issues thus made, the cause was tried as between the plaintiff and Mudge, and the trial court found in favor of Mudge, and gave judgment in his favor as to said lot. Plaintiff appeals from the order of July 3, 1903, setting aside the original judgment against Mudge, and also from the judgment finally entered in favor of Mudge, his only contention being, however, as to the order setting aside the original judgment. If that order was correctly made, there is no error shown by the record as to the subsequent proceedings.

The record on appeal consists solely of the judgment roll and the order setting aside the original judgment, there being no bill of exceptions. The record does not disclose the ground upon which the motion to set aside the judgment was based, or upon which the lower court acted, showing simply that a motion of Mudge to set aside the judgment was granted, and Mudge allowed to answer to the merits. Appellant, in his brief, states that the ground upon which the original judgment was set aside as to Mudge was that it was void for the reason that the court had not acquired jurisdiction as to him on account of the insufficiency of the affidavit for the publication of summons in its allegations as to his residence out of the state. He then attempts to show that the affidavit was legally sufficient in this respect to support the order for publication of summons, and hence that the judgment based thereon was not void upon its face. While we are inclined to the opinion that the affidavit was insufficient to support an affidavit for publication as to Mudge, and that the publication was, as to him, ineffectual to confer jurisdiction, it is not necessary to here determine that question. The statement in the brief as to the ground upon which the motion was granted constitutes, of course, no part of the record. On appeal every presumption is in favor of the action of the lower court, and if there be any ground consistent with the record upon which that action may be sustained, we are bound to sustain it.

As will be noted from what has already been said, the motion to set aside the judgment was granted within a year after the rendition of the judgment. Section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, provides: "When from any cause the summons in an action has not been personally served on the defendant, the court may allow, on such terms as may be just, such defendant or his legal representative, at any time within one year after the rendition of any judgment in such action, to answer to the merits of the original action." Mudge not having been personally served with summons, the superior court had the power, under this provision, upon a proper showing and in the exercise of a sound discretion, to set aside the judgment as to him and allow him to answer to the merits at any time within one year after the rendition of the original judgment against him, even though the proceedings by publication were entirely regular, and the judgment, therefore, valid on its face. This was exactly what the lower court did in this case. Whether or not the circumstances shown to the court on the hearing of this motion were such as to justify the making of the order is a question that we cannot determine in the absence of a record showing the facts presented to that court. In the absence of a showing to the contrary, we must here assume that a sufficient showing was made to warrant that court in exercising the power conferred by section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. There is, therefore, no warrant for reversing the order setting aside the original judgment as to Mudge.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—MORTGAGES—ENFORCEMENT.

A suit for a decree adjudging a mortgage executed by a guardian to be a valid lien on the interest of the wards in the property covered by the mortgage, and directing a sale of the premises to pay the note for which the mortgage was given, brought more than 7 years after the accrual of the cause of action thereon, is barred by Code Civ. Proc. § 337, providing that an action on a contract founded on an instrument in writing is barred unless commenced within four years after the accrual of the cause of action.

2. SAME—PERIOD OF LIMITATION—MISTAKE AS GROUND FOR RELIEF.

In a suit for a decree adjudging a mortgage executed by a guardian to be a valid lien on the interest of the wards in the property covered thereby, and directing a sale thereof to pay the note for which the mortgage was given, the complaint alleged that the property was devised to the wards; that the testator had incumbered a part thereof with a mortgage which, subsequent to his death, was foreclosed; that the sum borrowed, for which the note and mortgage were given, was used to redeem; that the money was borrowed by the guardian without any order of the court; that the guardian represented that he had authority to execute the note and mortgage; that it was the intention of the guardian and the mortgagee that the latter should have a valid lien; that the guardian and mortgagee believed that the mortgage was valid, and that their mistake was not discovered until within three years prior to the commencement of the action. Held, that the action was within section 337, providing that an action on a contract in writing is barred unless commenced within four years after the accrual of the cause of action, and not within section 338, subd. 4, allowing an action for relief for mistake to be commenced within 3 years after the discovery of the mistake.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; F. A. Kelley, Judge.

Action by James O. Banks against Annie E. Stockton, as guardian of Dorsey K. Stockton, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Garoutte & Goodwin, for appellants. N. J. Barry, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This action was commenced December 8, 1899, to obtain a decree adjudging a mortgage, executed by Annie E. Stockton as guardian of the person and estates of Dorsey K., Dexter C., H. C., and Pitt D. Stockton, who then, and until the year 1894, were minors, to be a valid lien upon the interest of said minors in the property described therein, and directing the sale of said property to pay the amount due on the note for which the mortgage was given as security. The mortgage was executed by said guardian on November 26, 1890, to secure a note of said guardian of the same date for the sum of $1,000, and bearing interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, and payable two years after its date. A demurrer interposed to the complaint was overruled, and, an answer having been filed, the cause was tried and judgment given for plaintiff as prayed. This is an appeal by defendants from such judgment.

One of the grounds specified in the demurrer to the complaint was that the cause of action stated, if one was stated, was barred by the provisions of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California, which provides that an action upon a contract founded upon an instrument in writing executed in this state is barred unless commenced within four years after the cause of action accrues. We can see no possible answer to the objection thus made.

So far as the action is for the recovery of the indebtedness evidenced by the promissory note and mortgage, the cause of action accrued, according to the allegation of the complaint, two years after November 26, 1890. When this action was commenced, December 8, 1899, more than seven years had elapsed after the cause of action accrued, and no facts are alleged in the complaint sufficient to avoid the effect of the running without action commenced of the time prescribed in this section.

Plaintiff relies upon certain facts alleged in the complaint as sufficient to defeat this objection. Substantially these facts are as follows: The property described in the mortgage was acquired by said minors under the provision of the will of their father. He had incumbered a portion thereof with a mortgage, which was a valid and subsisting lien thereon at the time of his death. Subsequent to his death this mortgage was foreclosed, and a sale of the premises had under the foreclosure decree. It was to redeem the property from such sale that the $1,000, for which the note and mortgage in suit were given, was borrowed from plaintiff, and the money was in fact used for that purpose. The money was borrowed by the guardian and the note and mortgage were given without any order of authorization therefor on the part of the superior court having jurisdiction of the guardianship proceedings. The guardian represented to plaintiff that as such guardian she had authority to execute the note and mortgage, and that such mortgage would be a valid lien on the minors' property, and it was the intention of both guardian and plaintiff that plaintiff should have a valid lien thereby. Both the guardian and plaintiff believed that the mortgage was good and valid, and their mistake in that regard was not discovered until within three years prior to the commencement of this action. We see nothing in these facts that can assist plaintiff. Plaintiff's theory apparently is that this is an action for relief on the ground of mistake, and that, therefore, under subdivision 4, § 338, Code Civ. Proc., he had three years after his discovery of the facts constituting the mistake within which to commence his action. It will be observed that the discovery by plaintiff as to the invalidity of his mortgage was not made until after the statute would have barred it, had it been a valid mortgage. We are at a loss to understand how plaintiff can be placed in any better position by reason of his mistake as to the validity of his mortgage than he would have been in had his mortgage been valid and there had been no mistake. As has been heretofore pointed out by this court in similar cases, this is not an action for relief upon the ground of mistake within the meaning of subdivision 4, § 338, Code Civ. Proc., but is substantially one to compel payment of the indebtedness evidenced by the note and mortgage executed by the guardian to plaintiff. The case is very similar to that of Clausen v. Meister, 93 Cal. 555, 29 Pac. 232, where the complaint alleged that a loan was made and the note and mortgage taken by reason of certain fraudulent representations that the maker was the owner of the mortgaged property, whereas in fact she was only the executrix of the will of the deceased owner, and entitled upon distribution to only one-fourth of the property. The money there loaned was used to pay a claim against the estate, thus benefiting all those interested in the property under the deceased. Within three years after the discovery of the facts, but more than four years after the maturity of his note and mortgage, the plaintiff brought his action for the amount due, and sought to be subrogated to the rights of the creditor of the estate whose claim had been paid with his money. This court there said: "The real cause of action is for the recovery of the money loaned by plaintiff, and the other relief demanded is but incidental to this, and the time allowed by the statute within which to commence an action for the recovery of this money cannot be extended by alleging the discovery, within three years, of facts which in equity would have entitled him to look for its repayment to other security than the mortgage which accompanied the note received by him at the time of the loan." See, also, Campbell v. Campbell, 133 Cal. 33, 65 Pac. 134. Whatever rights in equity this plaintiff may have originally had by reason of the facts alleged, such rights were available only to aid in the enforcement of the claim evidenced by the note and mortgage, and, when the bar of the statute attached to that claim, such incidental equitable rights were lost. Clausen v. Meister, supra.

The demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained.

The judgment is reversed.

MUTCHMOR v. McCARTY. (Sac. 1,404.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 27, 1906.)

1. Mines and Minerals—Lode Claim—Location—Notice—Record—Effect.

The record of a notice of location of a lode claim, as required by St. 1875–76, p. 853, c. 562, is only effective to prove the bare fact of the record of such notice, and is not evidence that the notice was posted on the claim, that the location was so marked on the ground that its boundaries could be readily traced, that they included the apex of a lode, the existence of any valuable mineral deposit in place, or that the necessary assessment work had been done, all of which were essential to the validity of the location.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 34, Cent. Dig. Mines and Minerals, § 50.]

2. Same—Validity—Description.

Where a notice of location of a lode claim failed to contain a description of the claim by reference to a natural object or permanent monument by which it could be identified, as required by Rev. St. U. S. § 2324 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1426], it was ineffective for any purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 34, Cent. Dig. Mines and Minerals, §§ 45, 46.]

3. Same — Validity of Location — Relocation.

Where plaintiff's alleged lode claims were mostly relocations of abandoned claims, and plaintiff failed to show actual possession prior to the commencement of the action, the doing of the requisite assessment work, or that there existed within the described boundaries of any of the claims a vein or deposit of ore sufficiently valuable to pay the cost of extraction or the cost of reduction, the claims were invalid.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 34, Cent. Dig. Mines and Minerals, § 63.]

4. Same—Vein Within Placer Claim—Location of Lode Claim After Patent For Placer Claim.

Under Rev. St. U. S. § 2319 et seq. [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1424] providing for the disposition of lode or vein mining claims and placer deposits, a vein known to exist within the boundaries of a placer claim at the date of an application for a patent, and not included in the application, may be located by an adverse claimant after the issuance of the patent.

5. Same.

Rev. St. U. S. § 2333 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1433] provides that where a vein or lode is known to exist within the boundaries of a placer claim, an application for a patent for the placer claim which does not include an application for the vein or lode claim shall be construed as a conclusive declaration that the claimant of the placer claim has no right of possession of the vein or lode claim, but where the existence of the vein or lode is not known, a patent for the placer claim shall convey all the minerals within its boundaries. Held, that a lode claim is known to exist within a placer location within such section when its existence is known to the placer claimant, when its existence is generally known, or when any examination of the ground, sufficient to enable the placer claimant to make oath that it is subject to location as such, would necessarily disclose the existence of the vein.

6. Same—Quartz Vein—Value.

A quartz vein which contains so small a portion of gold, silver, etc., as to be of no value for mining purposes, is not a known vein, within Rev. St. U. S. § 2333 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1433] providing for the disposition of mining claims.

7. Witnesses—Adverse Witnesses—Discretion.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court Calaveras County; A. I. McSorley, Judge.

Action by T. W. Mutchmor against J. D. McCarty. From a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

W. J. Donovan, for appellant. Solinsky & Wehe, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an action to quiet plaintiff's alleged title to nine separate quartz mining claims or lode locations, described by their respective names and by reference to the notices of location recorded in the office of the recorder of Calaveras county. The complaint contains the allegations usual in such cases. The defendant, by his answer, denies that the plaintiff is, or ever was, owner, in possession, or entitled to the possession, of any of said claims, or of any interest therein. He admits that he claims an interest and estate in all the real property described in the complaint, but denies that his claim is without right. He alleges that for more than 10 years last past he and his grantors have been the owners, and in the actual possession, of two placer mining claims held under patent from the United States—the Carson Hill, containing 146.50 acres, patented on the 18th of October, 1894, and the Blue Mountain, containing 151.26 acres, patented February 1, 1898—and also a certain quartz mining claim. He further alleges that for more than 20 years he and his grantors have been the owners, and in the actual possession, of 480 acres of agricultural land, contiguous to the Carson Hill and Blue Mountain placer claims, which is also held under patents issued to his grantors by the United States. He alleges that he is informed and believes that the real property described in the complaint conflicts with said placer mining claims and agricultural patents. The action was commenced in December, 1902, and was tried by the court without a jury in November, 1903. The court found that the plaintiff was not, and had never been, the owner, or entitled to the possession, of any part of the property described in his complaint, and that the defendant was the owner and entitled to the possession of all the property described in his answer. Judgment was entered accordingly in favor of the defendant for his costs. The appeal of plaintiff is from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

Aside from one specification of error in the ruling of the court upon an objection to a question asked defendant on his cross-examination, the only point urged by appellant in support of his appeal is that the findings are contrary to the evidence in this: that the evidence showed a valid location of one of his claims (the Emerald) prior to any application for a patent for either of defendant's placer claims, and because all of his other claims, though located subsequent to the applications for the placer patents, were of mineral veins known to exist by the placer claimants prior to the date of their said applications, but not mentioned therein or in the patents, and which, therefore, remained open to appropriation by any qualified locator. This question of the right to locate a lode claim within the surface lines of a patented placer claim has been very fully argued by counsel for the respective parties, but it is extremely doubtful whether, in view of the evidence contained in the record, a decision upon the point is necessary to a final disposition of the case. For it does not appear that the first finding of the court to the effect that the plaintiff was not the owner of any interest in any of the claims described in his complaint was based upon the view that they were invalid only because the attempted locations were within the boundaries of the placer patents, and upon veins the existence of which was unknown at the time the patents were applied for. It may be that the court deemed the evidence offered by plaintiff insufficient to establish the validity of any of his alleged claims, irrespective of the objections based upon their conflict with the placer patents. As to the Emerald claim, the alleged location of which antedated the applications for patents, this must have been the ground of the decision, as it may have been with respect to the others, and, therefore, we have first to consider whether we should be warranted in holding that the evidence was such as to require a finding by the trial judge that the Emerald, or any of the other alleged claims, was valid in itself as a location, and whether the plaintiff made satisfactory proof that he was, when he commenced this action, even in the peaceable possession of any of the ground in controversy. It appears from the evidence that the Carson Hill and Blue Mountain placer claims are situated in what is known as the "Madame Felix Mining District" in Calaveras county and not far from Copperopolis, where active mining has been carried on for many years; that within the limits and in the neighborhood of those claims are numerous small veins or seams of quartz carrying an extremely small percentage of gold where not entirely barren. These little veins crop out at a number of places, and their existence has long been generally known. It was shown that as long ago as 1879 there were old prospecting shafts on some of these veins, which had remained untouched from that date until the date of the trial, from which it may be inferred that various lode claims had been located, prospected, and abandoned within and near these placer claims prior to the attempted location of the Emerald in June, 1890. A notice of this claim was recorded on the 18th of that month by one Kennedy in pursuance of a special act of the Legislature applicable to Calaveras county, requiring all notices of mining locations to be recorded in the county recorder's office. St. 1875-76, p. 853, c. 562. But this notice was invalid under the act of Congress (Rev. St. § 2324 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1426]), for the reason that it contained no description of the claim by reference to any natural object or permanent monument by which it might be identified. And, besides, if it had contained every essential requisite of a location notice, the copy of the record would have proved nothing except the bare fact that such a notice had been recorded. It would not have proved that it was posted on the claim, or that the location was so marked on the ground that its boundaries could be readily traced, or that they included the apex of a lode, or any valuable mineral deposit in place, or that the necessary work had been done to keep the claim good. Every one of these things, with the possible exception of the posting of the notice, was essential to the validity of the claim, but it is difficult to find in the record any satisfactory evidence upon a single point. Kennedy was himself a witness, but he only testified that he had prospected "all these claims and found gold-bearing quartz," and that when he was working on the Emerald prior to the application for the placer patents, October 22, 1892, the defendant would come to his claim to inquire as to his prospects and get him to pan out some dirt, and when he did so "allowed he had as good a prospect as was on the hill." This is in substance the whole of his testimony as to his own claim. One of the other witnessses, Womble, testified generally that all of the claims in controversy that had been located prior to 1894 (which would include the Emerald) were so marked by mounds that he and a surveyor had no difficulty in finding the corners of the claims. He also testified that a man named Watson worked on the Emerald in 1893, and that Kennedy sunk a shaft on it in 1894. This is all the testimony I can find in the record bearing on the validity of the Emerald claim, and it is clearly insufficient to show that it was of any validity whatever at the commencement of this action. Aside from other objections there is no evidence that $100 worth of work was done on the claim in any year after its attempted location, and there is no evidence that any work has ever been done on it since the year 1894, or that either Kennedy or the plaintiff was in actual possession of the claim or of any part of it when this action was commenced.

All the other claims of plaintiff are of a date subsequent to the 22d of October, 1892, when the placer patents were applied for.

The notices were recorded and purport to have been posted as follows: Santa Cruz in July, 1893; Buena Vista in October, 1893; Democrat in October, 1894; Dandy in January, 1897; Cape Horn in January, 1899; Big Bonanza in January, 1900; Dead Men's Spring in January, 1900; Duplex in January, 1900. Several of these claims are relocations of old and abandoned claims. The Democrat was originally the Dead Cow, and by that name was prospected and abandoned, apparently, by the defendant prior to October, 1892. The Dandy was formerly the Bald Eagle. The Cape Horn was another of the defendant's old and abandoned locations. The Duplex was formerly the Opranso. There is no evidence of sufficient work to keep good a single one of these claims, and no evidence of actual possession of any part of any of them by plaintiff or a co-tenant at the commencement of this action, and as to those located subsequent to 1894 there is no evidence of a proper marking of the locations by visible monuments on the ground. There is no evidence of the existence within the described boundaries of any of them of a vein or deposit of ore of any practical value. Kennedy, it is true, testifies that he found gold-bearing quartz in all of them, but this would be true although none of the quartz carried gold enough to pay the cost of extraction or the cost of reduction. On the other hand, a witness for defendant, E. Boggs, a miner and practical assayer, testifies that in 1888 or 1889 he spent 10 days prospecting in the neighborhood of the claim then owned by the defendant and called the Dead Cow (now the Democrat) and could find no one that would assay $1 a ton—the best came from the Dead Cow and assayed only 80 cents. From the positive testimony of this witness, from the silence of plaintiff's witnesses as to the quality of the ore found in the small veins of quartz appearing within the limits of the placer patents, from the failure to prove assessment work on any of plaintiff's claims, and from the general agreement of all the testimony in the case that, although the ground covered by these claims lies within a short distance from a busy mining camp, and has been prospected for more than 30 years, during which time many claims have been located and abandoned after the usual tests by the sinking of shafts, etc., the court was entirely justified in concluding, if it did so conclude, that there was no vein or deposit of ore within any one of the claims dsecribed in the complaint of sufficient value or promise to justify its location as a lode claim, and, further, to conclude that the failure to prove that the work required by the act of Congress had been done on the claims was due to the fact that such work had not been done and that the claims, if ever valid, had been abandoned before the action was commenced. If the finding of the court against plaintiff's claim of ownership had no other support, it would be presumed that it was based upon this view, and we should be compelled to sustain it for the reasons stated. And this finding fully supports the judgment of dismissal, and is unaffected by the ruling of the court restricting the cross-examination of the defendant above referred to.

But if it were conceded that, as to one or more of the eight claims of plaintiff attempted to be located subsequent to the applications of the placer patents, there was satisfactory and uncontradicted evidence of full compliance with the federal statutes and local regulations governing the location and working of mining claims, this finding of the court would, even in that case, have abundant evidence to support it. The issuance by the government of its patents for the Carson Hill and Blue Mountain claims to the grantors of defendant is conclusive evidence in this proceeding that the land patented is placer ground, and that defendant, from the date of the applications for patents, has been the owner of everything within its surface boundaries excepting only such veins of ore or mineral deposits in place as were known to exist at the date of such applications, subject of course to the right of owners of exterior lode claims to follow their veins on the dip under the surface. As to the agricultural lands described in the answer, and which are held under homestead patents, defendant is the absolute owner under a title long antedating the location of any of plaintiff's claims, and, as far as they may conflict with those lands, there can be, and in fact is, no controversy. The sole question, therefore, with respect to those claims of plaintiff which are here assumed to have been regularly located and perfected subsequent to the 22d of October, 1892, is whether there was uncontradicted evidence from which the court should have found that they cover veins or mineral deposits in place which, within the meaning of section 2333 of the Revised Statutes [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1433], were known to exist at that date.

The Revised Statutes of the United States (section 2319 et seq. [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1424]) provide for the disposition alike of lodes or veins, and of placer deposits. The price of lode claims is $5 per acre of the surface while that of placer claims is only $2.50. It is therefore a fraud for a person cognizant of the existence of a vein of apparent value to attempt to acquire the title by means of a placer location and patent. It is accordingly provided by section 2333 that "where the same person, association, or corporation is in possession of a placer claim, and also a vein or lode included within the boundaries thereof, application shall be made for a patent for the placer claim with the statement that it includes such vein or lode, and in such case a patent shall issue for the placer claim, subject to the provisions of this chapter, including such vein or lode, upon the payment of five dollars per acre for such vein or lode claim, and twenty-five feet of surface on each side thereof. The remainder of the placer claim, or any placer claim not embracing any vein or lode claim, shall be paid for at the rate of two dollars and fifty cents per acre, together with all costs of proceedings; and where a vein or lode, such as is described in section twenty-three hundred and twenty, is known to exist within the boundaries of a placer claim, an application for a patent for such placer claim which does not include an application for the vein or lode claim shall be construed as a conclusive declaration that the claimant of the placer claim has no right of possession of the vein or lode claim; but where the existence of a vein or lode in a placer claim is not known a patent for the placer claim shall convey all the valuable mineral and other deposits within the boundaries thereof." The patents for the Carson Hill and Blue Mountain claims contain express reservations in conformity with these provisions, as follows: "(1) That the grant hereby made is restricted in its exterior limits to the boundaries of the said mining premises, and to any veins or lodes of quartz or other rock in place bearing gold, silver, cinnabar, lead, tin, copper, or other valuable deposits, which may have been discovered within said limits subsequent to and which were not known to exist on the 22d day of October, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and ninety-two. (2) That should any vein or lode of quartz or other rock in place bearing gold, silver, cinnabar, lead, tin, copper, or other valuable deposits be claimed or known to exist within the above-described premises at said last-named date, the same is expressly excepted and excluded from these presents." There are other reservations in the patents, but they are immaterial to the present discussion.

The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and of other courts of high authority, both state and federal, have settled the construction of this provision of the Revised Statutes, and of these reservations in placer patents as applied to a great variety of cases, and especially as they apply to this case. A vein known to exist within the boundaries of a placer claim at the date of the application for patent, and not included in the application, may be located by an adverse claimant after the issuance of the patent, and a vein is known to exist within the meaning of the statute (1) when it is known to the placer claimant; (2) when its existence is generally known; (3) when any examination of the ground sufficient to enable the placer claimant to make oath that it is subject to location, as such would necessarily disclose the existence of the vein. Iron S. M. Co. v. Mike & Star Co., 143 U. S. 403, 12 Sup. Ct. 543, 36 L. Ed. 201; Lindley on Mines, § 781 and cases cited. In this case it does appear that the Emerald, the Dead Cow (now the Democrat), the Cape Horn, and perhaps other veins, were known to the defendant several years before his grantors applied for the placer patents. It is reasonably certain that their existence was, prior to that date, generally known, and known to defendant's grantors. On this point we think the plaintiff's case was clearly proved, and without substantial conflict in the testimony. But upon another point essential to his case there was a failure of proof. A quartz vein which contains so small a percentage of gold, silver, etc., as to be of no value for mining purposes is not a known vein within the meaning of the law, and whether it is of any practical value is always a question for the jury (or in the absence of a jury for the court). Iron S. M. Co. v. Mike & Star, supra; Migeon v. Montana Cent. Ry. Co., 77 Fed. 249, 23 C. C. A. 156, and cases therein cited. In this case there was not only a failure on the part of plaintiff to prove that any of the veins claimed by him could ever be expected to pay the cost of extracting the ore, but there was, on the contrary, a preponderance of evidence that, at the date of the application for the placer patents, they were generally regarded as valueless, and have since proven to be so. Upon this ground, therefore, if upon no other, the finding against plaintiff's claim of ownership is clearly supported by the evidence.

The questions asked by plaintiff's attorney on cross-examination of defendant, to which objections were sustained by the court, were clearly not proper as cross-examination, and the ruling of the court was correct. The real complaint of the plaintiff respecting this matter seems to be that he was not allowed to make the defendant his own witness. This the court had the right, in its discretion, to allow or to refuse, and we think its discretion was not abused in refusing to hear further evidence on the point to which the questions were directed. They related exclusively to defendant's knowledge of the existence of quartz veins within the boundaries of the placer claims prior to the application for patents. That fact had already been satisfactorily shown, but was immaterial for two reasons: First, because it was not his knowledge, but that of his grantors, and of the miners generally, that was important; and, second, because it had been shown that the veins were of no value, and not within the meaning of the law.

The judgment and order of the superior court are affirmed.

CRISMAN et al. v. LANTERMAN et al.

(L. A. 1,635.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 30, 1906.)

1. MORTGAGES—REMEDIES OF MORTGAGEE—EFFECT OF RELEASE OF MORTGAGE.

A mortgagee who releases the mortgage to a grantee of the mortgagor, without the latter's consent, cannot hold such mortgagor personally liable for the debt.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 35, Cent. Dig. Mortgages, § 761.]

2. SAME—MERGER OF SECURITIES—INTENTION OF PARTIES.

Whether a mortgage is merged and extinguished by the subsequent execution of a deed of trust on the property to the mortgagee securing the same with other indebtedness depends on the intention of the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 35, Cent. Dig. Mortgages, § 897.]

3. SAME.

A grantee of mortgaged property executed a deed of trust thereon to the mortgagee, to secure the mortgage debt and other unsecured indebtedness, which recited that it was given "for the purpose of further securing any of said promissory notes which may now be secured by any mortgage," and provided that in case a sale thereunder should not realize sufficient to pay the entire indebtedness the creditors should "retain, have, and possess the same remedies to enforce the payment of said promissory notes or any of them which they would have or possess if this deed of trust had not been executed." The mortgagor whose note was secured by the mortgage consented to the giving of said deed. Held, that the mortgage was not merged in such trust deed, and that the right of the mortgagor to have the proceeds of the property applied to the payment of her note was not affected thereby.

4. TRIAL — FINDING OF FACTS — EFFECT OF STIPULATION OF FACTS.

Where a cause is tried to the court on a stipulation as to the facts in detail, but not embracing an ultimate fact in issue, it is the duty of the court to find such fact if it may be inferred from the stipulated facts, and such a finding is entitled to the same weight as one based on conflicting evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, § 880.]

5. EXECUTORS — ESTOPPEL — MORTGAGE — RELEASE.

Defendant's testatrix executed a mortgage securing her note, and afterward gave to the mortgagee other notes signed also by her son and one by defendant, who was her husband, and afterward her executor. She subsequently conveyed the mortgaged property to the son, who, with her consent, executed a trust deed thereon to the mortgagee as additional security and securing all of the notes. After her death the property was sold under the trust deed free of incumbrance, and the purchase money was paid only on the execution of a release of the original mortgage and a certificate from an abstract company that the property was free of incumbrance. Defendant attended the sale, made no objection to the terms, and demanded that the proceeds be applied first to payment of the later notes, but in this he acted individually, and not as executor. The money was so applied, leaving a balance due on the note of testatrix. Held, that the acquiescence and acts of defendant did not estop him as executor from defending against an action to charge the estate with liability for such balance on the ground that it was released by the failure to apply the proceeds of the sale thereon or by the release of the mortgage.

6. SAME.

A mortgagee who subsequently took a trust deed on the same property from a grantee of the mortgagor, securing the same and a further indebtedness, and sold the property thereunder free of incumbrance, releasing the mortgage, and realizing a sum sufficient to pay the mortgage debt but a part of which was applied to the other indebtedness, is estopped as against the purchaser from asserting the invalidity of the release, and, having no right to enforce the mortgage, cannot make it the basis of an action against the mortgagor to recover a deficiency judgment.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by Albert J. Crisman and Dwight N. Lowell, executors, against J. L. Lanterman, executor, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Frank G. Finlayson, for appellants. M. W. Conkling and Chas. T. Howland, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. On June 18, 1895, Ammoretta J. Lanterman made her promissory note for $5,000, payable to Frederick S. Crisman or order, on or before 10 years after date. With the note, and as security for it, she delivered to Crisman a mortgage of the south 80 acres of lot 9 of the Rancho La Canada, in Los Angeles county, and certain shares of stock in a water company. The property mortgaged stood of record in the name of Ammoretta J. Lanterman, but, in fact, it belonged to Roy S. Lanterman, her son, and the note and mortgage were given in consideration of a loan of $5.000 by Frederick S. Crisman to Roy S. Lanterman. These facts were known to the lender. In 1900 Ammoretta J. conveyed to Roy S. Lanterman the mortgaged property. In the meanwhile three other notes had been made by members of the Lanterman family to Crisman, to wit: A note for $1,000, dated January 6, 1896, payable on or before eight years after date; a note for $500, dated March 20, 1896, payable on or before eight years after date; and a note for $2,800, dated July 1, 1896, payable on or before six years after date. All three of these notes were signed by Ammoretta J. and Roy S. Lanterman, and the last, the one for $2,800, bore, in addition, the signature of J. L. Lanterman, the husband of Ammoretta. In October, 1900, Frederick S. Crisman died, leaving a will by which Albert J. Crisman and Dwight N. Lowell were named executors. The will was duly proved, and letters testamentary issued. On August 1, 1902, all of the principal of said four notes and some of the interest being unpaid, Roy S. Lanterman made a deed of trust to Albert J. Crisman, as trustee, whereby, as security for these notes, he conveyed to said Crisman lot 9 of the Rancho La Canada, with the shares of water stock above mentioned. The property described included that which was covered by the mortgage given in 1895. The deed of trust, in which the grantor and his wife were described as parties of the first part, Albert J. Crisman as party of the second part, and the executors of Frederick S. Crisman's will as parties of the third part, provided for the sale of the property by the second party, in the event that any of the notes remained unpaid on the 1st day of May, 1903. In addition to the ordinary provisions of deeds of trust to secure indebtedness, the instrument contained certain recitals and provisions which will be referred to hereafter. The deed of trust was accompanied by a written consent to its execution, signed by Ammoretta J. Lanterman and her husband. In May, 1903, no payments having been made on account of either principal or interest since the making of the deed of trust, the trustee gave the required notice of sale to be had on June 2, 1903. Prior to this time, Ammoretta J. Lanterman had died testate, and her husband had been appointed executor of her will. At the time and place fixed, the trustee offered the property for sale. J. L. Lanterman was present, as was Frank D. Lanterman, one of his sons, together with M. W. Conkling, who was the attorney for the executor of Ammoretta's will and also for Frank D. Before calling for bids, the trustee read the published notice of sale, and a "statement of conditions of sale." The notice made no reference to any mortgage or other incumbrance, but the statement of conditions declared, among other things, that a deposit must be made by the successful bidder, and that the balance of the purchase price would be payable "as soon as the Title Insurance & Trust Company can certify that the title is in the successful purchaser, free and clear of all incumbrances." These papers having been read in the hearing of J. L. Lanterman and M. W. Conkling, neither of whom made any objection or said anything regarding the conditions of sale, J. L. Lanterman, by Mr. Conkling, stated that he would require the proceeds of the sale to be applied. First, upon the $2,800 note; second, upon the $500 note; third, upon the $1,000 note; and, lastly, upon the $5,000 note of June 18, 1895, executed by Ammoretta J. Lanterman alone. Thereupon the property was offered and struck off to Frank D. Lanterman for $10,000, that being the highest bid. The required deposit was made, and some two weeks later, Albert J. Crisman, as executor, acting under an order of court, executed a release of the mortgage of June 18, 1895. The deed was delivered to the purchaser, and the balance of the purchase money paid to the trustee, who applied it to the payment of the four notes in the order in which the application had been demanded. Thereby the three smaller notes were paid, and there remained a sum for application upon the principal and interest of the $5,000 note sufficient to reduce the unpaid part of such note to $2,274.41. For this amount the executors of Frederick S. Crisman's will presented a claim (as upon a note secured by mortgage) to Ammoretta J. Lanterman's executor. The claim having been rejected, this action, in form one to foreclose a mortgage, was commenced. Separate answers were filed, the defendants relying, in substance, upon the release of the mortgage as a defense. The case was presented to the superior court upon an agreed statement of facts, and judgment went for the defendants. The plaintiffs' appeal.

While the complaint is in the familiar form used in actions for the foreclosure of mortgages, the plaintiffs' theory really is that there is no mortgage to foreclose, and that they are entitled to a money judgment against Ammoretta's estate, payable in due course of administration. They concede, in effect, that if, at the time of the trustee's sale, the $5,000 note was secured by a subsisting mortgage on property which had been conveyed by the mortgagor, and, if the mortgagee, without the consent of such mortgagor (or her executor), gave to the owner of the land a valid release of the mortgage, they, as payees of the note, could not hold the mortgagor (or her estate) to a personal liability thereon. And this conclusion is, of course, inevitable under our statutory system of enforcing the payment of obligations secured by mortgage, as construed by this court. While a mortgage creates merely a lien as security for the debt, the Code provides that there can be but one action for the recovery of a debt so secured. Code Civ. Proc. § 726. By the judgment in such action, the land is subjected to a sale for the purpose of satisfying the plaintiff's demand, and if the proceeds be insufficient a judgment for the balance is then docketed against the defendants personally liable for the debt. Until there shall be a deficiency on such sale, there can be no personal judgment against the mortgagor, who is entitled to have his debt paid out of the land so far as the proceeds realized on foreclosure sale may render payment possible. The land is thus made primarily liable for the payment of the obligation, and the mortgagor can be called on to pay only where the proceeds of a sale of the land are insufficient. He is, therefore, entitled to insist that the mortgagee shall not, by releasing the land, which should be made to pay the debt, throw upon him a personal liability therefor. Bartlett v. Cottle, 63 Cal. 366; Biddel v. Brizzolara, 64 Cal. 354, 362, 30 Pac. 609; Bull v. Coe, 77 Cal. 54, 18 Pac. 808, 11 Am. St. Rep. 235; Porter v. Muller, 65 Cal. 512, 4 Pac. 531; Barbieri v. Ramelli, 84 Cal. 154, 23 Pac. 1086; McKean v. German American Savings Bank, 118 Cal. 334, 50 Pac. 656; Woodward v. Brown, 119 Cal. 283, 51 Pac. 2, 542, 63 Am. St. Rep. 108. Recognizing these well-settled rules, the appellants deny their applicability here by contending: First, that by the execution of the trust deed, the mortgage became merged in the new security with the consent of the mortgagor, so that the debt thereafter was not one secured by mortgage; second, that even if the mortgage survived the making of the trust deed, the estate of Ammoretta J. Lanterman consented, at the trustee's sale, to the release of the mortgage given, or (which would amount to the same thing) such estate is, by the conduct of the executor at the time of the sale, estopped to deny that it consented to the release. And, finally, if the court should be against the appellants on both these points, they urge, third, that the purported release of mortgage was (for reasons which will appear hereafter) void and of no effect, and therefore cannot destroy their right to a judgment, which, under this view, should be one foreclosing the mortgage. If any one of these propositions be sound, it destroys the effect of the contention that Ammoretta, as a mortgagor, is relieved by the release of the land from the lien of the mortgage. And it may be remarked incidentally that any of these positions, if it be well taken, is equally fatal to the respondents' contention (which appears to have been adopted by the learned judge of the trial court) that, under all the circumstances, Roy became, in equity, the principal on the mortgage debt sued on, and Ammoretta a surety, and that the estate of the latter was exonerated by the release of the mortgage without Roy's consent, and the consequent release of Roy, the principal debtor. For, if there was no mortgage after the deed of trust was given, Roy could not, nor could his surety, be affected by a paper purporting to release it; if the release was with the consent of the surety, it would not relieve such surety from liability; and, lastly, if there was no valid release, neither principal nor surety has ground for complaint. It is unnecessary, therefore, to decide the question, which is fully argued in the briefs, as to whether Ammoretta was, as to the Crisman estate, a principal debtor or a surety. Whether she was the one or the other, her estate is liable unless there was a subsisting mortgage which was released as to the owner of the land without her consent or that of her executor.

First. Did the execution of the deed of trust with the consent of Ammoretta supersede the mortgage? The appellants' contention is that the trust deed, being given to secure (with other notes) the same obligation secured by the mortgage, and furnishing, as security, the same property described in the mortgage, in favor of the same obligees, it must be assumed that the intention of the parties (including Ammoretta, who consented to the trust deed) was to substitute a new security, to wit, that of the deed of trust, for the existing security of the mortgage. If that be so, the mortgage was, in effect, then released by mutual consent, and the subsequent formal release, following the trustee's sale, was a vain and idle act, not affecting the substantial rights of any of the parties. Whether the execution of the deed of trust accomplished such a merger of the mortgage, or, as it may be termed, a novation of securities, is a question of the intention of the parties, to be derived from their acts. It is not, in a legal sense, impossible for a mortgage to continue to exist, where there has been given to the mortgagee a further security on the same land for the same debt. It is argued that such situation may produce anomalous results, as, for example, if, by a sale under the junior security, the title to the land should become vested in the holder of the prior mortgage. But this might happen in any case where a deed of trust is given on land subject to an existing mortgage, and, even where the legal title becomes vested in the mortgagee, equity will sometimes, to avoid injustice, treat the mortgage as alive in determining the rights of the parties. The language of the deed of trust here in question would seem to indicate an intention that the mortgage should continue to exist. The instrument first recites that Roy S. Lanterman had borrowed from Frederick Crisman the sums represented by the four promissory notes above mentioned (including the $5,000 note signed by Ammoretta), that the parties have agreed that all the notes shall be deemed to have matured on May 1, 1903, and that Roy agrees to pay all of the notes, whether executed by him or not, and then grants the lot 9 of the Rancho La Canada, in consideration of the indebtedness, "and for the purpose of further securing any of said promissory notes which may now be secured by any mortgage * * * etc." The instrument contains, in addition, the provisions relative to reconveyance or sale which are customary in deeds of this character, and provides that in case of a sale which shall not realize sufficient to pay the entire indebtedness, "the said parties of the third part shall retain, have and possess the same remedies to enforce the payment of said promissory notes, or any of them, which they would have or possess if this deed of trust had not been executed." The clauses quoted certainly indicate that it was not the intention of the parties to have the new security supplant the old. It is described as "further security," which, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, means additional, not substituted, or superior, security; and, besides, the executors retain all the remedies they had before, one of which was to foreclose the mortgage on the $5,000 note. The argument that the parties would not be likely to intend to contract for two forced sales of the same property to satisfy (in part) the same debt does not seem to us a sufficient ground for disregarding any of the express provisions of their agreement. We think that even if the deed of trust had been made by Ammoretta, the mortgagor, herself, it should not be construed as accomplishing a merger of the mortgage. And, when we consider the terms of her consent to the deed, the conclusion that there was no substitution is strengthened. She signed a writing, which provided that "said trust deed shall not be deemed to in any manner whatsoever affect or waive any rights which the * * * estate of F. S. Crisman, deceased, may now or hereafter have against the undersigned * * * upon or by reason of the said promissory notes or any of them. * * *" This consent was intended to waive any defense which might be claimed to have accrued to Ammoretta on any of her notes by reason of the execution of the deed. But it was not intended to give new and greater rights against her. If the mortgage should be regarded as merged, her liability on her $5,000 note, which originally was merely "contingent on the fact that a sale of the mortgaged premises shall satisfy the debt and costs" (Biddel v. Brizzolara, supra), would be converted into a liability, which might be enforced (as it is sought to be enforced here) after the security had been applied to other debts, or, perhaps, without any recourse to the security at all. See Herbert Kraft Company v. Bryan, 140 Cal. 73, 73 Pac. 745.

Second. Did the estate of Ammoretta J. Lanterman consent to the release of the mortgage? The answer to this question, depends largely upon the effect that is to be given to the findings of fact made by the trial court. Among them is a finding that the plaintiffs released the mortgage "without the consent of * * * the estate of Ammoretta J. Lanterman." As has been stated, the cause was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, and it is claimed by the appellants that where the facts are agreed, no findings are necessary, and that, if findings are made, they are entitled to no weight. There have been several rulings by this court to the effect that the want of findings affords no ground for reversing a judgment where the facts have been agreed upon. Gregory v. Gregory, 102 Cal. 50, 36 Pac. 364; Muller v. Rowell, 110 Cal. 318, 42 Pac. 804. But here the facts embraced in the stipulation were not the ultimate facts put in issue by the pleadings, but were (as to the question of consent) a recital of the circumstances surrounding the sale, from which the ultimate fact of consent is, as is claimed, inferable. If those circumstances would support an inference either way, it was not only proper but necessary that the trial court should make a finding of the ultimate fact. Such finding when made is entitled to the same weight as any other finding on conflicting evidence, and will not be overthrown unless the facts stipulated cannot by any reasonable inference support the conclusion reached by the trial court. The cases relied on by appellants as establishing the rule that no presumptions will be indulged in favor of the findings where all the evidence before the trial court was written (Wilson v. Cross, 33 Cal. 60; Lander v. Beers, 48 Cal. 546) are not in harmony with later decisions. Reay v. Butler, 95 Cal. 206, 30 Pac. 208; Priest v. Brown, 100 Cal. 626, 35 Pac. 323; Sheehan v. Osborn, 138 Cal. 515, 71 Pac. 622. In the case at bar, the appellants rely upon the conduct of J. L. Lanterman at the trustee's sale as constituting consent by the estate of Ammoretta, or an estoppel to deny consent. One element of such conduct consisted of his failure to object when the trustee read the conditions, showing that the title would be certified to the purchaser free and clear of incumbrances. So far as this silence is concerned, we do not see that it conclusively established an estoppel. No doubt there are cases in which mere silence may work an estoppel. But to effect this, it is essential: First, that the party against whom the estoppel is invoked has stood by and seen the other party committing an act infringing upon his rights; and second, that his failure to speak has induced the person committing the act to believe that he assents to its being committed. De Bussche v. Alt, 8 Chan. Div. 286; Carpy v. Dowdell, 115 Cal. 677, 47 Pac. 695. Here the proposed sale, free of incumbrance, in no way infringed upon the rights of the estate represented by J. L. Lanterman (even if we assume that he attended the sale in his representative capacity). The release of the mortgage by the voluntary act of the mortgagee would not injure the estate, but would benefit it by relieving it of personal liability for the debt. Nor did his nonaction in any way mislead the plaintiffs or induce them to believe that the estate of Ammoretta consented to be held liable on the $5,000 note without foreclosure of the mortgage. The facts were as well known to plaintiffs as to Lanterman. He had no reason to suppose that they, represented at the sale, as they were, by counsel, were ignorant of the legal effect of their proposed conduct, and was under no duty to warn them that a release of a mortgage without the consent of the mortgagor relieved such mortgagor from personal liability. And the request or demand for the application of the proceeds does not raise a necessary inference that J. L. Lanterman, as executor, consented to the release of the mortgage, or that his testatrix's estate was estopped to deny consent. The demand was that the proceeds be applied to the payment of the smaller notes before the payment of the $5,000 mortgage note. The interests of the estate, as mortgagor, required either that the mortgage, which made the estate's liability contingent on a foreclosure sale, should remain, or that, if the mortgage was to be released, the proceeds of the sale should be applied first to the satisfaction of the mortgage debt. Considered by itself, then, the demand that the $5,000 note be paid last, would imply, not a consent by Ammoretta's estate that the land be sold free from the mortgage, but rather a requirement that the mortgage lien remain for the protection of the estate. Furthermore, J. L. Lanterman did not state that he was acting as executor in attending the sale. As co-maker of one of the notes secured by the mortgage, he had an individual interest in the proceeding. And, in demanding that the proceeds of the sale be applied first to the satisfaction of his own debt, and last to that of the debt which, for the benefit of the estate, should have been paid first, it may well be said that he was acting in his individual, not in his representative, capacity. The trial court, by its finding as to consent, took this view, which finds additional support from the fact, stipulated in the record, that J. L. Lanterman would, if present, testify that he was acting for himself, and not for the estate. The fact that his demand included the application of the proceeds of the sale of two notes in which he was not individually interested is entitled to some weight, but is not sufficient, in itself, to overthrow the finding that the estate did not consent to the release of the mortgage.

Third. Was there a valid release of the mortgage? The instrument executed by the plaintiffs, so far as is material to the present inquiry, reads as follows: "Without in any manner waiving the right of the said executors of the estate of Frederick S. Crisman, deceased, to recover from the said estate of Ammoretta J. Lanterman, deceased, the balance of the principal and interest unpaid upon the said promissory note for $5,000; expressly reserving unto said estate of Frederick S. Crisman * * * all the rights now possessed by said estate * * * to recover and receive from the estate of said Ammoretta J. Lanterman, deceased * * * the unpaid balance of the principal and interest of said promissory note for $5,000, the undersigned * * * does hereby remise, release, relinquish and discharge from the said mortgage and from the lien thereof all the lands in said deed of trust described," etc. The contention of plaintiffs is that, if the mortgage lien still existed, it could not be released without releasing Ammoretta's estate, and that, therefore, a reservation of rights against said estate prevented the release from operating at all. We agree that there could not be a release of the lien of the mortgage as to her and a retention of the right to sue the mortgagor (unless she consented), but the conclusion that the release fails does not follow. Whatever might be the proper construction of the instrument, considered by itself, the circumstances under which it was given estop the plaintiffs, as against the defendant Frank D. Lanterman, to deny that the mortgage was released. The property was sold to him free of incumbrances, and he bid $10,000 upon the understanding that the balance of the purchase price beyond the deposit paid at the sale was to be paid upon a certificate being made by the abstract company that there was no incumbrance. The executors obtained an order of court authorizing them to release this mortgage, and delivered the document in question to the abstract company for the purpose of completing the sale. The abstract company gave the purchaser the certificate agreed upon, and paid the purchase price, previously deposited with it by him, to the trustee, who applied it on the indebtedness secured by the deed of trust. Such application paid in part the $5,000 note now sued on, and the plaintiffs recognize such payment in their complaint. They cannot be permitted to retain the purchaser's money, and still claim, as against him, that the mortgage, the release of which was a part of the consideration, still subsists as a lien upon his land. And, if the mortgage cannot be enforced as against the owner of the land, it cannot, for the reasons hereinbefore stated, be the foundation of an action against the original mortgagor. The plaintiffs contend that, as executors, they had no power to release the mortgage except upon full satisfaction of the debt. But a sum was realized sufficient to satisfy the mortgage, and if a full satisfaction was necessary to authorize the release which had been agreed upon, the purchase price should, so far as affects the purchaser's rights, be deemed to have been so applied. The fact that J. L. Lanterman and the trustee agreed upon a different application cannot bind Frank. This not being a voluntary payment, neither the debtor nor the creditor had any right to direct the application of the proceeds. The application is to be made by the court according to the equities of the case. Orleans Co. Nat Bank v. Moore, 112 N. Y. 543, 20 N. E. 357, 3 L. R. A. 302, 8 Am. St. Rep. 775; Blackstone Bank v. Hill, 10 Pick. (Mass.) 129; Murdock v. Clarke, 88 Cal. 384, 26 Pac. 601. Without undertaking to review the many decisions, not all in harmony, upon the proper application of funds derived from forced sales, we think it sufficient to say that, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, the equities, as between the estate of F. S. Crisman and Frank D. Lanterman, required the amount paid by the latter to be applied to the satisfaction of the mortgage debt, if such satisfaction was essential to a valid release of the mortgage.

From these views, it follows that judgment was properly entered in favor of defendants.

The judgment is affirmed.

WADLEIGH et al. v. PHELPS. (Sac. 1,316.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 30, 1906. Rehearing Denied Sept. 28, 1906.)

1. EQUITY—BILL—LACHES—DEMURRER.

The defense of laches may be taken advantage of by demurrer to a bill for want of facts, where laches is apparent on the face of the bill.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 19, Cent. Dig. Equity, § 498.]

2. SAME—AMENDMENT.

Where plaintiff sued to have certain deeds, absolute in form, declared to be mortgages given to secure a note of $7,120 and interest, a trial amendment alleging that one of the deeds was given, not only as further security for such indebtedness, but also to secure a payment to the grantee of a further sum of $1,500 alleged to have been paid by the grantee to C., did not in any degree detract from the effect of complainants' original claim that the property was conveyed to the grantee to hold as security for the $7,120 note and interest.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 19, Cent. Dig. Equity, § 567.]

3. ACTION—JOINDER.

Where property belonging to W., and other property belonging to another, from whom plaintiff held an absolute power of attorney, was conveyed by separate absolute deeds to secure a single indebtedness from W. to the grantee, the latter not being compelled to accept a partial payment of his claim or to make a partial surrender of his securities, a single suit was maintainable to have all the conveyances declared to operate as mortgages, and for redemption.

4. MORTGAGES—ACTION TO REDEEM—PARTIES.

Where plaintiff and another, from whom he held an absolute power of attorney, conveyed property owned by them in severalty, by absolute deeds to secure plaintiff's debt to the grantee, plaintiff and his principal were entitled to join as parties plaintiff in a suit to have such conveyances declared mortgages and for redemption, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 347, providing that if there is more than one mortgagor or person claiming under him, some of whom are not entitled to maintain an action to redeem, any one of them who is entitled to maintain such action may redeem a divided or undivided part of the mortgaged premises, according to his interest, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 35, Cent. Dig. Mortgages, §§ 1825–1832.]

5. SAME—REVIEW—PRESUMPTION—EVIDENCE.

The rule that a deed absolute in form is presumed to be an absolute conveyance does not require that the evidence in the record, on appeal from a decree declaring certain absolute conveyances to be mortgages, must be entirely plain and convincing to the appellate court in order that the decree should be sustained.

6. ESCROWS—AGREEMENTS—MEMORANDUM.

An unsigned memorandum in the handwriting of the grantee, found among his personal effects after his death, wrapped about a quitclaim deed of certain property from himself and his wife to his grantor, and apparently designed to accompany a deposit of the deed in escrow and to serve as a memorandum of the terms and conditions on which it was to be delivered, which memorandum had never been brought to the attention of the grantees in the quitclaim deed and to which no assent had been given was ineffective as a written contract establishing the terms on which the property had been conveyed to decedent and was to be held by him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 19, Cent. Dig. Escrows, §§ 1–3.]

7. WITNESSES—TRANSACTION WITH DECEASED PERSON—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, provides that parties or assignors of parties to an action or proceeding against an executor or administrator on a claim or demand against the estate of a deceased person, cannot testify as to any fact occurring before the death of such deceased person. Held, that such section related only to actions on such claims against the decedent as might have been enforced against him in his lifetime by a personal action for the recovery of money, and on which a money judgment could have been recovered, and did not apply to a suit against a decedent's executrix to have certain absolute conveyances to him declared to operate as mortgages, and for a redemption.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, § 572.]

8. MORTGAGES—MORTGAGEE IN POSSESSION—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

Code Civ. Proc. § 346, declares that an action to redeem a mortgage of real property may be brought against the mortgagee in possession at any time unless the mortgagee has maintained adverse possession of the mortgaged premises for five years after breach of condition. Held, that, so long as a mortgagee in possession held by the consent of the mortgagor and by virtue of his agreement to apply the rents and profits to the indebtedness, his holding was not adverse.

9. SAME—DUTIES OF MORTGAGEE.

Where a mortgagee was let into possession of certain mining claims under the mortgage, and it was left optional with him to work the claims or not, and to make leases of portions thereof or not as he saw fit, he was bound, independent of agreement, to pay the expenses of the operation of the claims, and to apply any net profits to the mortgage indebtedness.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 35, Cent. Dig. Mortgages, §§ 498–502.]

10. TENDER—EFFECT—INTEREST.

Civ. Code, § 1504, declares that an offer of payment or other performance duly made, though the title to the thing offered be not transferred to the creditor, stops the running of interest, and section 1498 declares that when the debtor is entitled to the performance of a condition precedent to, or concurrent with, performance on his part, he may make his offer to depend on the due preformance of such conditions. Held, that where a grantor was entitled to a reconveyance of the property on payment of the debt to secure which it had been conveyed, a tender of the amount he claimed to be due "and any further sum of money due" conditioned on the delivery of a reconveyance, was effective to stop the running of interest.

11. MORTGAGES—ACCOUNTING.

Certain mining claims were conveyed to defendant's testator by a deed which was in fact a mortgage, under an agreement that he might operate the mines, paying the expenses from the proceeds and crediting the balance on the mortgage debt. He in fact contracted with M. to superintend and manage the mine under an agreement by which M. was required to look solely to the mining property for money expended and his salary. Held, that the amount due M. from the mine was no part of the indebtedness due testator from the mortgagors, though on redemption they might be required to accept the mining property charged with such claim for services.

12. EXECUTORS — CONVEYANCES OF LAND — STATUTES—APPLICATION.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1597, provides that when a person, who is bound by written contract to convey real estate, dies before making the conveyance, and in all cases when such decedent if living might be compelled to make such conveyance, the court may make a decree authorizing and directing his executor to convey the property to the person entitled thereto. Held, that such section was applicable only where deceased was bound by a written contract to convey, and had no reference to a suit to compel an executrix to reconvey certain property conveyed to her testator by absolute deeds, which were in fact mortgages.

13. EVIDENCE—LETTERS.

In a suit against an executrix to compel reconveyance of property conveyed to her testator by deeds absolute in form which were in fact mortgages, letters passing between defendant's testator and the grantor and answers thereto, relative to their respective rights in the property, were admissible as admissions.

14. MORTGAGES—MORTGAGEE IN POSSESSION—SERVICES.

A mortgagee in possession is not entitled to compensation for personal services on account of the mortgaged property.

15. TRIAL—OPINION—FINDINGS—COSTS.

Where the written opinion of the trial court provided that each party should pay his own costs, but the findings and decision recited that plaintiffs were entitled to recover against the defendant a judgment for costs in the action, etc., the findings and decision controlled the written opinion, and entitled plaintiffs to a judgment for costs.

16. MORTGAGES—REDEMPTION—AMOUNT DUE—INTEREST—TENDER.

Where, in a suit to have certain absolute conveyances declared to operate as mortgages only and for redemption, defendant denied plaintiff's claim, but was defeated, she was entitled to interest on the amount found due her less the costs awarded plaintiffs, from the date the judgment became final to such time as plaintiffs under the judgment tendered her the amount due, or, in the event no tender was made, until foreclosure sale, ordered in that event, had been made.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; F. T. Nilson, Judge.

Action by W. P. Wadleigh and others against Josephine A. Phelps, as executrix of the will of T. G. Phelps, deceased. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, she appeals. Affirmed.

See 82 Pac. 200.

Geo. F. Witter, for appellant. C. W. Cross, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from a judgment given in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to have certain deeds of conveyance, absolute in form, decreed to be in fact only mortgages, the amount due thereon ascertained, and conveyances of the property therein described ordered executed upon the payment of the amount adjudged due. Other appeals taken by defendant from certain orders made after judgment, including an order denying her motion for a new trial, have heretofore been dismissed, and still other appeals shown by the transcript have been held unnecessary and fruitless, in that they were from nonappealable orders reviewable on the appeal from the judgment. Wadleigh et al. v. Phelps, 147 Cal. 135, 81 Pac. 418.

The case made by the complaint as originally first amended, and upon which the case went to trial and was partially tried, was substantially as follows: On November 15, 1889, defendant's testator, T. G. Phelps, loaned $5,500 to plaintiff Wadleigh, who gave Phelps his note for the amount, payable six months after date, and bearing 9 per cent. interest. At the same time, as security for the payment thereof, Wadleigh and his wife gave Phelps a deed of conveyance of certain lots in San Francisco, Cal., and other property in the state of Washington. On August 1, 1890, Phelps loaned Wadleigh $1,000 more, which, with the $5,500 and interest, made his indebtedness $6,830, for which amount a new note, bearing interest at 9 per cent. per annum, and payable six months after date was given, and it was agreed that Phelps should continue to hold as security the title to the lands previously conveyed. On April 23, 1891, Phelps and Wadleigh sold two of the San Francisco lots for $2,500, $2,000 of which was credited on the note and $500 paid to Wadleigh. On November 13, 1894, there was due on said note $6,823, and Phelps claimed that Wadleigh owed him, for moneys expended, the further sum of $297, making a total of $7,120, for which amount a new note, bearing the same rate of interest, and due six months after date, was given by Wadleigh. On that date, Wadleigh was the duly appointed attorney in fact of plaintiff Anna F. Smith, and she, by her said attorney, executed to Phelps a deed of certain mining property in Nevada county of which she was the owner and holder of the legal title, but in which "said Wadleigh had an equitable estate and interest," and of which property she and Wadleigh were the owners. This conveyance was made as further security for the payment of the indebtedness evidenced by the note. After the execution of this note, it was agreed by said Wadleigh, Smith, and Phelps, that Phelps might work said mining claim and make temporary leases of portions thereof, and that the proceeds should be applied, first, to the payment of the actual costs and expenses of such operations, and the surplus toward the payment and satisfaction of the indebtedness due Phelps. In accord with this agreement, Phelps did work said mining claim and make leases of limited portions thereof, from which he received money which plaintiffs are entitled to have credited on the indebtedness. On April 14, 1899, Wadleigh and Phelps agreed in writing to the extension of the $7,120 note, for a period of two years from that date. Phelps died June 11, 1899. His will was admitted to probate July 13, 1899, and defendant was then appointed executrix. Since his death, said executrix has continued to work said mine, and make leases of portions thereof. Wadleigh did not know what amounts had been received by Phelps and his executrix on account thereof. He has demanded an accounting from the executrix, but the same was refused, the executrix claiming that all of the property conveyed belonged absolutely to Phelps. On April 18, 1901, Wadleigh tendered, and offered to pay, the full amount due, on condition that the executrix make good and sufficient deeds of reconveyance of the various properties conveyed as security, but the executrix refused to receive such tender or offer, except as an unconditional payment, claiming that neither Wadleigh nor Smith was entitled to the reconveyance of any property upon the payment of the indebtedness. This action was commenced February 8, 1902, in the superior court of Nevada county. Defendant filed her answer, in which she denied that any of the deeds executed by Wadleigh or Smith were given as mortgages, claiming that they were what they purported to be, viz., absolute conveyances.

Upon the issues thus made, the case came to trial. After the trial had proceeded for some five days, plaintiffs were permitted by the court to amend their complaint by alleging that the deed of Anna F. Smith was given, not only as further security for the payment of the $7,120 indebtedness evidenced by the note, but also as security for the payment to said Phelps of the further sum of $1,500 alleged to have been paid by said Phelps to one C. W. Cross. Defendant thereupon amended her answer, admitting the allegations of the complaint as to all the conveyances except that of the mining property, but denying that the conveyance of the mining property was a mortgage, and claiming that it was an absolute conveyance of the property to Phelps. She denied the allegation of due tender, and also set up various provisions of the statute of limitations. Upon the trial the question as to whether the deed of the mining property was intended as a deed absolute or as security, and the question of adverse possession by Phelps of such property, were submitted to a jury impaneled to advise the court, and both questions were answered in plaintiff's favor. The court adopted these findings of the jury, and found the facts to be in accord with the allegations of the amended complaint. According to these findings, there was due the estate of Phelps $11,112.03 on April 18, 1901, and it was adjudged that Wadleigh make payment thereof within 30 days after the judgment becomes final; that, upon his failure so to do, the property be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of the indebtedness; that, if such payment be made by Wadleigh as provided, said executrix shall make and deliver the necessary reconveyances; and that, if she fails to so do, a commissioner appointed by the court for that purpose execute such reconveyances. Plaintiffs were, by the judgment, awarded their costs. This somewhat elaborate statement as to the pleadings has been considered essential to a proper understanding of some of the many points made and strenuously relied on by defendant for a reversal.

1. A demurrer was interposed to the first amended complaint and this was overruled. It was stipulated that the same demurrer be considered as interposed to the complaint as amended upon the trial, and overruled. The principal contention made here as to the ruling on demurrer is that the complaint on its face showed that the cause of action therein set forth was barred by the laches of plaintiff and that the demurrer should, therefore, have been sustained upon the general ground stated therein that the complaint failed to state a cause of action. It is settled that the defense of laches may be set up in this way, where the laches is apparent on the face of the complaint, the condition then being that the complaint does not show equity, or, in other words, does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Kleinclaus v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 245, 250, 81 Pac. 516. But, while conceding the general principle to be as enunciated in the many decisions cited by the defendant upon the doctrine of laches, we are utterly unable to see any basis for the application of that doctrine, in the facts alleged in the complaint herein. There was absolutely nothing in the circumstances disclosed by this pleading tending to show any inexcusable delay on the part of plaintiffs in the commencement of proceedings to establish their claim, or any reason why it would be inequitable to then enter upon an inquiry as to the validity thereof. Whatever may be said as to the evidence, there was nothing in the facts alleged in the complaint to give the slightest intimation that Phelps ever did an act inconsistent with the theory that he held title to all the property involved, and held possession of the mining property, solely as security for an indebtedness of Wadleigh, the greater part of which, viz., the $7,120, was evidenced by the promissory note of November 13, 1894, and the time for payment of which, was only two months before Phelps' death, extended for a period of two years from April 14, 1899. There was nothing in the facts alleged to call for any assertion of their claims by plaintiffs prior to the death of Phelps and the maturity of the indebtedness. Immediately upon the expiration of the time of credit, plaintiffs offered payment and demanded a return of the property. A large portion of defendant's argument in support of the claim of laches is based upon the fact that it was not until the amendment made during the trial that plaintiffs made any allegation as to an alleged $1,500 indebtedness being also secured by the deeds. We cannot see that these allegations as to an additional indebtedness in any degree detracted from the effect of the original claim that the property was conveyed to Phelps and held by him as security for the $7,120 note and interest. That claim continued under the amended pleading, and the effect of the amendment was simply to show that there was still another item of indebtedness for which the property also stood as security, and which must be satisfied before a reconveyance could be had. We see nothing in the complaint upon which it can be held that defendant's general demurrer for want of facts should have been sustained on the ground of laches.

The demurrer also specified misjoinder of parties plaintiff, to wit, the joinder of Wadleigh with Mrs. Smith; and a misjoinder of causes of action, in that a cause of action in favor of Wadleigh was united with a cause of action of Mrs. Smith. The contention in this behalf is that, although all the property was mortgaged to secure the same indebtedness of Wadleigh to Phelps, Mrs. Smith was the only proper party plaintiff in an action to redeem as to her land, and Wadleigh was the only proper party plaintiff in an action to redeem as to his land, and that the so-called respective causes of action of these two parties could not be joined. There is no misjoinder of causes of action, for there is but a single cause of action stated. The effect of the various deeds given to secure the one indebtedness was to combine all the property thereby conveyed as a single security for the debt, just as completely as if there had been but one instrument of conveyance and but one mortgagor, and it is well settled that a mortgage creditor cannot be compelled to accept a partial payment of his claim, or make a partial surrender of his securities. No redemption as to a portion of the mortgaged premises can be insisted upon without a payment of the whole indebtedness. There can be no such thing as a partial redemption against the will of the mortgagee. While it is true that the owner of only a portion of the mortgaged premises may maintain redemption proceedings, his proceedings must necessarily be for a total redemption. "The debt being a unit, no party interested in the whole premises, or in any portion of them, can compel the mortgagee to accept a part of the debt, and to relieve the property pro tanto from the lien. * * * If the person redeeming has only a partial interest, and there are other partial owners also interested in having the lien of the mortgage removed from their estates, * * * he must himself redeem the whole mortgage, and his only equity against them consists in his right to enforce the mortgage upon their estates as a security for obtaining a subsequent contribution." 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. (2d Ed.) § 1220. See, also, Gibson v. Crehore, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 146; Powers v. Golden Lumber Co., 43 Mich. 468, 5 N. W. 656; 17 Ency. Pl. & Pr. p. 949. The action, whether brought by one or all of the parties entitled to redeem, is an action to redeem as to all the mortgages given to secure the single indebtedness, to accomplish a total redemption as to such indebtedness, and a complaint setting up the facts essential to such relief states but a single cause of action.

The fact that two persons owning different portions of the mortgaged property join as plaintiffs in such an action, asking that upon payment of the indebtedness the alleged portion of each be conveyed to him, does not change the character of the action or cause the complaint to state two causes of action. It is simply a case of two plaintiffs uniting in the statement of a single cause of action, each claiming a portion of the premises sought to be released from the mortgage, and each conceding the validity of the other's claim. What we have said upon this subject is undoubtedly the general rule. If that rule has been modified at all in this state by the provisions of our section 347, Code of Civil Procedure, relative to the case where there is more than one mortgagor, or more than one person claiming under a mortgagor, "some of whom are not entitled to maintain" an action to redeem against the mortgagee in possession, the modification has been thereby made only as to the case therein specified, and this is not such a case. That two persons so situated may join as parties plaintiff in such an action is beyond question. Notwithstanding the fact that their interests in the mortgaged property are several, they have such a common interest in the subject of the action and in obtaining the general relief demanded, viz., the redemption as to the whole mortgaged property, as entitles them to join. See Bliss on Code Pleading, §§ 73 to 76; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 378, 381. By the judgment granting such relief, in which they have a common interest, the ultimate rights of the plaintiffs as between themselves may be determined. Code Civ. Proc. § 578. Mr. Pomeroy, in his Code Remedies, says: "The rule which regulates actions to foreclose prevails also in those brought to redeem. As all the persons entitled to share in the mortgage debt must unite in the foreclosure suit, so, in a suit to redeem, the mortgagor and all others who have a common right with him to redeem, must be made parties—in strict theory they should be coplaintiffs. * * * The general doctrine above stated is strictly enforced in redemption suits of all varieties, the underlying principle being that a redemption must be complete and total; that the creditor shall not be compelled to accept a partial payment of his claim, or to make a partial surrender of his securities. When two tracts of land are mortgaged to the same person to secure the same debt, and they afterward come into the hands of different proprietors, one of them cannot be redeemed without the other; the owners of both the parcels and all persons interested in them must be parties to the action, if not as plaintiffs then, at least, as defendants." Section 256. The principle therein stated is equally applicable where two tracts have been mortgaged by different persons to another person to secure a single indebtedness. It is also clear that even if Wadleigh had no interest whatever in any of the real property mortgaged, he would be a proper, if not a necessary, party in any action brought by Mrs. Smith for an accounting and ascertainment of the amount due on the mortgages and the redemption thereof. See Pomeroy, Code Remedies, §§ 249, 256, 257.

Other points were made in defendant's opening brief in support of the demurrer, but none of them are of sufficient importance to warrant discussion here. The demurrer was properly overruled.

2. A careful examination of the 850 pages of the record, showing the evidence given on the trial of this case, has satisfied us that we would not be warranted in disturbing the conclusion of both jury and judge to the effect that the mining property deed of Mrs. Smith was given solely as security for Wadleigh's indebtedness. It is, of course, the universal rule that the presumption of law, independent of proof, is that such a deed is what it purports to be, viz., an absolute conveyance, and that this presumption must prevail unless the evidence to the contrary is entirely plain and convincing. This, however, does not mean that the evidence in the record on appeal must be entirely plain and convincing to an appellate court. This question of fact, like other questions of fact, is one for the trial court, and while, as said in Sheehan v. Sullivan, 126 Cal. 189, 193, 58 Pac. 543, the appellate court will consider the question as to the sufficiency of the evidence in the light of that rule, it will not disturb the finding of the trial court to the effect that the deed is a mortgage, where there is substantial evidence warranting a clear and satisfactory conviction to that effect. All questions as to preponderance and conflict of evidence are for the trial court. The rule in this matter is declared in the cases cited by defendant. In Mahoney v. Bostwick, 96 Cal. 53, 30 Pac. 1020, 31 Am. St. Rep. 175, the same contention as to insufficiency of evidence was made, and this court after admitting that the presumption of absolute conveyance should prevail unless the evidence to the contrary was entirely plain and convincing, said: "But whether the evidence is of such character and strength as to produce this conviction is a question for the trial court to determine. That court ought always to be governed, in weighing the evidence and reaching the conclusion as to the facts, by this rule, which requires the plaintiff, in an action like this, to present a case free from doubt, and, unless the evidence is such as to leave in the mind of the trial judge a clear and satisfactory conviction that the instrument, which in form is a deed, was intended by all the parties thereto as a mortgage, the finding should be against the plaintiff. But we cannot say from the record which is before us that the superior court disregarded this rule in making its findings." In that case the court held that the evidence upon this material issue being conflicting in a substantial degree, the finding of the trial court that the deed was a mortgage must be allowed to stand. See, also, Penney v. Simmons, 99 Cal. 380, 382, 33 Pac. 1121; Sherman v. Sandell, 106 Cal. 373, 375, 39 Pac. 797, 798. In the last case cited, it was said: "To the extent that its determination rests upon the mere preponderance of evidence, or consideration of conflicting or contradictory evidence, the finding of the trial court is not open to review in this court."

It would unduly lengthen this opinion and would serve no useful purpose to here review the great volume of evidence elicted upon this question. Counsel for defendant has ably and industriously made many points in his briefs in regard thereto that should have been, and probably were, made before the tribunal whose province it was to determine this question of fact, and whose decision thereon, in view of the evidence, must be held to be conclusive. It must suffice here to state that the positive evidence of three witnesses, including plaintiff Wadleigh, was to the effect that the title to the mining property of Mrs. Smith was received and held by Phelps as security for the Wadleigh indebtedness, just as the title to Wadleigh's property previously conveyed was received and held; that such evidence finds some corroboration in the dealings between Wadleigh and Phelps and in the correspondence between them and the receipt given by Phelps to Wadleigh for the deeds delivered as security at the inception of the original indebtedness on November 15, 1889; that there is nothing in the record from which it can fairly be concluded that Phelps to the knowledge of Wadleigh ever assumed or claimed to be the absolute owner of the mining property, free of claims of Wadleigh, Mrs. Smith, and others interested; and that there is nothing in the record that necessarily destroys the effect of all this evidence. There was in this sufficient support for the finding of the trial court to the effect that the deed of the mining property was given to secure the payment of the Wadleigh indebtedness.

3. Counsel for defendant does not dispute the well-settled proposition that parol evidence is admissible to show that a deed absolute in form was in fact given as a mortgage, but he claims that parol evidence was not admissible in this case as to the mining property, for the alleged reason that there was a separate contract in writing between the parties as to the terms upon which the property was conveyed and was to be held. The difficulty as to this contention is that there was no evidence of any such written contract. The unsigned memorandum in Mr. Phelps handwriting, found among his personal effects after his death, wrapped about a quitclaim deed of this property from Mr. Phelps and his wife to Mrs. Smith, and apparently designed to accompany a deposit of this deed in escrow and serve as a memorandum of the terms and conditions upon which it was to be delivered, did not show such a contract. Wadleigh testified positively that the understanding was that such a deed should be placed in escrow for delivery to him upon the payment of his indebtedness to Phelps, but that he never saw or heard of the memorandum found, and never knew or assented to the conditions therein specified. There is nothing in any of his letters to Phelps to indicate the contrary. A different question would be presented were the evidence such as to warrant the conclusion that Wadleigh knew of the memorandum and its contents, and might be held to have assented thereto, and the cases cited by counsel for defendant would then be in point. It does not appear that any delivery in escrow was ever made. It should be noted in this connection that Mrs. Smith was never in the state of California, and that Phelps never had any personal dealings with her, all the business being transacted through Wadleigh, who, apparently, was authorized by Mrs. Smith to use her property for his own purposes as he saw fit.

4. There is nothing in the point that, under section 1880, Code Civ. Proc., Wadleigh was incompetent to testify as to any matter of fact occurring before the death of Phelps. It is settled that this provision of our law applies only to actions upon such claims or demands against the decedent as might have been enforced against him in his lifetime by personal action for the recovery of money, and upon which a money judgment could have been rendered. Myers v. Reinstein, 67 Cal. 89, 7 Pac. 192; Booth v. Pendola, 88 Cal. 36, 23 Pac. 200, 25 Pac. 1101; Fallon v. Butler, 21 Cal. 24, 81 Am. Dec. 140. The case of Bernardis v. Allen, 136 Cal. 7, 68 Pac. 110, cited by defendant, was a suit brought to declare a partnership in mining property, against the successors of a deceased person, and it was there recognized that, where an action is not technically founded upon a claim against the estate, the plaintiff is not within the prohibition of section 1880, Code Civ. Proc. While the reasons for the rule declared in that section may be as applicable in a case of the character before us as in the case of a money claim against a deceased, the Legislature has not seen fit to make the rule cover such cases.

5. No foundation for the defense of laches was laid by any averment in the answer of defendant. Cook v. Ceas, 147 Cal. 614, 619, 82 Pac. 370. As we have already held, the complaint on its face did not show laches. If we assume that, under such circumstances, a trial court in the exercise of its own inherent powers, may ever, in the absence of such a plea in the answer, refuse relief upon the ground that the evidence shows laches, it is clear that the evidence was not such as to warrant any such unusual action by the court in this case.

6. It is strenuously urged that plaintiff's action is barred by the statute of limitations, but the finding of the court against this contention cannot be disturbed. Under section 346, Code Civ. Proc., an action to redeem a mortgage of real property may be brought against the mortgagee in possession at any time, unless the mortgagee has maintained an adverse possession of the mortgaged premises for five years after breach of some condition of the mortgage. As long as the mortgagee in possession by the consent of the mortgagor is apparently holding as such mortgagee and by virtue of his agreement with the mortgagor, and has not made manifest any other claim, his holding is not adverse. See Murdock v. Clarke, 90 Cal. 429, 27 Pac. 275; Peshine v. Ord, 119 Cal. 311, 51 Pac. 536, 63 Am. St. Rep. 131; Warder v. Enslen, 73 Cal. 291, 14 Pac. 874; Husheon v. Husheon, 71 Cal. 407, 12 Pac. 410; Raynor v. Drew, 72 Cal. 307, 13 Pac. 866. There was sufficient evidence to support the conclusion of the trial court to the effect that Phelps entered into possession of the mining property under the agreement alleged, the effect of which was to make him a mortgagee in possession, and that there was no adverse holding at any time prior to his death. The strongest evidence to the contrary is that contained in the letter of October 6, 1896, from Phelps to Wadleigh, which, taken in connection with all the rest of the correspondence and the evidence as to the dealings between the parties, is not sufficient to warrant us in holding that the finding is not sufficiently supported.

7. There was no trust shown by either complaint or evidence, except in so far as there is always a trust relation between a mortgagor and a mortgagee in possession. The duties imposed upon Phelps by the agreement alleged and found were only such as are incumbent upon a mortgagee in possession. It was left optional with him to work the mine or not, and to make leases of portions thereof or not, as he saw fit, and, under the law, independent of agreement, he was bound to pay from the rents and profits the expenses of such operations, and apply any net profits in the manner specified.

8. Defendant's contention that the amount adjudged to be paid to her by Wadleigh is too small, is principally based upon the fact that interest was allowed in such indebtedness only to April 18, 1901, although this action was not commenced until February 8, 1902, and judgment was not given until June 30, 1903. The trial court found, and there was sufficient evidence to support the finding, that on April 18, 1901, Wadleigh, having with him two sacks of coin containing $13,500, and being able, ready, and willing to pay his indebtedness, offered in writing to pay to defendant in the presence of her attorneys, the full amount due from him, upon condition that she make and deliver good and sufficient deeds of reconveyance of the mortgaged property, but that defendant refused to receive any payment except as an unconditional payment, and expressly declared that she would make no reconveyance of any of said property. Although the precise amount named in the writing was $11,150, the offer was also to pay "any further sum of money due," and the evidence shows that the refusal to accept the terms of the offer was solely because of the condition annexed for a reconveyance of the mortgaged property and that the giving of any reconveyance was absolutely refused. On April 23, 1901, defendant commenced an action against Wadleigh in the superior court of San Mateo county upon the $7,120 note. On May 24, 1901, Wadleigh filed his answer in said action, setting up the facts stated in his original complaint in this action, and also alleging that, by reason of the fact that such note was secured by mortgage upon property none of which was in San Mateo county, the court had no jurisdiction of the action. The court, on December 30, 1901, finding the last plea stated to be sustained by the evidence, gave judgment for Wadleigh. Thereupon, on February 8, 1902, this action was commenced. As already stated, in her original answer to the complaint in this action, defendant denied that any of the deeds were given as mortgages. Our Civil Code is clear and explicit as to the effect of a tender upon the running of interest. Section 1504 provides: "An offer of payment or other performance, duly made, though the title to the thing offered be not transferred to the creditor, stops the running of interest on the obligation and has the same effect upon all its incidents as a performance thereof." Such was held to be the effect of a tender in Ferrea v. Tubbs, 125 Cal. 687, 58 Pac. 308, where it was also held that no subsequent deposit of the money was necessary in order to keep the tender good. We presume that there can be no question as to this under our existing code provisions, nor do we think that there can be any question as to there having been a tender "duly made." Section 1498, Civ. Code, provides: "When a debtor is entitled to the performance of a condition precedent to, or concurrent with, performance on his part, he may make his offer to depend upon the due performance of such conditions." Undoubtedly, Wadleigh was entitled to have the reconveyance of the mortgaged property delivered upon payment of the mortgage debt, and was, therefore, entitled to make his offer depend upon the execution by defendant of such reconveyances. See Kofoed v. Gordon, 122 Cal. 314, 54 Pac. 1115; Ferrea v. Tubbs, supra.

According to the findings of the court, the amount named in the tender was more than sufficient to pay the indebtedness due on April 18, 1901, and the evidence appears to be sufficient to sustain this conclusion. There was evidence which, if believed by the trial court, was sufficient to warrant it in concluding that Wm. Maguire, who actually superintended and managed the business of the mine, had an agreement with Phelps in regard thereto, under the terms of which he could not look personally to Phelps either for salary or money expended, but must look solely to the mining property therefor, and could continue in possession of such property until the proceeds thereof paid his claim. Maguire himself testified positively to this, and while he presented a claim against the estate of Phelps, such claim stated this agreement and stated no case of personal liability on the part of the deceased. Assuming all this to be true, as we must in view of the finding, the amount due Maguire from the mine was no part of the indebtedness due Phelps from the plaintiffs. If they recover the mining property, they will take it subject to any claim Maguire may have against it. We are unable to see any inconsistency in the findings as to the amount due. A tender free from conditions which the creditor was not bound to perform having been duly made on April 18, 1901, the action of the court in refusing to allow interest thereafter accruing was correct.

9. The contention that the real motive of Wadleigh and Smith for the conveyances to Phelps was the defrauding of their creditors is fully answered by the findings as to the purpose of such conveyances, which findings, as we have already held, are sufficiently supported by the evidence.

10. It is claimed that the court should have dismissed the action for the reason that, under section 1597 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the controversy between these parties could be settled only in the court having jurisdiction of the probate proceedings in the matter of the estate of deceased, and that the sole remedy of plaintiffs was by petition to that court. It is sufficient to say, in reply to this claim, that section 1597 of the Code of Civil Procedure as construed by this court, is applicable only where the deceased was bound by written contract to convey. Cory v. Hyde, 49 Cal. 469, 471; Estate of Healy, 137 Cal. 474, 478, 70 Pac. 455.

11. It is claimed that many errors were committed by the trial court in admitting in evidence letters from Wadleigh to Phelps and from Phelps to Wadleigh. There is no claim that these letters were not received in due course of mail by the respective parties. An examination of those letters discloses no reason why they were not relevant and competent evidence. They constituted what were, in effect, conversations between the parties relative to their respective rights in the property that was subsequently in controversy, and were admissible, just as a conversation between the parties relative to such matters would have been admissible for the purpose of showing how each of these parties, to the knowledge of the other, regarded this property, with reference to their respective rights therein, and their admissions in regard thereto, thus throwing light upon the ultimate questions to be determined as to whether the deeds were in fact originally given solely as security for an indebtedness, and whether there was any adverse holding by Phelps. It is suggested that the letters written prior to November 13, 1894, the date of the giving of the mining property deed, which was finally the sole matter in controversy, were incompetent and irrelevant so far as said property was concerned. If we assume this contention to be good, there was no error in admitting them, for, at the time of their admission, they were competent and relevant upon the then issues as to the other deeds. The motion to strike out, made subsequent to the amendments to the answer eliminating the issues as to such other deeds, was too broad, being a motion to strike out all letters, including those written subsequent to Nov. 13, 1894, and was properly denied, regardless of the question as to whether the earlier letters were proper evidence upon the issue as to the mining property.

12. It is claimed that Phelps should have been allowed compensation for personal services in the care and management of the mining property, and that the court erred in excluding certain evidence offered to show the value of such services. Upon the case made by the findings, Phelps was, as to such mining property, simply a mortgagee in possession, and was, therefore, not entitled to compensation for personal services on account of the mortgaged property. See 3 Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence (2d Ed.) §§ 1216, 1217; Moss v. Odell, 141 Cal. 335, 337, 74 Pac. 999.

13. It is claimed that the judgment for costs in favor of plaintiff is erroneous, for the reason that in its written opinion in the case filed May 18, 1903, the court said: "Let each party herein pay his, her, or their own costs." In the findings and decision in writing, filed June 30, 1903, the court "further finds and decides, that the said plaintiffs are entitled to recover against the said defendant, judgment for the plaintiffs' costs in this action," and the judgment, following the findings and decision, ordered that "plaintiffs recover their costs incurred in this action." The claim is that the court having announced its view as to the costs in the written opinion, could not in the findings and judgment make different provision from that indicated in the opinion. This written opinion was, however, no part of the decision in the case, cannot be treated as such, and was entirely without legal effect. It was, as has been said by this court in a similar case, "no more than its name imports—the informal views of the court, subject to future modification, * * * the legal expression of those views being found, as only properly they could be found, in the formal findings of fact and conclusions of law." Montecito, etc., Co. v. City of Santa Barbara, 144 Cal. 578, 595, 77 Pac. 1113, 1119.

We have now discussed what may fairly be said to the main contentions of defendant.

14. Several hundred errors are assigned by counsel for defendant on this appeal, many of which assignments of error are based upon claims already discussed and disposed of. As to the others, we have examined each one, and find none that merits discussion here. There was no error that could be held to have prejudicially affected the substantial rights of the defendant—indeed, for a case which was apparently so strenuously contested and required so many rulings on the part of the trial court, the record is unusually free of even technical error.

In one respect, not referred to in the briefs, we think the judgment should be modified. Defendant is undoubtedly entitled to legal interest upon the amount adjudged due her, less the costs awarded plaintiffs, from the time the judgment becomes final, to such time as the plaintiffs, under the judgment, tender her such amount, or in the event that they fail to make such tender, until the foreclosure sale ordered had in that event, has been had. We are of the opinion that the judgment as it now stands does not give her this, but limits her to the recovery of $11,112.03 less $1,185.05 costs, regardless of how long such payment may be deferred, and regardless of the fact that the plaintiffs can have no legal right to the use of defendant's money, without interest, for a single day after the determination as to the relative rights of the parties has become final. The judgment should therefore be modified by inserting in the paragraph adjudging that Wadleigh have 30 days in which to pay the sum of $11,112.03 in gold coin, after the words "in gold coin," the following: "less the sum of $1,185.05 hereinafter awarded plaintiff as costs, together with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum on $9,926.98 from the date on which this judgment shall become final to the date on which payment or lawful tender of payment be made"; and also in the paragraph providing for a commissioner's sale of the property in the event of nonpayment, by inserting after the words "said indebtedness" in each of the three places wherein said words occur, "less the sum of $1,185.05 hereinafter awarded plaintiffs as costs, together with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum on $9,926.98 from the date on which this judgment shall become final."

The judgment appealed from is modified as above indicated, and, as so modified, is affirmed. Appellant shall not recover her costs of appeal.

CROCKER v. SCOTT, Tax Collector. (S. F. 3,089.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 17, 1906.)

1. TAXATION — NATIONAL BANK SHARES — STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

Rev. St. U. S. § 5219 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3502] providing that nothing therein contained shall prevent all shares of any national bank from being included in the valuation of the personal property of the owner or holder of such shares in assessing taxes imposed by authority of the state within which the association is located, etc., authorizes the assessment of shares of national banking associations located within a state, in such manner as the Legislature of the state may provide, subject only to the restrictions that the taxation should not be at a greater rate than is assessed on other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of the state, and that the shares owned by nonresidents shall be taxed in the city or town where the bank is located and not elsewhere.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Taxation, §§ 27–30.]

2. SAME—DISCRIMINATION.

The fact that under the laws of California shares of stock in state banks and other state moneyed corporations are not permitted to be assessed and taxed is not sufficient to show that Pol. Code, §§ 3609, 3610, providing for the taxation of shares in national banks constitutes an invalid discrimination against national banks, where a different method has been adopted by the state for the assessment and taxation of all the property of such state corporations embraced in the assessment of shares of stock in national banks.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Taxation, § 30.]

3. COURTS—RULES OF DECISION—CONSTRUCTION OF STATE STATUTES.

The Supreme Court of the state is the court of last resort for the determination of questions of construction of provisions of the state Constitution and statutes, and is therefore not bound by the decision of such questions by the federal Supreme Court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 43, Cent. Dig. Courts, §§ 329, 333.]

4. TAXATION—EXEMPTIONS — CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS—STATUTES.

Const. 1879, art. 13, § 1, providing that all property in the state not exempt under the laws of the United States shall be taxed in proportion to its value, and defining the word "property" to include moneys, credits, bonds, stocks, dues, franchises, and all other matters and things, real, personal, and mixed, capable of private ownership, requires the taxing of everything capable of private ownership, and deprives the Legislature of power to exempt from taxation any such property not exempted by the Constitution itself.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Taxation, §§ 312, 313.]

5. SAME—TAXATION OF MONEYED CORPORATIONS—STOCK.

Const. 1879, art. 13, § 1, required taxation of all nonexempt property in proportion to value and defined "property" to include moneys, credits, bonds, stocks, dues, franchises, and all other matters or things, capable of private ownership. Pol. Code, § 3607, provided that all property not exempt must be taxed, except that nothing therein contained should be construed to authorize double taxation, and section 3608 declared that shares of stock in corporations possessed no intrinsic value over the actual value of the property of the corporation, and that all such property should be assessed and taxed, but that no assessment should be made of shares of stock, nor should any holder thereof be taxed thereon. The section was subsequently amended to exclude national bank shares. Held, that since, under such provisions, all the elements of value contained in corporate stock were subject to taxation to the corporation, Pol. Code, §§ 3609, 3610, providing for the taxation of stock in national banks, did not constitute a discrimination against the latter, prohibited by Rev. St. U. S. § 5219 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3502.]

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Taxation, § 30.]

6. SAME — FRANCHISE — DETERMINATION OF VALUE.

The value of the franchise of a corporation for the purpose of taxation is the difference between the market value of its shares, and the value of its tangible property.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Taxation, § 625.]

7. SAME — ENFORCEMENT OF TAX — PROCEEDINGS—INJUNCTION.

An injunction will not lie to restrain proceedings for the enforcement of a tax merely because the tax is illegal, unless it appears that the injunction is necessary to protect the rights of the property owner, and that he has no adequate remedy at law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Taxation, §§ 1230–1234.]

8. SAME—CLOUD ON TITLE.

In a suit to restrain proceedings for the enforcement of a tax, a general allegation that the acts of the officers will cast a cloud on complainant's title, and will be to her great and irreparable injury, is insufficient to justify such relief where the laws of the state clearly show that no such effect can be produced.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Taxation, § 1241.]

9. SAME—LIEN.

The only cloud on the title of a taxpayer created prior to the execution of a tax deed, as authorized by Pol. Code, §§ 3786, 3787, which cannot be executed by the tax collector until five years from the date of sale, is such cloud as arises from the fact that the tax is a lien on the taxpayer's property in favor of the state, attaching as of the date of the assessment, and continuing until the taxes are paid or the property is sold, which lien is not increased by anything required to be done by the tax collector prior to the execution of the deed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Taxation, § 1241.]

10. SAME—INTERMEDIATE PROCEEDINGS—PURPOSE.

Pol. Code, §§ 3764–3778, provides that on nonpayment of a tax, the tax collector shall make publication of the entire delinquent list within a certain period with a notice that, at a stated time, the property on which the lien exists will be sold to the state, etc., and requires an entry on the delinquent list and the filing of record of a certificate of the sale. Held, that the only purpose of such provisions was to preserve the rights of the state, and to start running the period of five years within which redemption can be effected, and at the expiration of which a deed may be issued to the state.

11. SAME—VALIDITY OF ASSESSMENT—PRIMA FACIE EVIDENCE.

Where property is sold for delinquent taxes, neither the certificate of sale nor any of the acts of the tax collector antecedent to the deed constitute even prima facie evidence as to the validity of the assessment or levy.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Taxation, § 1377.]

12. SAME—EXECUTION OF DEED—INJUNCTION.

Where property is illegally sold for taxes, the owner has full and complete protection against the creation of any cloud on his title by a suit to enjoin the execution of the deed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Taxation, § 1241.]

McFarland, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge.

Suit by Ethel W. Crocker against Joseph H. Scott, as tax collector, etc. From an order denying a motion to dissolve an injunction, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Franklin K. Lane, City Atty., Percy V. Long, City Atty., W. I. Brobeck, Asst. City Atty., William G. Burke, City Atty., and A. S. Newburgh, Asst. City Atty., for appellant. Lloyd & Wood (W. S. Wood, of counsel), for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. Plaintiff, who is the owner of 5,096 shares of the capital stock of the Crocker-Woolworth National Bank, sought by this action to have it adjudged that the assessment and taxation of said shares for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, were illegal and void, and to obtain an injunction restraining defendant tax collector from selling or declaring sold to the state, on account of said taxes, certain real property of plaintiff also assessed to her, and upon which said taxes on the shares of stock constituted a lien (Pol. Code, § 3717), or making any certificate of such sale, and for such other relief as might be proper. By the allegations of her complaint, filed June 12, 1901, it appeared that the defendant had advertised said real property for sale on account of said taxes, and would on June 24, 1901, unless restrained, sell said property to the state of California, and enter the words "sold to the state" on the delinquent assessment list opposite the tax levied on the property of plaintiff, and execute a certificate of delinquent tax sale for said real property, dated June 24, 1901, to the state, and that five years thereafter he, or his successor in office, would execute a deed of said real property conveying to the state the absolute title to said property. An injunction pendente lite was asked for, and upon the filing of the complaint such an injunction was issued, restraining defendant from selling or declaring sold said real property to the state of California, from making the entry "sold to the state" on the delinquent assessment book opposite the tax levied on plaintiff's property, from making out or executing a certificate of delinquent tax sale to said property, and from in any manner interfering with said property. Upon the filing of the answer, in which the allegations as to the invalidity of the tax were denied, defendant moved that this injunction pendente lite be dissolved. This motion was denied. This is an appeal by defendant from the order refusing to dissolve such injunction.

The principal question involved on this appeal, and the one principally discussed by counsel, is as to the proper construction of our revenue laws relative to the assessment and taxation of the property of California corporations, which question is of considerable practical importance, in view of the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the recent case of San Francisco National Bank v. Dodge, Assessor, 197 U. S. 70, 25 Sup. Ct. 384, 49 L. Ed. 669. The assessment and taxation of plaintiff's shares of stock were made under the supposed authority of the act of 1899 (St. 1899, p. 96, c. 80) amending section 3608 of the Political Code, and adding two new sections to said Code, known as "Sections 3609 and 3610." By these sections, it is required that the stockholders in every national banking association doing business in this state and having its principal place of business herein, "shall be assessed and taxed on the value of their shares of stock therein," the same to be "valued and assessed as is other property for taxation." It is provided that in making such assessment to each stockholder, "there shall be deducted from the value of his shares of stock such sum as is in the same proportion to such value as the total value of its real estate" (the real estate being assessed directly to the banking corporation), "and property exempt by law from taxation bears to the whole value of all the shares of capital stock in said tional bank." The statute further provides that in the assessment of said shares "each stockholder shall be allowed all the deductions permitted by law to the holders of moneyed capital in the form of solvent credits," and also declares that the assessment and taxation shall not be at a greater rate than is made or assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of this state. These sections were enacted in an effort of this state to avail itself of the permission of Congress, evidenced by section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3502], to tax shares of national banking associations to the holders thereof. It is now so well settled as to no longer require the citation of authorities that, under this section, the holders of shares of national banking associations located within a state may be assessed and taxed therefor in such manner as the Legislature of such state may provide, subject only to two restrictions, viz: "That the taxation shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such state, and that the shares of any national banking association owned by nonresidents of any state shall be taxed in the city or town where the bank is located, and not elsewhere." While there are general allegations in the complaint to the effect that the assessment of plaintiff's shares of stock was not made in the manner prescribed by sections 3609 and 3610, Pol. Code, the specific allegations in support of such general allegations show that the various provisions of those sections were fully complied with, and that if the assessment be invalid, it is so solely because those sections provide a method of assessment and taxation for national bank shares, the effect of which, in its practical execution, is to discriminate in favor of state banks and other state moneyed corporations, and against national banks.

With one exception, all contentions made by learned counsel for plaintiff against the legality of the method thus adopted by the state of California for the taxation of national bank shares, appear to have been already disposed of adversely to him by the Supreme Court of the United States in the opinion delivered in the case of San Francisco Nat. Bank v. Dodge, Assessor, supra, wherein the views expressed by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit as to similar contentions in another case (Nevada Nat. Bank v. Dodge, 119 Fed. 57, 56 C. C. A. 145) were approved. It should be noted in passing that this is the first case that has come to this court, involving any question as to the validity of sections 3609 and 3610 of the Political Code, the cases above referred to having been instituted in the federal courts. It was specially pointed out by the United States Supreme Court in the San Francisco National Bank Case above referred to, following Davenport Nat'l Bank v. Board of Equalization, 123 U. S. 83, 8 Sup. Ct. 73, 31 L. Ed. 94, that the mere fact that, under the laws of this state, shares of stock in state banks and other state moneyed corporations are not permitted to be assessed and taxed, was not sufficient to show in a statute requiring the assessment and taxation of national bank shares, any discrimination against national banks, provided a different method adopted by the state for the assessment and taxation of the property of such state corporations, accomplished the inclusion in the assessment of the property of such corporations of all those elements which are embraced in the assessment of shares of stock in national banks to the holders thereof. It was said by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Davenport Case cited above, upholding a statute of the state of Iowa providing for the taxation on national bank shares, where no such assessment was allowable in case of a savings bank, the property of which was assessed directly to the corporation: "It is strongly urged that in no other mode than by taxing the stockholders of each and of all the banks can a perfect equality of taxation be obtained. * * * It has never been held by this court that the state should abandon systems of taxation of their own banks, or of money in the hands of their other corporations, which they may think the most wise and efficient modes of taxing their own corporate organizations, in order to make that taxation conform to the system of taxing the national banks upon the shares of their stock in the hands of their owners. All that has ever been held to be necessary is that the system of state taxation of its own citizens, of its own banks, and of its own corporations shall not work a discrimination unfavorable to the holders of the shares of the national banks. Nor does the act of Congress require anything more than this; neither the language nor its purpose can be construed to go any further. Within these limits, the manner of assessing and collecting all taxes by the states is uncontrolled by the act of Congress." Citing this case, upon this point, the Supreme Court said in the Dodge Case: "As, then, no conflict necessarily arises between the act of Congress and the state law solely because the latter provides one method for taxation of state banks and other moneyed corporations and another method for national banks, it follows that the contention that the state law, for that reason, is repugnant to the act of Congress is without merit." In the Dodge Case, however, it was held by the United States Supreme Court (four of the justices dissenting) that the California law relative to the assessment of the property of corporations, as construed by the California Supreme Court, does not compel the assessing officers in the valuation of the property of such corporations, to include all those elements of value which are embraced in the assessment of shares of stock in national banks, and that, for this reason, and the additional reason, held to have been shown by the record in that case, that assessors generally in their assessment of state corporations had failed to include all such elements, the law requiring the assessment of national bank shares at their full cash value to the holders thereof is, both by its terms and in its practical execution, a discrimination in favor of other moneyed capital against national banks, forbidden by the act of Congress which authorizes the assessment and taxation of such shares.

It is claimed that the decision of the Supreme Court in the Dodge Case effectually determines for all time the question as to the validity or invalidity of our existing statute relative to the assessment of national bank shares. But we do not so understand the majority opinion in that case, or the effect of the decision rendered. It, doubtless, effectually disposed of the assessments involved in that case. Its decision to the effect that our statute relative to the assessment of national bank shares cannot be enforced, so long as our laws relative to the assessment of state corporations are construed by this court not to require the assessment officers to include in the assessment of such corporations all of those elements of value which are embraced in an assessment of national bank shares, so as to produce equality of taxation as respects national banks, is, also, undoubtedly a decision upon a federal question, binding upon us. It may also be conceded that upon a showing in any case of such facts as were held to be shown by the record in the Dodge Case, as to the practical application of the law relative to state corporations by assessors generally, we would be compelled to follow the decision in the Dodge Case, and hold the assessment complained of void. But throughout the opinion in that case, the Supreme Court recognized the rule repeatedly declared by it to the effect that in the interpretation of the Constitution and statutes of a state, the construction placed upon them by the court of last resort of such state is conclusive and binding upon the Supreme Court of the United States and all federal courts (see Smiley v. Kansas, 196 U. S. 447, 25 Sup. Ct. 289, 49 L. Ed. 546), and that opinion ended as follows: "Our conclusion, therefore, does not deny the power of the state of California to assess shares of stock in national banks, provided only the method adopted does not produce the discrimination prohibited by the act of Congress. From this, of course, it would follow that, if the statutes of California, either from their text or as construed by the highest court of that state, compelled the assessing officers in the valuation of the property of state banks and other state moneyed corporations to include all those elements of value which are embraced in the assessment of shares of stock in national banks, so that there would be an equality of taxation as respects national banks, the discrimination which we find to exist under the present state of the law in California would disappear." (The italics are ours.) Surely it cannot be contended that this court is precluded by anything decided by the United States Supreme Court in the Dodge Case from now holding that, under the constitutional and statutory provisions of this state, and the decisions of this court construing the same, the assessing officers are compelled, in their valuation of the property of state banks and other state moneyed corporations for purposes of assessment, to include all those elements of value which would be embraced in an assessment of the shares of stock therein. Whether or not this is the proper construction of our revenue laws is a question as to which this is the court of last resort. While the views expressed on that question in the majority opinion of the Supreme Court necessarily merit the respect and careful consideration due to every expression of that justly distinguished tribunal, this court is not compelled, or, indeed, at liberty, to follow it, if it is of the opinion that such views are erroneous. Addressing ourselves to this question:

The portion of the majority opinion in the Dodge Case last quoted recognizes that a state is at liberty to adopt a method for the assessment of state corporations, under which all those elements of value which are embraced in an assessment of the shares of stock would be required to be included in an assessment of the property of the corporation to the corporation. Such was the method upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Adams Express Co. Cases (Adams Express Co. v. Ohio State Auditor, 165 U. S. 194, 17 Sup. Ct. 305, 41 L. Ed. 683; Id., 166 U. S. 185, 17 Sup. Ct. 604, 41 L. Ed. 965; Weir v. Norman, 166 U. S. 171, 17 Sup. Ct. 527, 41 L. Ed. 960), and in the State R. R. Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, 23 L. Ed. 663. See, also, Michigan Central R. R. Co. v. Powers, (U. S.) 26 Sup. Ct. 459–462, 50 L. Ed. 744. Unless we are now prepared to repudiate the doctrine of the case of People ex rel. Burke v. Badlam, 57 Cal. 594, and hold that section 3608 of the Political Code, prohibiting any assessment of shares of stock of state corporations is unconstitutional, it must be held that such has been the method or system provided by our laws for the assessment of state corporations, for the last 25 years. That this must necessarily be so, will clearly appear from a consideration of the provision of our Constitution declaring what property shall be taxed, the legislation thereunder, and the decision above referred to. Section 1 of article 13 of the Constitution adopted in 1879 was, so far as is material in this connection, as follows: "All property in the state, not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law. The word 'property,' as used in this article and section, is hereby declared to include moneys, credits, bonds, stocks, dues, franchises, and all other matters and things, real, personal and mixed, capable of private ownership. * * *" No amendment of this portion of the section has ever been made. The section, as originally adopted, contained a proviso exempting growing crops, property used exclusively for public schools, and such as may belong to the United States, this state, or to any county, or municipal corporation within this state. The section has been amended to include among the exemptions, property used for free public libraries and free museums. Other sections have been added exempting certain property such as buildings used solely for religious worship, state, county and municipal corporation bonds, personal property of a householder to the extent of $100.00, and fruit and nut bearing trees under the age of four years and grape vines under the age of three years, none of which changes is material to the question here under consideration, except in so far as such changes emphasize the fact that it has always been recognized that nothing capable of private ownership can be exempted from taxation, unless it be specifically declared to be exempt by constitutional provision. There has never been any question as to the effect of this mandatory provision of our Constitution. The definition of property required to be taxed in proportion to its value was so sweeping and comprehensive that it has uniformly been held that it included everything capable of private ownership, and that the provision placed it beyond the power of the Legislature to exempt from taxation either totally or partially anything capable of private ownership, not exempted by the Constitution itself. This, of course, is so clear as to property specifically mentioned in the provision, such as bonds, stocks, franchises, etc., as to require no argument. As said in Mackey v. San Francisco, 113 Cal. 392, 397, 45 Pac. 696: "The Constitution not only provides that all 'property' shall be taxed, but defines the word 'property' and expressly includes 'bonds' in that definition, thus placing it beyond the power of the Legislature or the courts to say that bonds are not property within the meaning and intent of the Constitution." The same is, of course, true as to shares of stock, which are also expressly included. See Bank of California v. San Francisco, 142 Cal. 276, 285, 75 Pac. 832, 64 L. R. A. 918, 100 Am. St. Rep. 130.

The taxation of all property not specifically exempted, including shares of stock, was thus required by constitutional provision. The only thing left for the legislative department to do was to provide a method for the ascertainment of the value of the property to be taxed. To this extent, the constitutional provision was not self-executing. McHenry v. Downer, 116 Cal. 20, 24, 47 Pac. 779, 45 L. R. A. 737. At its first session after the adoption of this Constitution, the Legislature, by act approved March 22, 1880, amending certain sections of the Political Code, performed its duty in this behalf. Amendments to Political Code 1880, p. 5, c. 31. Substantially re-enacting provisions of the Code in force at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, by section 3627 it was provided that "all taxable property must be assessed at its full cash value," and by section 3617 it was declared that "the terms 'value' and 'full cash value' mean the amount at which the property would be taken in payment of a just debt due from a solvent debtor." In these respects there has never been an amendment of either of these sections. Section 3627, as then enacted, contained a provision to the effect that the proportionate value of the stock of domestic corporations, for purposes of assessment and taxation, should be its "market value," deducting the value of such property assessed to the corporation "in this state, or elsewhere, of which such capital stock is the representative," but this portion was eliminated by the amendment of 1881, of which we shall presently speak. The act also included section 3640, providing for the assessment of shares of stock, "the assessable value of each share of its stock" to be ascertained "by taking from the market value of its entire capital stock the value of all property assessed to it, and dividing the remainder by the entire number of shares into which it is divided." As was said in the majority opinion of the United States Supreme Court in the Dodge Case, the words "market value" are, and as here used were, but synonymous with the terms "value" and "full cash value," defined in section 3617, "for, eliminating exceptional and extraordinary conditions, giving an abnormal value for the moment to stock, it is apparent that the general market value of stock is its true cash value." We thus had in 1880, as we have ever since had, a mandatory constitutional provision, specifically requiring the asessment and taxation of shares of stock, and the assessment, under the statutory rule applicable to all property, then adopted and ever since in force, was to be at the "full cash value," or, "market value," as those terms have already been defined. It has several times been said, although it is so self-evident as not to require statement, that an assessment of the shares of stock as required by the Constitution would necessarily include an assessment of every element entering into and giving value to the shares. For the purposes of taxation, all such elements, tangible and intangible, were, by the Constitution, in effect declared to be property subject to taxation. As we have seen, the legislation of 1880 was entirely consistent with this constitutional provision. By the act of March 7, 1881 (see amendments to Codes 1881, p. 56, c. 53), certain changes were made by the Legislature. Section 3607, providing that all property not exempt must be taxed, was amended by the addition of a proviso to the effect that nothing in the Code should be construed to require or permit double taxation, the provisions of sections 3627 and 3640 as to the assessment of shares of stock directly were eliminated, and section 3608 was added. The last-named section was as follows: "Shares of stock in corporations possess no intrinsic value over and above the actual value of the property of the corporation which they stand for and represent, and the assessment and taxation of such shares, and also of the corporate property would be double taxation. Therefore all property belonging to corporations shall be assessed and taxed, but no assessment shall be made of shares of stock, nor shall any holder thereof be taxed therefor." This section has been amended only once, viz., in 1899, and then simply by excepting from its operation national banking associations.

It requires no argument to show that this section was in absolute defiance of the constitutional provision expressly requiring shares of stock to be taxed in proportion to their value, if its legal effect was to relieve from taxation a single element that entered into and gave value to the shares of stock. As we have seen, the effect of the constitutional provision was to render all of such elements for the purposes of taxation, property required to be taxed in proportion to their value. This legislation could be sustained as a valid exercise of legislative power only upon the theory that, under our laws, all of these elements constituted, for the purposes of taxation, property "belonging to the corporation," which must be included in the assessment of the property of the corporation. Upon this theory, section 3608 was upheld by this court in the case of People ex rel. Burke v. Badlam, 57 Cal. 594, generally known as "Burke v. Badlam." The court there had under consideration an application for a writ of mandate to compel the assessor of the city and county of San Francisco to assess shares of stock in various corporations, to the holders thereof, and to assess to depositors in savings banks the sums deposited by them. So far as the first proposition was concerned, the proceeding was brought to determine the validity of section 3608, which was claimed by the applicant to be in conflict with the constitutional provision requiring stocks to be taxed. The case was most elaborately argued by eminent counsel, and the decision is clear and direct upon the question here under discussion. The opinion was written by Mr. Justice Ross, and signed by Justices Sharpstein, McKee, and Thornton, and Justices McKinstry and Myrick specially concurred in the views of the majority upon the point we are considering. It was held therein that the language of the Constitution neither required nor permitted double taxation—that the Legislature had the right thereunder to say, and had said by section 3608, that all of the property of the corporation should be assessed to the corporation and should not again be assessed for the same tax—that the property of the corporation included its franchise and everything else evidenced by the certificates of stock; that while the share of each stockholder was undoubtedly property, it was an interest in the very property held by the corporation, "his right to a proportionate share of the dividends and other property of the corporation, nothing more"—and that when all the property of the corporation, including its franchise, was assessed, which it was to be presumed would be done by the assessor in obedience to the requirements of the law, any further assessment of the shares to the individual stockholders would be double taxation. It was said therein, among other things: "Now, what is the stock of a corporation but its property, consisting of its franchise and such other property as the corporation may own? Of what else does its stock consist? If all this is taken away, what remains? Obviously nothing. When, therefore, all of the property of the corporation is assessed, its franchise and all of its other property of every character—then all of the stock of the corporation is assessed, and the mandate of the Constitution is complied with. * * * To assess all of the corporate property of the corporation, and also to assess to each of the stockholders the number of shares held by him, would, it is manifest, be assessing the same property twice, once in the aggregate to the corporation, the trustee of all of the stockholders, and again separately to the individual stockholders. * * * In the case of the corporation, take away all of its property, which, it must be remembered, includes its franchise, and the shareholder no longer has any property. * * * In the case of the corporations to which we have referred, the Legislature has declared that all the property held by such corporations shall be assessed to them. It has not attempted to exempt any property from taxation not exempted by the Constitution itself, and, of course, could not do it if it had. It has only said that the property shall be assessed to the corporation, and shall not be again assessed for the same tax. This it had the right to say."

As we have seen, section 3608 could be upheld as a constitutional enactment only on the theory that under it and other existing statutory provisions, everything entering into and giving value to the shares of stock was "property belonging to the corporation" to be included in the assessment of the property of the corporation. What we have said as to Burke v. Badlam shows that section 3608 was therein held to be valid upon this ground. That case has always been recognized as involving the question as to the constitutionality of that section and as decisive thereon. See Spring Valley W. W. v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 69, 115; McHenry v. Downer, 116 Cal. 20, 28, 47 Pac. 779, 782, 45 L. R. A. 737; Bank of Cal. v. San Francisco, 142 Cal. 276, 285, 75 Pac. 832, 836, 64 L. R. A. 918, 100 Am. St. Rep. 130. Of it we said in the case last cited: "This case necessarily involved the question as to the constitutionality of section 3608 of the Political Code, prohibiting the assessment of shares of stock to the holders thereof. Such shares being undoubtedly property, unless they were otherwise assessed, the section was clearly unconstitutional, in view of the provision of the Constitution requiring all property to be taxed. According to the decision of the court they were under the law to be otherwise assessed—i. e., everything to be represented by the certificates was to be assessed to the corporation." Burke v.

Badlam, supra, is the only case prior to this appeal in which the precise question here under consideration was necessarily involved. In the discussion of this question, that case nevertheless appears to have been entirely overlooked in the majority opinion of the United States Supreme Court in the Dodge Case. The views expressed in the opinion in that case have never been questioned by any later expressions of this court, and for more than 25 years the decision has stood as a construction of our statutes, to the effect that those statutes require that everything entering into and giving value to the shares of stock of a corporation shall be assessed to the corporation as property of the corporation. This construction of the statutes of California has, during all this time, been the only warrant for the enforcement of the statute prohibiting the assessment of shares of stock. In the later case of Spring Valley W. W. v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 69, 118, this court said: "But, by declaring, as was done in section 3608, that shares of stock were not to be taxed because they possessed no intrinsic value over and above the value of the property of the corporation which they stand for and represent, and as taxing of the shares and property both would be double taxation, and therefore the shares should not be assessed, but the property should, no doubt it was their intention to tax everything in the shape of property owned by the corporation; that everything entering into and giving value to the shares should be taxed. It cannot be doubted that the Legislature in acting on the subject of revenue and taxation during the session of 1881, did not intend to leave the system in relation to so important a matter in such a shape, that so large an amount of property as indicated by the difference between the market value of the shares of corporations and the value of the tangible property of such corporations, should escape taxation. To come to any other conclusion would be to impute to that body a most culpable dereliction of duty."

There is certainly nothing in the opinion in Bank of California v. San Francisco, 142 Cal. 276, 75 Pac. 832, 64 L. R. A. 918, 100 Am. St. Rep. 130, which can reasonably be construed as throwing any doubt upon the doctrine of Burke v. Badlam, supra. That was an action brought to recover taxes paid under protest, and involved simply a question as to the validity of an assessment of $750,000 upon the mere corporate franchise of a banking corporation, the plaintiff bank challenging the validity of the assessment upon the ground that it had no assessable franchise whatever. It appeared that the assessor had found that the difference between the value of the tangible property of the bank and the market value of its shares was over $2,000,000, and had determined this to be the value of the corporate franchise, and had valued the franchise for purposes of assessment at the sum of $750,000. As suggested by Mr. Justice Brewer in the dissenting opinion in the Dodge Case, the state was not challenging the assessment, and the question as to whether the assessment should have been higher was not considered. Proceeding expressly upon the authority of Burke v. Badlam, supra, and Spring Valley Water Works v. Schottler, supra, it was held that such a corporate franchise was, under our laws, assessable as a part of the property of the corporation, and the assessment was sustained. It was not necessary in that case to determine whether or not all of those elements, exclusive of the tangible property of such a corporation, that give value to the shares of stock, should be assessed as "franchise," which was the assessment under consideration in that case. It was enough for all the purposes of that case that the corporation had such an assessable franchise, and that the value thereof was at least a portion, if not all, of the difference between the tangible property and the aggregate market value of the shares. But upon the question as to whether the assessing officers are, under our laws, required to assess in some form, as property of the corporation, everything that gives value to the shares, no doubt whatever as to the correctness in any respect of any prior decision was expressed in the opinion, or can reasonably be implied therefrom. It was said by the dissenting justices in the Dodge Case, speaking of the construction placed by this court upon our statutes in this regard: "Obviously, that court construes them as including within the corporate property the aggregate value of all the shares of stock, and that, while they forbid the assessment and taxation of shares of stock in a state corporation, they require that all the value represented by those shares of stock be assessed and taxed against the corporation; so that, when you ascertain the value of a single share of stock, and multiply that by the number of shares in the corporation, you have the value of the corporate property subject to taxation." This appears to us to be the necessary result of our decisions upon this question. Such a construction does not, of course, require the assessment as intangible property of the value of such tangible property as is exempt from taxation under the laws of the United States and this state.

It is urged that many elements entering into and helping to fix the market value of stock, which would be included in an assessment of the shares themselves, such as good will, dividend, or profit earning power, etc., could not be assessed by the assessing officers as property of the corporation, and if they could be so assessed, there is nothing in our law requiring the assessor to so value those things that the entire valuation of the property of the state corporation will equal the market value of the shares. If this be true, it must follow, as we have already shown, that section 3608 of the Political Code, prohibiting any assessment of shares of stock, is unconstitutional. That a system of taxation may be adopted by a state under which all those elements may be included as property of the corporation in the assessment against the corporation was, as we have seen, held by the United States Supreme Court in several cases. (See cases cited, supra, and recognized both in the Davenport Case, and in the majority and minority opinions in the Dodge Case.) This conclusion necessarily follows the undisputed doctrine that a state may assess and tax at their full cash value shares of stock in corporations. That our statutes, as construed by this court, positively command the assessment of all such elements in such a manner as to make the aggregate value of the corporate property measure up in amount to the aggregate market value of the shares, appears very clear to us. Those statutes expressly require that all property belonging to corporations shall be assessed and taxed at its "full cash value," defined to be the amount at which the property will be taken in payment of a just debt due from a solvent debtor, and this positive injunction is as applicable to the intangible property of a corporation, such as its corporate franchise, which admittedly must be assessed and taxed, as it is to the tangible property, such as real estate. As was said by Mr. Justice Brewer, in the dissenting opinion in the Dodge Case: "But it is said there is no specific command to include in the property of a state corporation the good will, dividend-earning power, and the like, and that they are necessarily included in the selling value of the stock of any corporation. It is true, these items are not in terms mentioned, but neither are desks and furniture. The language is general, so general that it includes everything, not excepting good will, dividend-earning power and the like, for they are 'capable of private ownership.' They belong to the corporation. There is no good will in a share of stock over and above the good will which belongs to the corporation, and, if the corporation sells and conveys all that it possesses 'capable of private ownership' it sells and conveys its good will, and there is nothing left of good will or anything else belonging to the stockholders. This is so plain that he who runs may read." The statutes expressly requiring the assessment of all the property, both tangible and intangible, to be at its full cash value, it is obvious that there is but one method by which the cash value of the intangible property can be ascertained, a method ordinarily much more certain and accurate in its results than any method that can be devised for the ascertainment of the value of real estate and many articles of personal property. It is settled law in this state that a proper method for ascertaining the value of the franchise of a corporation is by deducting from the aggregate market value of its shares the value of its tangible property, and taking the difference as the value of the franchise. See San José Gas Co. v. January, 57 Cal. 614; Spring Valley Water Works v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 69, 117; Spring Valley Water Works v. Barber, 99 Cal. 36, 38, 33 Pac. 735, 21 L. R. A. 416; Bank of California v. San Francisco, 142 Cal. 276, 287, 75 Pac. 832, 64 L. R. A. 918, 100 Am. St. Rep. 130. It was said by Chief Justice Beatty in his concurring opinion in Stockton Gas and C. Co. v. San Joaquin Co. (Cal. Sup.) 83 Pac. 59, that the method of ascertaining the value of a corporate franchise by taking the difference between the market value of the shares and the value of the tangible property as the basis of assessment has been sanctioned in several cases, and nowhere disapproved. It appears too clear for question that such difference between the market value of the shares of stock and the value of the tangible property is necessarily the aggregate cash value of such intangible property as under our system must be held to belong to the corporation, call it franchise, good will, or dividend or profit-earning power, or what you please. Whatever it is, our laws positively require it to be assessed by the assessing officers to the corporation at its full cash value, precisely as all other property is required to be assessed at its full cash value. The aggregate value of the shares evidenced by the certificates of stock, must be the aggregate cash value of the property of the corporation held by it in trust for its stockholders. This being so, the method already approved by the decisions of this court as a "proper method" is not only a "proper method." It is the only method by which the cash value of the intangible property required to be assessed can be ascertained, and is, therefore, the method necessarily enjoined by our laws upon the assessing officers. Whether or not in the case of a banking corporation which possesses no other franchise than its corporate franchise, the whole of its intangible property may be considered "franchise" and be assessed eo nomine, as seems to be clearly intimated by the cases we have cited, is not absolutely necessary to a determination of the question under discussion. This was also true of the case of Bank of California v. San Francisco, supra, where the decision of such question was expressly withheld. 142 Cal. 289, 75 Pac. 832, 64 L. R. A. 918, 100 Am. St. Rep. 130. It is enough for the purposes of this discussion, that all of such intangible property must be assessed under some name as the property of the corporation. It is, however, apparent that, while it is a simple matter enough to fix the value of the whole, it would be impossible to segregate and apportion the value of all the elements entering into the making up this property, and nothing of benefit to any one could be accomplished by any such attempted segregation. We are satisfied that under the system of taxation in this state as construed by our decisions, all such intangible property may be properly included in the assessment of the corporate franchise of the corporation.

Another question presented upon this appeal is as to the propriety of the remedy by injunction. We are satisfied that no injunction pendente lite restraining such acts upon the part of the tax collector as were specified in the injunction, should have been issued, and that the motion to dissolve this injunction should have been granted. It is well settled by the decisions in this state that the equitable remedy by injunction will not be granted to restrain proceedings of the officers on whom is devolved the duty of enforcing the tax laws, merely because the tax sought to be enforced is illegal. To justify the exercise of such a remedy, it must appear that the same is necessary to protect the rights of the property owner and that he has no adequate remedy at law. In the matter of granting such relief, therefore, a court of equity will go no further than is necessary to protect the rights of the property owner, and will not to any greater extent impede the officers of the state in the performance of their duties. This general matter has several times been under consideration by this court, notably in the cases of Sav. and Loan Soc. v. Austin, 46 Cal. 415, 488, and Houghton v. Austin, 47 Cal. 646, 650, 666. In the first of these cases, which was an appeal from an order refusing to dissolve an injunction, this court said: "If the tax were conceded to be illegal, it does not necessarily follow that, for that reason alone, the plaintiff would be entitled to an injunction. In Dows v. City of Chicago, 11 Wall. (U. S.) 110, 20 L. Ed. 65, Mr. Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "Any delay in the proceedings of the officers, upon whom the duty is devolved of collecting the taxes, may derange the operations of government, and thereby cause serious detriment to the public. No court of equity will, therefore, allow its injunction to issue to restrain their action, except where it may be necessary to protect the rights of the citizen whose property is taxed, and he has no adequate remedy by the ordinary processes of law. It must appear that the enforcement of the tax would lead to a multiplicity of suits, or produce irreparable injury, or where the property is real estate, throw a cloud upon the title of the complainant, before the aid of a court of equity can be invoked. This, we think, is a correct statement of the rule, as established by the weight of authority." This ruling was affirmed in Houghton v. Austin, supra, and these cases have never been overruled or modified in this respect by any later decision. The rule appears to be founded on well-settled equitable principles and appears to us to be absolutely essential to prevent embarrassment in the matter of the execution of revenue laws by the proper officers, and to be specially applicable in the matter of preliminary injunctions where the question as to the legality of the tax has not been finally determined. Under that rule, no act on the part of officers required by the law to be performed in the execution of the revenue measures will be stayed by injunction, unless that act is of such a nature, and will have such an effect, as to irreparably injure the property owner, or, as said in the case above cited and quoted from, "where the property is real estate, throw a cloud upon the title of the complainant." It is obvious that a general allegation that such an act will cast a cloud upon the title of the complainant, and will be to her great and irreparable injury is insufficient to justify such relief, where the laws of the state show clearly that no such effect can be produced.

We have already stated the acts specifically prohibited by the temporary injunction here involved. It is very clear that, under our law, none of these acts could have the effect heretofore stated. It may be conceded that the execution of a deed of said property by the tax collector to the state of California, which deed, by express provision of the Political Code, would purport to convey the absolute title, and be primary evidence as to certain matters affecting the regularity of the proceedings and conclusive evidence as to other of said matters (sections 3786, 3787), would constitute a cloud upon the title, within the rule enunciated in a long line of cases (see Maskey v. Lackmann, 146 Cal. 777, 780, 81 Pac. 115), and that, therefore, the execution of such a deed, pending proceedings to determine the validity of the assessment, might, in a proper case, be enjoined. Such, however, was not one of the acts specifically enjoined here, all of those acts being things required by the law to be done before any deed can be executed. No such deed could be executed by the tax collector until the expiration of five years from the date of sale (Pol. Code, §§ 3781, 3785). We are satisfied that, under our law, none of these acts so enjoined could in any way prejudice plaintiff's rights, or throw a cloud upon her title. Under our present system, the only cloud upon the title of the taxpayer created prior to the execution of such a deed to the state, is such cloud as arises from the fact that the tax is a lien upon his property in favor of the state, attaching as of the first Monday in March (the date of assessment), and continuing until the taxes are paid or the property sold for the payment of the tax. Pol. Code, §§ 3716, 3717, 3718. The effect of this lien is in no degree practically added to by anything required to be done by the tax collector prior to the execution of the deed. To comply with the laws of the state looking to the enforcement of unpaid taxes, the tax collector is required to make publication of the entire delinquent list within a certain period, together with a notice that at a stated time, the property upon which the lien of the state exists will, by operation of law, be sold to the state, and at the time stated, to declare all such property, as to which the taxes have not been paid, sold to the state, to make an entry accordingly upon the delinquent list, and to make out and file of record a certificate of such sale (Pol. Code, §§ 3764 to 3778). The only practical effect of a compliance with these provisions, in addition to preserving the rights of the state in the matter of such taxes as are ultimately found to be valid, is to start running the period of five years within which redemption can be effected and at the expiration of which a deed may be issued to the state. During this period, the legal title to the property continues in the taxpayer, subject to the lien in favor of the state created by the assessment and levy. Neither the certificate of sale (see Clarke v. Mead, 102 Cal. 516, 36 Pac. 862), nor any of these acts of the tax collector constitutes even prima facie evidence as to the validity of assessment or levy, and the taxpayer has a full and complete protection against the creation of any cloud upon his title in the enjoining of the execution of the deed. Under such circumstances, equity will not interpose to the extent of preventing the performance of those preliminary acts which cannot affect the rights of a taxpayer, the failure to perform which may result in prejudice to the state in the enforcement of its revenue laws.

The order denying the motion to dissolve the injunction is reversed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.; LORIGAN, J.

I dissent: McFARLAND, J.

HENSHAW, J. I concur in the judgment, and generally in the reasoning and principles announced in the prevailing opinion. Something more, however, remains to be said upon the question, and no better time for its saying presents itself than is offered by the present case. Concededly it is of the highest importance to the commonwealth that the tax system should be uniform and just and that no one person or class of persons should be exempt from the payment of a tax, the collection of which is enforced against others. Per contra, that no one person or class of persons should be compelled to pay a tax which is not enforced against others. The fault of our system in this regard—a fault of which the taxpayer may justly be heard to complain—is not in the assessment of intangible property represented by the difference between the market value of the stock and the value of the tangible property, but it is in calling this difference the value of the "franchise" and taxing it as franchise. A franchise is simply a special privilege granted by the state directly or through one of its mandatories. When that privilege is the privilege of being a corporation, when the franchise granted is simply the franchise to be a corporation, that franchise can have no greater value than what it has cost the incorporators to obtain it and what it would cost other incorporators to obtain the identical privilege. Since in this state these franchises are open to all upon the same conditions, that cost is the mere expense of filing papers and procuring clerks' certificates, say $10, and it cannot be said that such a franchise or privilege can ever be worth more than that amount while our laws remain unchanged. A tremendous distinction is, of course, to be observed between this franchise to be a corporation and some special franchise to do a particular thing, as the franchise to use a particular city street for street railroad purposes. Such a franchise, and others of like kind, often have enormous value, and this value comes from the fact that once granted, no other person can obtain them. It is not open to citizens upon the same terms, but it is in its nature monopolistic. But I advert to this merely in passing, for we are here dealing with the franchise to be a corporation.

To illustrate the fallacy of assessing the difference in value between the market value of stock and the value of the tangible property as franchise let us instance a case. Three men as copartners are engaged in the business of selling dry goods. By the exercise of varied qualities which go to make a business success they have developed an enormous and profitable business. They are assessed for the value of their tangible property, the stock on their shelves and their solvent credits or book accounts. They decide to incorporate, and without the slightest change in location, stock, book accounts, without the slightest change of any kind, they pay $10 to the state of California, obtain articles of incorporation and issue to themselves each one-third of the shares. These shares have a value far in excess of the total value of the goods on the shelves and of the solvent credits. Upon an investment say of $1,000,000 their profits show a return of 6 per cent. upon $10,000,000. Finding, therefore, the value of the solvent credits, and goods on hand at $1,000,000 and the value of the stock at $10,000,000, the assessor assesses this corporation $9,000,000 for its franchise, for which franchise but the day before it paid the state $10, and as to which franchise —which is merely the privilege as a corporation to carry on the business of buying and selling dry goods—any 3 men in the state of California may secure the identical privilege for the same expenditure of money. The necessary result would be that while yesterday the privilege was assessed for $1,000,000, to-day the corporation is assessed for $10,000,000, $9,000,000 of which is the so-called value of the franchise. I am not disputing the existence of this $9,000,000 of property. I do insist that it was not called into being, nor in any way created, through the privilege to be a corporation so granted by the state. This $9,000,000 is, and logically can be, nothing other than the good will of the business, which good will is itself a species of property distinctly recognized by the laws of this state, property capable of private ownership, and, therefore, property which should be assessed. And not only should it be assessed, but I insist it should be assessed not under the misleading and deceptive misnomer of franchise, but assessed, for what it really is, good will. (Civ. Code, §§ 655, 992, 993.) Even if the Legislature should declare that it should be assessed as franchise, this declaration does not make it franchise. The legislative declaration that it should be assessed as "beauty" would not make it beauty. The simple proof of the matter is that of this $9,000,000 assessed as franchise, $8,999,990 are in effect good will, and the remaining $10, is the value of the franchise. Nor do I think that this matter should be lightly put aside with the statement that as the property after all is assessed it does not matter under what name it pays its taxes. Logical results can only be reached by correct reasoning and correct reasoning and a true interpretation is essential to that great desideratum, the uniformity in operation of our revenue system. Therefore I am here contending that the property which is assessed should be assessed under its true name, and that this should be declared by this court, not only because it is the logical and correct interpretation of the law, but because it is of great moment that the assessors themselves should be properly directed in their delicate tasks, and that the taxpayer in turn should know upon just what property of his the law is imposing its burden. My position, therefore, is not that corporations should not pay this tax. But they should not be expected to pay it under the blind and misleading guise of franchise. They should be called upon to pay taxes upon the property as it actually is—the good will.

No Justice of this court, I think, disagrees with me upon the proposition that in fact it is the good will which is being assessed under the guise of franchise, and no one will question but if the good will of a corporation is thus subject to assessment in this state, the good will of every other business, whether carried on by a partnership or an individual, should equally be subject to taxation.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v. MODESTO IRRIGATION CO. et al.

(Sac. 1,408.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1906.)

1. Waters and Water Courses—Irrigation Districts — Assessments — Telegraph Lines.

An irrigation district, organized under St. 1887, p. 29, c. 34, authorizing the assessment of all the real property in the district for its revenue purposes, cannot assess the poles and wires of a telegraph company placed on the land of a railway company under a contract reserving them as the personal property of the telegraph company, as they are not real property within such provision.

2. Same.

Under Pol. Code, §§ 3617, 3663, defining real estate for taxable purposes as land including the improvements, except telegraph lines, which shall be assessed as personalty, and Bridgeford Act (St. 1897, p. 267, c. 189) § 39, providing that, on refusal of the directors to make the assessments in irrigation districts, the assessment made by the county assessor and the state board of equalization shall be the basis of assessment, an irrigation district cannot assess for revenue purpose the poles and wires of a telegraph company placed on the land of a railway company under a contract reserving such property as personalty.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by the Western Union Telegraph Company against the Modesto Irrigation Company and others to determine the validity of an irrigation assessment. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Judgment reversed, and the superior court directed to render judgment for plaintiff.

Brown & Wells, R. B. Carpenter, and Alexander H. Van Cott, for appellant. Dennett & Walthall, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. The plaintiff is a well-known corporation organized under the laws of the state of New York, engaged in the business of telegraphy, having certain franchises, rights, and privileges granted by the government of the United States, and having many telegraph lines in California, and in other parts of the United States and adjoining countries. The defendant the Modesto Irrigation Company is an irrigation district organized in July, 1887, under an act of the Legislature of this state providing for the organization of irrigation districts, approved March 7, 1887 (St. 1887, p. 29, c. 34), and generally known as the "Wright Act," and it has ever since continued its existence as such district under said acts and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto. The other defendants are directors of said irrigation district. The plaintiff is, and at the times mentioned in the complaint was, the owner of certain property, consisting of poles, wires, and other appliances, constituting 9½ miles of one of its telegraph lines, which runs over a right of way of a certain railroad corporation known as the "Southern Pacific Company" within the boundaries of the said Modesto irrigation district. The plaintiff put its said 9½ miles of poles, wires, etc., under a written contract with the said railroad which expressly declared that the poles, wires, etc., constituting said 9½ miles of telegraph line "shall be and remain the personal property of said plaintiff." In 1904 the defendants caused the said 9½ miles of poles, etc., to be assessed at the value of $1,100 as property taxable for the purpose of raising revenue for said irrigation district. Thereupon the plaintiff brought this suit to have determined the validity of said assessment, as it was authorized to do by section 69 of an act to provide for the organization of irrigation districts, approved March 31, 1897 (St. 1897, p. 276, c. 189), and generally known as the "Bridgeford Act." The case was tried without a jury and upon a stipulated state of facts, and the court rendered judgment for defendants. From this judgment plaintiff appeals.

There is no contest as to the facts in the case, which are substantially as above stated. The only question is whether the said property of plaintiff is legally assessable and taxable by the irrigation district. The main purpose of the statutes providing for irrigation districts is to enable owners of land that may be made more productive of vegetable growth by irrigation, and which are "susceptible of irrigation from a common source," to organize so as to more effectually accomplish such irrigation; and there is, therefore, some room for the alleged absurdity of irrigating the poles and wires of a telegraph line. But we will assume that such property is within the taxing power of the district if the letter of the law necessarily includes it. The statute under which the defendant was organized provides that for the purpose of revenue the assessor must assess "all of the real property within the district" (St. 1887, p. 37, § 18); and it is conceded, or, at least, it is the law, that no personal property can be subjected to taxation for such purpose. Said section provides that the assessor must prepare an assessment book, with headings, in which must be listed "all such property"; that is, all real property. One of the headings is "Land by Township, Range," etc., or "by Metes and Bounds or Other Sufficient Description," and the "Improvements Thereon." Another is "City and Town Lots, * * * with the Improvements Thereon." Under another heading there must be stated the cash value of the improvements on the land, whether city land or other lands, and also the "Cash Value of the Improvements of the Real Estate Assessed to Persons Other Than the Owners of the Real Estate." However, in providing for the enforcement of the payment of taxes, the statute seems to refer to land alone; as, for instance, by section 26, in the case of delinquency, the collector must add certain penalties to "each lot, tract, or piece of land," and in the event of sale for delinquency he must commence the sale at the head of the list of property and continue the sale in the numerical order of "the lots, or blocks"; and by section 27 he must sell to the person who will take "the least quantity of the land," and he must give to the purchaser a certificate containing a "description of the land sold"; and by section 30 it is provided that if no redemption be made the collector must make a deed to the purchaser, which shall convey to him the absolute title "to the land described therein." (These provisions are substantially the same as those contained upon the same subjects in the Bridgeford act.) It is therefore doubtful whether it is the intent of the law to enforce any tax upon mere "improvements," except as a part of the land improved, and whether the cash value of the improvements is not required merely to show the value of the land as enhanced by the improvements; and it is doubtful if the sale for delinquency of "an improvement," as distinct from the land, is contemplated. Plaintiff also contends that the right of way of the railroad company is not real property within the meaning of the statutes here relied on, and, further, that, even if it were, the poles, wires, etc., are not an "improvement," but really a burden. We notice these points because they are urged, but we do not think it necessary to pass upon them definitely because we think that the poles, wires, etc., are not assessable for the reason that they are not real property, but only personal property.

There is no doubt that articles of personal property owned by one person may be attached to land owned by another without becoming a part of the realty and without losing their character as personal property. For instance, trade fixtures annexed to land by tenants do not become part of the freehold even without any special agreement. And the general rule is that the intention of the parties determines the character of the annexed chattels and that they remain personal property if that be the intention of the parties when they are attached. This rule applies to third parties acquiring an interest in the land—as mortgagees, grantees, etc.—except where the mode of annexation is such that the attached property loses its character as personal property, as where it could not be removed without destroying it, or where it is necessary to the support or safety of that to which it is attached. In Hendy v. Dinkerhoff, 57 Cal. 3, 40 Am. Rep. 107, the court say: "It is well settled, as said by the Court of Appeals of New York, in Tifft v. Horton, 53 N. Y. 380, 13 Am. Rep. 537, 'that chattels may be annexed to the real estate and still retain their character as personal property.' See Voorhees v. McGinnis, 48 N. Y. 278, and cases there cited. Of the various circumstances which may determine whether in any case this character is or is not retained, the intention with which they are annexed is one; and if the intention is that they shall not, by annexation, become a part of the freehold, as a general rule they will not. The limitation to this is where the subject or mode of annexation is such that the attributes of personal property cannot be predicated of the thing in controversy (Ford v. Cobb, 20 N. Y. 344), as when the property could not be removed without practically destroying it, or where it or part of it is essential to the support of that to which it is attached." See, also, Tifft v. Horton, 53 N. Y. 380, 13 Am. Rep. 537; Memphis, etc., v. State, 6 Cold. (Tenn.) 311, 98 Am. Dec. 452; Chelsea Waterworks v. Bowley, 17 Q. B. 359; and Wiggins v. Ohio, 142 U. S. 415, 12 Sup. Ct. 188, 35 L. Ed. 1055. In the case at bar the poles, wires, etc., were easily removable and are in no sense essential to the support of that to which they are attached. We think, therefore, that they are not real property within the meaning of the irrigation law, but are personal property, not assessable for the revenue purposes of the district.

2. Moreover, we think that, for the purpose of the revenue to the district, the definitions of real property and personal property in the general revenue and taxation laws of the state as found in the Political Code, must prevail. They relate to the same subject as the revenue part of the law covering irrigation districts. Indeed it is expressly provided in section 39 of the Bridgeford act (St. 1897, p. 267, c. 189) that "in case of the neglect or refusal of the board of directors to cause such assessments and levies to be made, as in this act provided, then the assessment of property made by the county assessor and state board of equalization shall be adopted, and it shall be the basis of assessment for the district." Now, in section 3617 of the Political Code real estate is defined, for taxable purposes, as land including various kinds of interests therein, and "improvements" and it is declared that "the term 'improvements' includes all buildings, structures, fixtures, fences, and improvements erected upon or affixed to land, except telephone and telegraph lines"; and in section 3663 of said Code it is provided that telegraph and telephone lines shall be "assessed as personal property by the assessor of the county." Considering these provisions of the general law touching assessment and taxation, we do not think that the respondent is in a position to ignore the character of personal property given to the poles, wires, etc., of appellant by the contract between it and the railroad company on whose right of way they were placed.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the superior court is directed to render judgment for plaintiff as prayed for in its complaint.

We concur: SHAW, J.; HENSHAW, J.

We concur on the ground last stated. SLOSS, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.

BEATTY, C. J. (concurring). It has been assumed by both parties to this action and by the court that it is authorized by the terms of the Bridgeford act. I think it more than doubtful whether the provisions of sections 68, 69, of that act (St. 1897, p. 276, c. 189) were ever intended, or can be construed, to authorize an action to determine the validity of the assessment of particular property to an individual taxpayer. But, waiving that question, I concur in the judgment, and in the opinion as to the matters discussed.

WHITE v. SAGE. (Sac. 1,380.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 30, 1906.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—COMPLAINT.

A complaint setting out a contract of sale of land by plaintiff to defendant, averring tender of deed by plaintiff, accompanied by demand for payment of price, refusal of defendant to pay, that plaintiff is the owner in fee and ready and willing to convey; that he has a lien, as vendor, for the price, and asking judgment for the balance of purchase money; that defendant be given a reasonable time to pay the same; and that, in default of such payment, defendant's interest in the land be sold, the proceeds applied on the amount due, defendant's rights to the land foreclosed, and execution be awarded against defendant's other property for any balance after such application of the proceeds—is one for specific performance.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Specific Performance, §§ 356, 357.]

2. SAME—ALLEGATIONS AS TO CONSIDERATION.

A complaint by the vendor for specific performance of a contract of sale, merely alleging the contract price, without showing that the consideration of defendant's contract to buy was adequate, or that as to him the contract was just and reasonable, in the absence of which facts Civ. Code, § 3391, provides that a contract cannot be specifically enforced against a party, is insufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Specific Performance, § 358.]

3. SAME—JUDGMENT—FINDINGS.

Failure to find the value of the land is ground for reversal of a judgment for specific performance of a contract to buy land.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by S. J. White against W. A. Sage. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Frank McGowan and Elmer Westlake, for appellant. F. B. Brown and Dixon L. Phillips, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant, Sage, appeals from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The complaint is by the vendor in an executory agreement for the sale of land to enforce the performance of the contract by the vendee. It sets out the contract, a tender by the plaintiff accompanied by a demand for payment of the price, and the refusal of the defendant to pay, avers that the plaintiff is the owner in fee and is ready and willing to convey, and that he has a lien, as vendor, for the price, upon the defendant's equitable interest under the contract, and asks for judgment against the defendant for the balance of the purchase money unpaid, that defendant be given a reasonable time, to be fixed by the court, within which to pay the same, and that, in default of such payment, the defendant's interest in the land be sold, the proceeds applied on the amount adjudged due, that defendant's rights to the land be thereupon foreclosed, and for judgment and execution against the other property of the defendant for any balance of the price remaining unpaid after the application thereon of the proceeds of said sale. It is clearly a suit of the character formerly cognizable in equity alone to enforce the specific performance of a contract, and is an appeal to the equity jurisdiction of the court. Sparks v. Hess, 15 Cal. 194; Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17. A demurrer to the complaint on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to state a cause of action was overruled by the court.

We think the complaint was insufficient, and that the demurrer should have been sustained. By the contract sought to be enforced, which was executed on July 28, 1903, White agreed to sell and convey to Sage 80 acres of land for the sum of $11,000, and Sage agreed to buy the same at said price, paid $10 down, and promised to pay the remainder of $10,990 on or before August 15, 1903. There is no allegation that the land was worth the price agreed to be paid, nor any allegation whatever as to its value, nor any averment that the price is adequate or in fair proportion to the value of the land, nor that Sage ever had possession of the land nor of any other facts going to show that the consideration of the contract of Sage to buy the land was adequate, or that, as to him, it is just and reasonable. For want of such showing the complaint must be held insufficient to authorize a court of equity to enforce performance.

Civ. Code, § 3391, declares that "specific performance cannot be enforced against a party to a contract in any of the following cases: (1) If he has not received an adequate consideration for the contract; (2) if it is not, as to him, just and reasonable; (3) if his assent was obtained by the misrepresentation, concealment, circumvention or unfair practices of any party to whom performance would become due under the contract." In Bruck v. Tucker, 42 Cal. 353, upon this point the court said: "The agreement alleged must be one which in all its features appeals to the judicial discretion as being fit to be enforced in specie—as having been obtained without any intermixture of unfairness. Hence, if it appear that the bargain, though obligatory in point of mere law, and one not to be set aside in equity, is, nevertheless, a hard bargain, the court will not relieve. Of such a bargain Lord Hardwicke said: 'The constant rule of the court is not to carry it into execution.' The same view was asserted by the chancellor in Seymour v. Delancey, 6 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 222, where the value which the complainant was to pay was, by the estimate of the court, a little less than one-half that of the estate bargained for." In Prince v. Lamb, 128 Cal. 128, 60 Pac. 692, the same principle was approved, and it was said: "These principles are not restricted to contracts for the conveyance of land, but they apply in all cases where the equitable jurisdiction of the court is invoked to enforce the specific performance of any obligation." In Stiles v. Cain, 134 Cal. 171, 66 Pac. 232, Mr. Justice Temple says on this subject: "There are, then, contracts which are perfectly valid, and which a court of equity will not set aside for fraud, mistake, or for any unfairness, but which, nevertheless, are so unfair that specific performance will not be decreed. This has always been the rule with courts of equity. They will not aid in the enforcement of a harsh and unjust contract, even though it be valid." This doctrine has been repeatedly affirmed by this court in other cases. Agard v. Valencia, 39 Cal. 302; Nicholson v. Tarpey, 70 Cal. 609, 12 Pac. 778; Kelly v. C. P. R. R. Co., 74 Cal. 562, 16 Pac. 386, 5 Am. St. Rep. 470; Morrill v. Everson, 77 Cal. 114, 19 Pac. 190; Ward v. Yorba, 123 Cal. 447, 56 Pac. 58; Windsor v. Miner, 124 Cal. 494, 57 Pac. 386; Fleishman v. Woods, 135 Cal. 261, 67 Pac. 276. These are all cases in which the vendee was seeking to compel the vendor to perform the contract by the execution of a deed. But this does not affect the rule of the Code. It applies with equal force to both parties. There is no reason why the "conscience of a chancellor" should not be as tender toward the buyer as toward the seller, if he is the victim of an unconscionable bargain.

The rule that the party seeking in equity the specific performance of a contract must aver facts which affirmatively show adequacy of consideration, and that it is just and reasonable as to the other party, is also well settled. In the first case on the subject (Agard v. Valencia, supra) the court says: "Another well-established rule in courts of equity is that in a suit for a specific performance it must be affirmatively shown that the contract is fair and just and that it would not be inequitable to enforce it. The court will not lend its aid to enforce a contract which is in any respect unfair or savors of oppression but in such cases will leave the party to his remedy at law. It is incumbent on the plaintiff, therefore, to state such facts as will enable the court to decide whether the contract is of such a character that it would not be inequitable to enforce it." Bruck v. Tucker, supra, is to the same effect. In Stiles v. Cain, supra, upon this proposition the court said: "This does not mean that it must be alleged in hæc verba that the contract was supported by an adequate consideration, and is, as to the defendant, fair and just. These might be held insufficient, but the fact that the contract is such as will satisfy the conscience of the chancellor, in the respects mentioned, must appear from a proper statement of facts." The same rule of pleading is declared in Ward v. Yorba, supra, Windsor v. Miner, supra, Prince v. Lamb, supra, Nicholson v. Tarpey, supra, Morrill v. Everson, supra, and Fleishman v. Woods, supra. The effect of these decisions is that the mere statement of the price agreed to be paid, as in this case, will not suffice. There must be a showing of the value, at least, so that the court can determine whether or not it was in reasonable proportion to the price to be paid, or of other facts which are sufficient to satisfy the court that the contract is just and reasonable to the buyer in all its material elements. There is an entire absence of anything of this nature in the complaint under consideration. The answer alleged that the value of the land at the time of the contract did not exceed $4,400, which was considerably less than one-half the price that Sage was to pay. The finding is evasive upon this question. There is no finding of the actual value of the land, but it is said therein that it is not true that "the said land was of the value and worth not exceeding the sum of $4,400," which finding could be true if the land was worth only $1 more. The failure to find on this issue also requires a reversal of the judgment. There is a bill of exceptions in the record, the authenticity of which is disputed, from which it appears that the uncontradicted evidence was that the value of the land did not exceed $4,400, so that if this bill of exceptions could be considered the finding, even in its evasive form, would be contrary to the evidence. But we do not consider it necessary to determine the question whether the bill of exceptions is properly in the record or not. It being incumbent upon the plaintiff to allege in his complaint facts showing adequacy of the consideration, and that the contract was just and reasonable as to the defendant, the demurrer should have been sustained, and for this error and the failure to find the value the judgment must be reversed, regardless of the question whether the evidence sustains the findings.

It is but fair to the court below to say that there is nothing in the record, or in the briefs, indicating that this defect in the complaint was ever called to its attention in argument.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to sustain the demurrer to the complaint and for further proceedings.

EDWARDS v. LECHLEITER (LECHLEITER et al., Interveners). (Sac. 1,210.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 5, 1906.)

1. Appeal—Review—Findings by Court—Conflicting Evidence.

Findings of the trial court, based on a material conflict in the evidence, will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Vendor and Purchaser—Improvements.

Where the purchaser of land took possession before paying the purchase price, and contracted that all buildings placed upon the land should be the property of the seller until the seller should be repaid advances that might be made by him to the purchaser, and the wife of the purchaser knew of the contract, the fact that one of the buildings was erected with her money did not entitle her to claim ownership of the building as against the seller, who had not been paid the purchase price or his advances.

Department No. 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; E. E. Gaddis, Judge.

Action by D. P. Edwards against J. A. Lechleiter, in which Mrs. J. A. Lechleiter and others intervene. From an order denying a new trial after judgment for plaintiff, defendant and certain interveners appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Sims, for appellants. Chas. W. Thomas, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. Judgment in the trial court went for plaintiff. The defendant, J. A. Lechleiter, and the interveners Mrs. J. A. Lechleiter and Emma Lechleiter, made a joint motion for a new trial. This motion was denied; and from the order denying it the defendant and interveners appeal. There is no appeal from the judgment.

About one-half of the transcript consists of numerous, voluminous, and rather wearisome pleadings and findings. The court found, in accordance with the material averments of the complaint, that on or about February 28, 1889, plaintiff was, and still is, the owner of three described lots of land in the town of Willows in Yolo county; that at said time the defendant contracted with plaintiff that he would pay to the latter the sum of $800 for said lots; that in pursuance of such contract defendant entered upon the possession of the lots and erected thereon a machine and blacksmith shop and placed therein certain machinery, implements, tools, etc., for the operation of the same, and constructed thereon a dwelling house; that it was also contracted between the parties that plaintiff should advance to defendant all the money necessary for the construction of said buildings and for the equipment of said shop with machinery, apparatus, implements, and tools, and that all the buildings, machinery, tools and other personal property placed by defendant on the lots should be, and remain, the property of the plaintiff until defendant should have repaid to plaintiff all the advances that should be made by the latter as aforesaid, and with interest; that plaintiff did advance money to defendant for said purposes to the amount of $1,100; that the defendant has not paid to plaintiff any part of the $800 to be paid for the lots or of the said $1,100 advanced by plaintiff; and that there is now due from defendant to plaintiff upon said contract the sum of $2,184.66. The judgment is that, if defendant shall pay to plaintiff the said sum of $2,184.64, with costs, within 60 days after the entry of the judgment, the plaintiff shall execute to defendant a deed conveying and transferring to him all the said property; but, if defendant shall fail to pay said money within said 60 days, then all the property shall be sold according to the law relative to the sale of property under execution, and the proceeds of the sale, or as much thereof as shall be necessary, applied to the satisfaction of the expenses of the sale and to the payment of the said sum of $2,184.66, and costs. It appears that at one time plaintiff and defendant agreed that $1,100 was the amount due for the advancements made by plaintiff, and that defendant gave plaintiff a note for that amount bearing interest, and, also, a chattel mortgage of all the property, as additional security. This chattel mortgage was of no material importance, except as showing the amount due for advancements at the time of its date. As there is no appeal from the judgment, no question arises as to its sufficiency in form or substance.

On the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial there are a few exceptions made to rulings on the admissibility of evidence, but we see no error in these rulings, and, moreover, they relate to matters of no vital consequence. The main points made by appellants are that the findings are not supported by the evidence, but there was material evidence in support of all the findings. The principal contention of defendant is that the $1,100 was the whole amount due including the $800 to be paid for the lots, but the testimony of plaintiff was directly to the point that the $1,100 was for the amount of the advancements, and was in addition to the $800; and, while the testimony of defendant contradicts that of plaintiff on this point, still there was on the subject only that material conflict of evidence which placed the determination of the fact entirely within the province of the trial court.

There is nothing in the contentions of the interveners. The intervener Mrs. J. A. Lechleiter is the wife of defendant, and her claim is that the residence building on the plaintiff's lots was destroyed by fire, and that it was rebuilt with her money. It is useless to inquire whether or not there was evidence enough to support that contention. She knew that plaintiff owned the lots, and knew of the contract between plaintiff and defendant, and there is no principle upon which she could claim ownership of the building erected on plaintiff's land. The other intervener is defendant's daughter, and her claim is that she got a money judgment in a justice's court against the defendant, and that execution issued thereon, and was levied on the property here involved. There is no evidence in the record showing the issuance or levy of such execution, but neither such execution or judgment would be of any value against the property of plaintiff herein.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed, and it is ordered that the 60 days mentioned in the judgment do now commence to run from the date of the filing of the remittitur on this appeal in the lower court.

1. MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—ACTION—PARTIES—PURCHASER FROM MORTGAGOR.

The title of a purchaser from a mortgagor is not affected by foreclosure proceedings to which he is not made a party.

3. QUIETING TITLE—PERSON ENTITLED TO RELIEF—MORTGAGOR—INVALID FORECLOSURE.

4. MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—EFFECT—INVALID PROCEEDINGS—POSSESSION.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action to quiet title by D. M. Burns against G. W. Hiatt. From a judgment determining the parties' rights, plaintiff and defendant appeal. Reversed on defendant's appeal, and remanded.

E. B. Mering, G. V. Martin, and W. A. Anderson, for plaintiff. A. C. Huston, for defendant.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This action was brought by plaintiff to obtain a decree quieting his title to the west 22 feet of lot 2, in block 4, in the city of Woodland; he alleging in his complaint that he was the owner and entitled to the possession of said property. The complaint was in the usual form of complaints in actions to quiet title. Judgment was given, first, that plaintiff was the owner in fee simple and entitled to the possession of said property; second, that he owns the same "subject to the rights of the defendant, Hiatt, under a certain indenture of mortgage made, executed and delivered on the 18th day of August, 1892, by George H. Jackson to the said G. W. Hiatt"; third, that said Hiatt has no right, title, or interest in said premises, "except such right, title, or interest as may be derived by the said Hiatt, under the said mortgage"; and, fourth, that a certain foreclosure proceeding instituted by said Hiatt on said mortgage, and the decree, judgment, and all proceedings therein, are null and void so far as plaintiff is concerned, and in no way bind him. These are appeals from said judgment, one by the defendant from the judgment in favor of plaintiff, and the other by plaintiff from that portion of the judgment decreeing that his ownership of the property is subject to the rights of defendant under said mortgage. Both appeals are on the judgment roll.

According to the findings of the trial court, based upon appropriate allegations in that behalf contained in defendant's answer, the material facts are as follows: On August 18, 1892, one Jackson was the owner and in possession of the property in controversy and other property, and on that day he borrowed $1,000 from defendant, giving him his note therefor, payable one day after date, with interest at the rate of 9 per cent. per annum, and also, as security for the payment thereof a mortgage on said premises, which mortgage was duly recorded on August 22, 1892. On November 29, 1893, said Jackson executed and delivered to plaintiff a grant, bargain, and sale deed of the property in controversy, which deed was duly recorded on the same day. On August 15, 1896, said note and mortgage being wholly unpaid, defendant commenced an action against Jackson for the foreclosure of said mortgage. Plaintiff was never made a party to this action. Proceedings were had in such action, resulting, on December 1, 1898, in a judgment for the sale of the mortgaged premises and the application of the proceeds to the payment of the amount found due, viz., $1,344.89. At the sale so ordered, defendant became the purchaser for the sum of $1,200. He subsequently, on August 30, 1899, received from the commissioner appointed to make the sale a deed for the premises, and immediately entered into the possession of all of the mortgaged premises, and has ever since been, and now is, in the actual and peaceable possession of the same, claiming to own the whole thereof. The court further found that the possession of said premises taken by defendant after the delivery of the commissioner's deed was without the consent of the plaintiff, and also that the note and mortgage are barred by the provisions of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

This action to quiet title was commenced on July 22, 1904, almost five years after defendant's possession commenced. Plaintiff not having been made a party to the foreclosure proceedings, his title to the mortgaged premises was, of course, in no way affected thereby. It is the universally accepted rule wherever a mortgage is only a lien not only before, but after, default in its conditions on the part of the mortgagor, that the title of the grantee of mortgaged premises is not affected by a foreclosure of the mortgage in an action commenced after the conveyance to him, unless he is made a party to the action. As to him, under such circumstances there is no foreclosure. This is not disputed by defendant. It does not, however, follow from this that he is entitled to a decree quieting his title against the mortgagee. He took the property under his deed from the mortgagor, subject to the lien of the mortgage, and as to such lien, he thenceforth stood in the place of the mortgagor. The proceeding to enforce such lien, although ineffectual against plaintiff by reason of the fact that he was not made a party, did not operate to divest the lien. His rights were in no way affected by the proceeding, and he acquired no additional right thereby. He simply continued to be the owner of the property, subject to the lien which had not been enforced; his situation in this regard being precisely the same as it would have been had no attempt to foreclose been made. The mortgage was not extinguished by the ineffectual attempt to enforce it. It is clear that where, for any reason, foreclosure proceedings are void, the legal title continues subject to the lien of the unpaid mortgage, and it appears to be well settled that a purchaser of the property at a foreclosure sale in such void proceedings thereby becomes an assignee of such mortgage, and the debt thereby secured, of which the mortgage is an incident, with all the rights of the original mortgagee. See Miner v. Beekman, 50 N. Y. 337; Townshend v. Thomson, 139 N. Y. 152, 34 N. E. 891; Turman v. Bell, 54 Ark. 273, 15 S. W. 886, 26 Am. St. Rep. 35; Cooke v. Cooper, 18 Or. 142, 22 Pac. 945, 7 L. R. A. 273, 17 Am. St. Rep. 709; Bryan v. Kales, 162 U. S. 411, 16 Sup. Ct. 802, 40 L. Ed. 1020; Bryan v. Brasius, 162 U. S. 415, 16 Sup. Ct. 803, 40 L. Ed. 1022; Investment Sec. Co. v. Adams (Wash.) 79 Pac. 625; Frische v. Kramer's Lessee, 16 Ohio, 125, 47 Am. Dec. 368; 2 Jones on Mortgages, § 1395.

So far, therefore, as the claim of plaintiff that his title should be quieted against the mortgage is concerned, we have the case presented in Brandt v. Thompson, 91 Cal. 458, 27 Pac. 763, viz., that of a party standing in the position of a mortgagor seeking to quiet his title against the mortgagee, without paying or offering to pay the debt for which the mortgage was created. It is the settled rule in this state that this cannot be done, even though the mortgage debt be barred by the statute of limitations. In Brandt v. Thompson, supra, which was an action by a mortgagor in possession to quiet his title against the mortgagee under such circumstances, it was said: "But such a result cannot be achieved. It would be against general equitable principles and adjudicated cases [citing cases]. * * * The only way for a party in respondent's position to quiet a mortgage is to pay it. * * * Respondent can have no remedy in the premises without paying or tendering the amount due appellant on his mortgages." The same rule was previously applied in Booth v. Hoskins, 75 Cal. 276, 17 Pac. 225, which was also an action to quiet title by a mortgagor in possession, and in which the mortgage debt was barred by the statute of limitations. In Spect v. Spect, 88 Cal. 437, 26 Pac. 203, 13 L. R. A. 137, 22 Am. St. Rep. 314, which was an action in ejectment by the successor of the mortgagor against a mortgagee in possession, it was pointed out that the rights which grow out of the relations existing between mortgagor and mortgagee, as well as the remedies for the enforcement and and protection of those rights, are of equitable origin and are to be determined by the principles of equity, whether the right be asserted or the remedy sought in an action at law or in equity. It was there said: "Whenever a mortgagor seeks a remedy against his mortgagee, which appears to the court to be inequitable, whether it be to cancel the mortgage as a cloud upon his title, or to enjoin a sale under the power given by him in the security, or to recover from the mortgagee the possession of the mortgaged premises, the court will deny him the relief he seeks, except upon the conditions that he shall do that which is consonant with equity." It was further declared in that case that the fact that the debt is barred by the statute of limitations is immaterial in such a case; the statute barring the remedy only, and not extinguishing, or even impairing, the obligation of the debtor. As long as the obligation to pay the debt exists, it is not equitable that the mortgagor should have relief against the mortgage given to secure the same, and such relief can be given only on condition that he discharges the obligation. From what has been said, it is clear that plaintiff cannot complain of the judgment. He was not entitled to a judgment decreeing him to be the owner of the property free and clear of the alleged mortgage. It is suggested by him that the defendant in his answer does not set up any equity. He does fully set up the facts already stated, which show such equity, and we know of no reason why this is not sufficient.

Another question is presented by defendant's appeal from the judgment. Is he thereby given everything to which he is entitled upon the facts already stated? While the judgment declares that plaintiff's ownership is subject to the rights of defendant under the mortgage, and probably saves to defendant the right to take such affirmative proceedings as the law allows for the collection of the debt, a somewhat valueless privilege if the statute of limitations has run against his debt, as the court finds, it also undoubtedly entitles plaintiff to take and retain possession of the property. He is expressly adjudged as against defendant to be "the owner in fee simple and entitled to the possession" of the property, and this adjudication as to his right to possession is not at all qualified by any other portion of the judgment. The defendant, standing in the position of a mortgagee, is in possession of the mortgaged premises; this possession having been taken without the consent of plaintiff, standing in the position of the mortgagor, but having been taken and peaceably retained by him under a claim made in good faith that he owns the same by virtue of the attempted, but ineffectual, sale made in the foreclosure proceedings. By the judgment the person standing in the position of a mortgagor is given possession of the mortgaged premises without being compelled to pay the mortgage debt. The question is thus presented as to whether a mortgagee who has entered into and holds possession of the mortgaged premises, under such circumstances, can be thus disturbed in his possession, at the suit of a mortgagor having the legal title, who does not pay or offer to pay the mortgage debt.

In Spect v. Spect, supra, it was declared that, in consonance with the equitable principles applicable in the determination of the relative rights of mortgagor and mortgagee, "it is a settled rule that a mortgagor cannot maintain ejectment against his mortgagee until the debt is paid." This was said with reference to a mortgagee who had been placed in possession by the mortgagor; and as to such a case it is not seriously disputed by plaintiff that the rule is as stated in that case. It is universally declared by the decisions that ejectment will not lie on behalf of the mortgagor against a mortgagee who may properly be called a "mortgagee in possession." The contention of plaintiff is that no one can be included in that term unless he has entered into possession by reason of the agreement or assent of the mortgagor or his assigns that he have such possession under the mortgage and because of it—that, the mortgage being a mere lien not entitling the mortgagee to possession, some assent on the part of the mortgagor thereto is absolutely essential to a right to possession in the mortgagee. If we disregard all equitable considerations, this position of plaintiff is apparently impregnable. But the rule is based solely upon equitable considerations (see Spect v. Spect, 88 Cal. 443, 26 Pac. 203, 13 L. R. A. 137, 22 Am. St. Rep. 314), and, we think, means more than plaintiff's contention would make it mean.

Mr. Pomeroy, in his Equity Jurisprudence, declares the doctrine established by the courts in this matter to be that, while the mortgagee is declared to have no legal estate and is unable to recover possession against an unwilling mortgagor or owner of the fee subject to the mortgage, yet if the mortgagee, while the mortgage is still subsisting, does "in any lawful manner" obtain the possession, his interest under the mortgage enables him to retain such possession, and to defend it against the mortgagor, or those succeeding to his title. He further says: "If, through his [the mortgagor's] express consent, or through any other lawful means, the mortgagee has been permitted to obtain possession of the land, the mortgagor's only remedy is the equitable suit for a redemption." While admitting that it is difficult to reconcile this doctrine, on principle, with the theory that the mortgage is purely a lien, he declares that the doctrine is retained by the courts as settled. 3 Pomeroy, Eq. Juris. §§ 1189, 1190. Thus stated, in a manner which seems to us to be fully warranted by the authorities, the true rule would appear to be that where the mortgagee has, under color of the mortgage or legal proceedings based thereon, acquired possession without resort to force, fraud, or any other unlawful or wrongful means upon which he would be estopped to found a right, and under such circumstances as not to make it inequitable that he should retain such possession as security, he will be regarded as a mortgagee in possession, and his possession will not be disturbed at the suit of the mortgagor, unless the mortgagor first pay the mortgage debt. So stated, the rule is in consonance with the equitable maxim that he who seeks equity must do equity, and with the well-recognized rule applicable in determining the relative rights of mortgagor and mortgagee that, whatever the mere form of the action as shown by the complaint, the courts will not aid the mortgagor in obtaining a remedy that is inequitable, and will grant him the relief sought to which he may be entitled under strict legal rules only upon the condition that he shall do that which is equitable.

A long line of authorities holds that, where for any reason foreclosure proceedings are void, not only does the mortgage continue alive for the benefit of the mortgagee, or the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, as his assignee, but also, if the person entitled to the benefit of the mortgage peaceably and in good faith, under color of such foreclosure proceedings, enter into possession of the mortgaged premises, he does obtain possession in a lawful manner and is a mortgagee in possession, with all the rights incident thereto, and cannot be dispossessed by the mortgagor without payment of the debt. See Townshend v. Thomson, 139 N. Y. 152, 34 N. E. 891; Croner v. Cowdrey, 139 N. Y. 471, 34 N. E. 1061, 36 Am. St. Rep. 716; Shriver v. Shriver et al., 86 N. Y. 575; Cooke v. Cooper, 18 Or. 142, 22 Pac. 945, 7 L. R. A. 273, 17 Am. St. Rep. 709; Bryan v. Keles, 162 U. S. 411, 16 Sup. Ct. 802, 40 L. Ed. 1020; Romig v. Gillett, 187 U. S. 111, 23 Sup. Ct. 40, 47 L. Ed. 97; Investment Sec. Co. v. Adams (Wash.) 79 Pac. 625; Stouffer v. Harlan (Kan.) 74 Pac. 610, 64 L. R. A. 320; Backus v. Burke (Minn.) 65 N. W. 459. Under the rule as declared in these cases, it is immaterial whether possession is taken with or without the consent, express or implied, of the mortgagor. In Backus v. Burke, supra, the Supreme Court of Minnesota repudiated the doctrine enunciated in the earlier case of Roger v. Benton, 39 Minn. 39, 38 N. W. 765, 12 Am. St. Rep. 613, relied on by plaintiff, to the effect that consent of the mortgagor, express or implied, is essential. In Bryan v. Kales, supra, the Supreme Court of the United States declares the rule enunciated above to be the rule prevailing generally in the United States. In Stouffer v. Harlan, supra, is to be found an extended discussion of the question and the decisions thereon. It is there declared that the requirement of the rule that the mortgagee's possession must be obtained by lawful means does not mean that it must be obtained under a formal right capable of enforcement by legal process, but simply that it must not be obtained through any unlawful or wrongful act, upon which the mortgagee would be estopped to found a right. While decisions may be found upholding a contrary doctrine, we are of the opinion that the rule enunciated by the authorities cited is in full accord with equitable principles, and the necessary result of the views of this court as expressed in Brandt v. Thompson, supra, Booth v. Huskins, supra, and Spect v. Spect, supra. The justice of such a rule is shown by the facts of this case, where the possession peaceably and in good faith acquired under color of the foreclosure proceedings has been peaceably and in good faith maintained thereunder for nearly five years, and, the debt being barred, now constitutes the only real security for the debt for which the mortgage was given. The mortgagee ought not to be deprived of the security thus obtained and held, without payment of the amount thereby secured, and equitable principles prevent the accomplishment of such a result at the suit of the mortgagor or his successor.

Plaintiff claims that his contention that plaintiff may recover possession without paying the mortgage debt is fully supported by the decision of this court in Davenport v. Turpin, 43 Cal. 597, and this may be admitted. But we are satisfied that, in so far as that case supports such a contention, it is so opposed to the principles enunciated in the later California cases already cited that it cannot now be accepted as authority. The other California cases cited upon the question as to what constitutes a mortgagee in possession we do not consider in point here. As we understand the record, the land of plaintiff constituted only a portion of the mortgaged premises, and defendant purchased at the foreclosure sale and entered into possession of all of the mortgaged premises. Under these circumstances, the land of plaintiff is justly liable for only a portion of the original debt. The amount of the debt, and the proportion for which plaintiff's land is justly liable are questions that could have been determined in an action brought by plaintiff against defendant to have those matters determined, and possession awarded him upon paying the amount adjudged. Whether this can now be done in this action we do not decide.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for such proceedings as are not inconsistent with the views herein expressed. Plaintiff shall not recover his costs of appeal. Defendant shall recover his costs of appeal.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing. By the present decision the case of Davenport v. Turpin, 43 Cal. 597, is overruled, upon the assumption that it has been heretofore overruled, or set aside, by the decisions in Brandt v. Thompson, 91 Cal. 458, 27 Pac. 763, Spect v. Spect, 88 Cal. 437, 26 Pac. 203, 13 L. R. A. 137, 22 Am. St. Rep. 314, and other cases. It cannot be contended that Davenport v. Turpin has ever been expressly overruled or brought into question, and it has not been set aside by implication from the other decisions cited from our own reports for the reason that all those cases are clearly distinguishable on the facts. In those cases the mortgagees went into possession lawfully under the mortgagor while he was entitled to transfer the possession. In this case the defendant took possession of plaintiff's lot unlawfully after his mortgagor had transferred his right of possession to the plaintiff. He was not in any just sense a mortgagee in possession. Of the decisions cited from other jurisdictions it may be said that, with the single exception of Townshend v. Thomson, 139 N. Y. 152, 34 N. E. 891, they may all be distinguished by the fact that the mortgagee was rightfully in possession by consent of the mortgagor while he retained the title, or where the mortgagee had gone into possession under defective foreclosure proceedings, and where the controversy was wholly between mortgagor and mortgagee. Of course, in such cases the equity of the mortgagee against his mortgagor is more substantial than it is against a grantee of the mortgagor, whose right of possession by virtue of his grant has been violated by the unlawful entry of the mortgagee. The decision in the New York case does support the present decision, but it cannot be held to justify a reversal of one of our own decisions which has stood so long as a rule of property.

GLASSELL et al. v. HANSEN et al. (Sac. 1,370.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 31, 1906.)

APPEAL—REVERSAL—SCOPE OF ISSUES.

Plaintiff claimed the land in controversy as an accretion to his land, which was bounded by a river, and defendant claimed that the land first appeared as an island in the river and grew by accretions until the channel between the island and plaintiff's land was nearly filled up. The court found for defendant, and on appeal it was held that the evidence justified the finding, but that the court erred in not awarding plaintiff a strip of land included in the complaint and not a part of the island. The judgment was merely "Judgment and order reversed." Held, that on the next trial plaintiff was entitled to prove his original claim.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by Hugh Glassell and others against Ross Hansen and others. From a judgment in favor of defendant Hansen, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

George A. Lamont, Frank R. Devlin, and McNutt & Hannon, for appellants. A. C. Freeman, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. At the time of the commencement of this action the plaintiffs were, and for a great many years prior thereto they and their predecessors in interest had been, the owners in fee of a tract of land in Solano county known generally as the "Toland Ranch," and having as its eastern boundary what at the time of the inception of their title, and for many years after, was the western bank of the Sacramento river. After plaintiffs had become the owners of the Toland ranch the Sacramento river in front of said ranch commenced to fill up with alluvial deposits which increased in size from year to year until at the time of the bringing of this present action (May 23, 1899), the "made" land in what was formerly a part of the river, and in front of said ranch, amounted to about 140 acres. This present action was brought to recover this made land; the averments of the complaint being that plaintiffs were seised in fee and entitled to the possession thereof, and that defendants had entered thereon and ousted plaintiffs therefrom. The complaint was not verified, and the defendant Ross Hansen filed an answer in which he "denies each and every allegation in the plaintiffs' complaint contained"; and he afterwards filed a supplemental answer, in which he averred that the land in contest was swamp and overflowed land belonging to the state, and that the state in 1885 conveyed said land by a patent to one Kate Nelson, from whom the title by mesne conveyances vested in said defendant. The other defendants disclaim. The court, on the trial out of which this present appeal arises, gave judgment for defendant Hansen. Plaintiffs made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and from the order denying the motion for a new trial plaintiffs now appeal.

There had been a prior trial of the case, and an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendants and from an order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial. See Glassell v. Hansen, 135 Cal. 547, 67 Pac. 964. At the first trial plaintiffs claimed title upon the theory that the said made land in the river was the result of accretions to plaintiffs' said land lying on the west bank of the river, and, therefore, by a well-established principle, belonging to them as owners of the land to which the made land was thus annexed. Defendants' position was that the origin of this new land was an island which first appeared near the center of the river; that for a time this island divided the river into two nearly equal streams—one flowing to the east and the other to the west of the island, each large enough for the passage of steamboats; that gradually the island, which was called "Decker Island," grew by accretions to its western side until the western stream of the river became nearly filled up, although there still remains between the island and the mainland a depression or slough which plainly divides the one from the other, and that the accretions were all to the island, and not to the Toland ranch on the mainland; and that therefore the new land was, under section 1016 of the Civil Code, the property of the state, and did not become part of plaintiffs' mainland by accretion. At the first trial the court found in accordance with defendants' contention and rendered judgment accordingly. Plaintiffs appealed from that judgment, and also from an order denying their motion for a new trial. This court disposed of the appeals by holding that the trial court was right in finding that the land in contest, outside of the calls of the original patent of the Toland ranch, was an island, and did not belong to plaintiffs by accretion, but that the court erred in not giving plaintiffs judgment for a strip of land described in the complaint which was not part of the island; and for this latter reason the judgment and order denying a new trial were reversed.

When the case came on to be heard at the second trial, out of which this present appeal arises, the plaintiffs offered to introduce evidence tending to support their original claim that said made land consisted of accretions to the said mainland; but the court refused to allow them to introduce such evidence upon the ground that the judgment of this court on the first appeal had finally determined that the new or made land in the river was an island, and not formed by accretions to the mainland owned by plaintiffs. This ruling was clearly erroneous. On that appeal this court merely held, as matter of law, that if the land was an island with its accretions, and was not made by accretions from the mainland, then it did not belong to plaintiffs, and that on the said first trial the evidence justified the finding of the lower court that the land was an island. But the court reversed the judgment and order denying a new trial upon another ground, namely, that there appeared to be a small strip of land included in the complaint and belonging to plaintiffs which was not part of the island, that the court had not found that the defendant was not in possession of that strip, and that therefore the judgment and order must be reversed. In reversing the case this court might have directed what issues should again be tried, and what should be deemed finally settled by the first trial. However, it did not do so, and the judgment was merely in the general terms "the judgment and order are reversed." This clearly left the whole case to be tried anew, as if it had not been tried before. Falkner v. Hendy, 107 Cal. 54, 40 Pac. 21, 386, and cases there cited. Of course, the law of the case was settled to be that islands formed in the beds of rivers belong to the state and not to the owners of land fronting on the river bank; but the question whether or not the land in contest in the case at bar was an island or was formed by accretions from the mainland was as fully at issue at the second trial as at the first.

The learned counsel for respondents contends that the court did not limit the evidence as above stated; but this contention cannot be maintained. At the beginning of the statement on motion for a new trial the following appears: "After a discussion between the court and counsel as to the issues to be tried, the court held that, under the decision of the Supreme Court in this case (135 Cal. 547, 67 Pac. 964), the issues as to the island are settled, and that no testimony is to be introduced on that subject. The Court (after reading the said decision of the Supreme Court): Proceed with your testimony. I see no reason for opening that again. There will not be any testimony on the island part at all. That I think is sufficiently settled by this decision. Mr. McNutt (appearing for plaintiff): We want to reserve the question, of course. I suppose the regular way would be to introduce the witness and offer proof. The Court: Suppose you offer a witness and make statement of what you propose to prove by this witness; then you could get your objection to the ruling of the court. Thereupon, E. C. Dozier was called as a witness for the plaintiffs. (Explanation, and the map used on a former trial is brought in and affixed to the blackboard.) The witness testified that he knew the land in controversy since 1869, and knew the Sacramento river since that time, and knew there had been some filling in of the river since he resided there, and that he had opportunities of observing how the river had filled in. Q. By Mr. Lamont (attorney for plaintiffs): Now I wish you would explain to the court how that has taken place there with regard to this land in controversy. Mr. Freeman (attorney for defendant): I object, now, that it appears that the testimony is to be respecting land in the Sacramento river, to which plaintiffs have shown no title or claim of title. The testimony of the witness should be excluded until there is some evidence. Mr. Lamont: Of course, we will follow that. Mr. Freeman: It seems to me that it ought to precede it, although it is in the discretion of the court at last. The Court: What is the purpose of this testimony? Mr. Lamont: The purpose is to show that this is accretions from the mainland. We will follow that by the patent and deraignment of title, of course, from the government down to the plaintiffs in this action. The Court: As I understand it, you propose by this witness to show that this piece of land in controversy—all of it—is accretions to the land to which it is now joined. Mr. Lamont: Yes, or, at least, a portion of it. The Court: In other words, the purpose is to show that this piece of land in controversy, which has been called an island by the Supreme Court, is, in fact, not an island, but is accretions to the land of your client. Mr. Lamont: That is our idea."

There were further offers and discussions similar to the preceding, and the court sustained objections to the testimony. The foregoing shows, we think, very clearly that the court excluded evidence as above stated, and the effect of the ruling was not changed because afterwards plaintiffs were allowed to introduce evidence tending to show that "if the land grows both ways from the land side and from the island side" a certain part of the land in contest was comprised of accretions from the land side. Plaintiffs should have been allowed to show, if they could, that all the land in the river in front of their land was formed by accretions from their land. Plaintiffs sought, also, to show title to the land in contest by prescription, claiming to have been in the actual and adverse possession thereof for more than five years before the commencement of the action. There was a good deal of evidence introduced by both parties on this issue of plaintiffs' title by prescription. We do not deem it necessary to notice such evidence in detail. It is sufficient to say that plaintiffs failed to show such title by actual possession, by pasturing of stock, or by any other means; and, as this issue was fully and fairly tried, we do not think that it would be right or just to compel defendant to try it over again.

A new trial will, therefore, be ordered only as to the question: Was the made land in contest formed by an island and its accretions, or by accretions from the mainland?

The order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial on the sole issue whether the made land in the Sacramento river opposite plaintiffs' tract of land called the "Toland Ranch" was formed by accretions from the mainland belonging to plaintiffs, or whether said made land appeared as an island and grew from accretions to such island.

MURRAY v. LLEWELLYN IRON WORKS CO.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 27, 1906.)

1. NEGLIGENCE—FIRES—ORIGIN—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.
In an action for damages from fire alleged to have resulted from the negligence of defendant's servants, the fact that the evidence as to the origin of the fire was circumstantial did not render it inadmissible.

2. TRIAL — INSTRUCTIONS — WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.
An instruction that the jury should consider the facts in evidence in determining whether or not the fire referred to in the complaint was due to a specified cause was not objectionable as a charge on the weight of the evidence.

3. WITNESSES—CREDIBILITY—EMPLOYMENT BY PARTY.
An instruction that the jury should receive the testimony of the defendant's employés the same as the testimony of any other witness, and determine the credibility of such employés by the same principles and tests as would be applied to any other witness, was erroneous and properly denied.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, § 1187.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Action by C. F. Murray against the Llewellyn Iron Works Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jones & Weller and Davis, Rush & Willis, for appellant. Russ Avery and Anderson & Anderson, for respondent.

SMITH, J. Appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff and an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial. The plaintiff is the owner of a building and lot fronting on Los Angeles street, adjoining the Huntington Building, which extends from Los Angeles street to Main street and abuts on the north on Sixth street; and he brought this suit for damages to his building and other property on his lot from fire, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant's servants, who at that time were engaged in working on the Huntington Building. There was no direct proof of the origin of the fire, which occurred in the early hours of the 6th of October; but it appears from the evidence that the work on which the defendant's employés were engaged required the use of rivets heated to a white heat, which were habitually thrown from the heater to the riveter and caught for the latter in a bucket. It sometimes happened, however, that the rivets were not caught, but, while the men were working on the south side of the building, would sometimes fall over the line onto the land of the plaintiff, or the land of his neighbor adjoining on the rear. It was in proof that this happened twice on the morning of the 5th, between the hours of 10 and 12 o'clock, the rivet falling, on one occasion, on the lot adjoining just to the rear of plaintiff's lot, and the other across the fence on his lot; and on each occasion a fire was started, which was extinguished by the defendant's employés. Evidence of similar occurrences upon other occasions before and after the fire was also given. The plaintiff's theory is that the origin of the fire in question was similar to that of the fires that had thus occurred, and much evidence was introduced to exclude the probability of its having originated otherwise.

Numerous points are urged by the defendant, but we think they are all untenable. The evidence as to the origin of the fire was, indeed, circumstantial only; but it was not on that account inadmissible (Code Civ. Proc. § 1832), and we think it was sufficient to sustain the verdict. The instruction complained of does not instruct the jury as to the weight of evidence, but simply that they were to consider the facts in evidence "in determining whether or not the fire referred to in the complaint * * * was due to the same cause." Nor did the court refuse to instruct the jury that "defendant's employés were entitled to due credit as witnesses." The request of the defendant was that the jury should be instructed "to receive the testimony of such witness * * * the same as that of the testimony of any other witness, and to determine the credibility of such employé by the same principles and tests by which they would determine the credibility of any other witness," which would have been manifestly erroneous.

There are some other objections on the part of appellant, but we deem it unnecessary to consider them. On the whole, we find no error in the record.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. v. BOVARD.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 9, 1906.)

PUBLIC LANDS—RAILROAD GRANTS—INDEMNITY LANDS—SELECTION.

The determination by the United States Supreme Court that the grant to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company by Act Cong. March 3, 1871, 16 Stat. 573, c. 122, did not include land within the limits of the grant made by Act Cong. July 27, 1866, 14 Stat. 292, c. 278, to the Atlantic & Pacific Company, refers only to lands within the 20-mile limit of the Southern Pacific Railroad Line falling within the like limits of the Atlantic & Pacific, and does not apply to indemnity lands to which the title accrues only on selection, and which may be selected from any public lands of the United States within the indemnity limits.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company against M. M. Bovard. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

M. C. Hester, for appellant. William Singer, Jr., and Guy Shoup, for appellee.

SMITH, J. The suit was brought to foreclose the rights of the defendant under a contract for the sale of the land in question, made by the plaintiff to the defendant March 9, 1887. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff, requiring the defendant to pay the plaintiff the sums due on the contract, amounting to $2,681.19, with interest, etc., within 30 days of the date of the decree, or otherwise to be foreclosed of his rights under the contract. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

By the terms of the agreement the plaintiff agreed to sell and the defendant to buy the land described in the contract for the sum of $1,536.70, payable with interest, as follows: $307.34 and one year's interest in advance on the remainder, $86.06, on the execution of the contract; and the balance, with interest at 7 per cent., March 9, 1892. It was further provided that a deed should be executed upon receipt of a patent, and, in case it should appear that plaintiff was not entitled to a patent, all moneys paid should be returned without interest. The defense is, in effect, that it has been finally determined by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that plaintiff is not entitled to a patent; and in a cross-complaint the defendant seeks to recover the amount paid under the contract. The land in question "is within the place limits of the grant made to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company by act of Congress approved July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 292, c. 278), and is also within the indemnity limits of the grant made to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company by act of Congress approved March 3, 1871 (16 Stat. 573, c. 122), and was selected by said Southern Pacific Railroad Company in due form under the act of March 3, 1871." This selection was approved by the register and receiver of the United States land office at Los Angeles on October 3, 1887; but it appears from the stipulation that the selection was set aside by order of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office on April 15, 1898, and the lands included in the selection, including the land in controversy, restored to the public domain.

It is found by the court that it has not been determined, by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States or otherwise, that plaintiff is not entitled to a patent; and whether upon the facts stipulated this finding can be sustained is the only question involved. The contrary is claimed by the appellant upon the authority of U. S. v. S. P. R. R. Co., 146 U. S. 570, 13 Sup. Ct. 152, 36 L. Ed. 1091, Id., 146 U. S. 615, 13 Sup. Ct. 163, 36 L. Ed. 1104, and Southern Pac. R. R. Co. v. Painter, 113 Cal. 251, 45 Pac. 320; where it is held, in effect, that the grant to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company by the act of March 3, 1871, did not include land within the limits of the grant made by the act of 1866 to the Atlantic & Pacific Company. But these decisions refer only to lands within the 20-mile limit of the Southern Pacific Railroad falling within the like limits of the Atlantic and Pacific. They have no application to indemnity lands, to which the title accrues only upon selection, and which may be selected from any public lands of the United States within the indemnity limits. U. S. v. S. P. R. R. Co., 146 U. S. 615, 13 Sup. Ct. 163, 36 L. Ed. 1104; S. P. R. R. Co. v. U. S., 183 U. S. 519, 22 Sup. Ct. 154, 46 L. Ed. 307; Ryan v. Railroad Co., 99 U. S. 382, 25 L. Ed. 305; Southern Pac. Co. v. Lipman (Cal. Sup.) 83 Pac. 445.

We are of the opinion that the judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: GRAY, P. J.; ALLEN, J.

WYCKOFF v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 10, 1906.)

TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS AS TO MATTER OF FACT.

Under Const. art. 6, § 19, providing that judges shall not charge with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law, it is error to charge that the fact, if found, that the engine colliding with a team at a crossing was running 35 miles an hour does not establish negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, §§ 442–445.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by Will E. Wyckoff against the Southern Pacific Company. From an order granting plaintiff a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. McKinley, for appellant. Charles H. Mattingly, for respondent.

GRAY, P. J. This is an action for personal injuries to plaintiff, incurred in a collision between a locomotive of defendant and a span of horses and wagon driven by plaintiff at a street crossing in the town of Burbank in Los Angeles county. The verdict was for the defendant, and the defendant appeals from an order of the court granting plaintiff a new trial.

The testimony of the plaintiff as a witness in his own behalf was in effect as follows: Plaintiff and his father were driving into the town of Burbank in a two-horse wagon on Verdugo street. About 300 feet from defendant's track they discovered a horse fast in a wire fence. They stopped there, and both went to the relief of the horse. Finding it necessary to cut the wire, that the horse might be released, the plaintiff returned to the wagon and drove in a walk in the direction of the railroad track, intending to cross the same for the purpose of obtaining some wire nippers. When he reached the wagon he looked and listened to learn whether any trains were approaching. He could hear none and see none "on account of the boxcars that were along the side track between the main track and the section houses, and the shade trees around the section houses, and also the drying plant." As he proceeded toward the track he kept up a diligent looking and listening for trains. He had no view of the track until he emerged from between two box cars standing on the side track only a few feet from the main track. He knew the next train due would be from the south, and accordingly, as soon as he could see the track he looked in that direction, and, seeing no train, looked the other way, discovering a "wild" locomotive approaching at a speed of some 35 miles an hour without giving any warning of its approach with bell or whistle. He was then very near the track, and, as he says, "I was terribly excited to find myself in such peril, and my first thought was to get across and get out of the way, and I jumped forward into the wagon and tried my best to get across, and come nearly getting across, and the engine got the back end of the wagon and hurled it into the air." He also says: "There was no time from the time I started across the railroad track when I was not looking and listening for that train." There was other evidence tending to show that the bell was sounded and warning duly given on approaching the crossing, and otherwise conflicting with the foregoing.

The new trial was granted because of an instruction given to the jury, which reads as follows: "If you find that the engine was running at the rate of 35 miles an hour, that fact does not establish negligence upon the part of defendant, because no duty rested upon it to run its train or engine at a less rate of speed at the point in question." With reference to this instruction, we quote from the opinion of the trial court as follows: "Section 19 of article 6 of our state Constitution provides: 'Judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact but may state the testimony and declare the law.' The rate of speed under the circumstances of the case was a question of fact and not a question of law. It was one of the ingredients of negligence charged against the defendant by the plaintiff. The court could not say, as a matter of law, under the circumstances of the case, that it was not negligent for the defendant to run its engine at so great a rate of speed." We think this is sound, and that the new trial was properly granted, for the reason given by the trial court.

It will be needless to discuss any other points raised in the briefs, for the reason that they may not arise upon a new trial of the case.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: ALLEN, J.; SMITH, J.

FREEMAN v. BROWN.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 12, 1906.)

APPEAL—ORDERS APPEALABLE—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—AMENDMENT OF STATEMENT.

An order denying defendant's motion to amend his statement on motion for a new trial by inserting specifications therein, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, providing for the amendment of pleadings, is appealable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by J. W. Freeman against Robert A. Brown. From an order denying defendant's motion to amend his statement on motion for a new trial, he appeals. On motion to dismiss. Denied.

George L. Keefer and Walter L. Bowers, for appellant. H. M. Barstow and Barstow & Variel, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order denying the defendant's motion to amend his statement on motion for a new trial by inserting specifications therein. The plaintiff moves to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the order is not appealable.

Appellant by his motion and application sought relief under section 473, Code Civ. Proc. The order denying such relief is appealable. Murphy v. Stelling, 138 Cal. 642, 72 Pac. 176; Kaltschmidt v. Weber, 136 Cal. 675, 69 Pac. 497.

Motion to dismiss is denied.

SMITH, J. I concur in the order denying the motion to dismiss the appeal in this case, and also in the opinion that the decision in Murphy v. Stelling, 138 Cal. 642, 72 Pac. 176, is directly in point. But I regard that case as merely an application of the more general principle that all orders made in proceedings for a new trial which have the effect of finally disposing of the motion are special orders made after final judgment, and therefore appealable. Hayne on New Trial, § 146; Calderwood v. Peyser, 42 Cal. 115, and cases cited; McDonald v. McConkey, 57 Cal. 326; Clark v. Crane, 57 Cal. 633; Griess v. State Investment Co., 93 Cal. 411, 28 Pac. 1041; Stoneesifer v. Kilburn, 94 Cal. 42, 29 Pac. 332; Sutton v. Symons, 97 Cal. 476, 32 Pac. 588; Id., 100 Cal. 576, 35 Pac. 158; Symons v. Bunnell, 101 Cal. 223, 35 Pac. 770; Kaltschmidt v. Weber, 136 Cal. 675, 69 Pac. 497; Murphy v. Stelling, 138 Cal. 641, 72 Pac. 176. This, however, as said in the case last cited, will not apply to a mere refusal of the court to settle the statement in cases where the moving party is by law entitled to have it settled. In such a case there is no order, and therefore the only remedy is mandamus.

SOULE v. SOULE.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 12, 1906.)

1. DIVORCE—DECREE FOR ALIMONY—MODIFICATION—JURISDICTION.

Civ. Code, § 139, provides that, where a divorce is granted for an offense of the husband, the court may compel him to make a suitable allowance to the wife for her support during her life or for a shorter period, and may from time to time modify its orders in such respect. Held that, where a divorce decree awarded plaintiff alimony at the rate of $75 per month, the court had statutory authority to modify the decree so as to relieve defendant from further payment of such alimony, though the decree contained no reservation for such modification.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Divorce, § 692.]

2. SAME—CONSENT DECREE—EVIDENCE.

In a proceeding by a husband to obtain a modification of a decree for alimony, evidence held insufficient to establish that the provision for alimony was inserted pursuant to an agreement of the parties that the alimony should be paid during plaintiff's life.

3. SAME — PERMANENT ALIMONY — MODIFICATION.

Permanent alimony, being distinguished from temporary alimony only in the sense that it is awarded on or after the determination of the suit, is subject to be increased or diminished, as authorized by Civ. Code, § 139.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Divorce, §§ 692–695.

4. TRIAL—FINDINGS BY COURT—EFFECT.

On an application for a modification of permanent alimony, the failure of the court to find in accordance with plaintiff's averment that her transfers of property were made in consideration of an agreement on defendant's part to pay her $75 a month as alimony for the remainder of her life was, in legal effect, a finding that such conveyances were not made on that consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, §§ 940–945.]

5. DIVORCE — ALIMONY — DECREE—MODIFICATION.

A divorce decree awarded plaintiff alimony in the sum of $75 per month. On an application for modification, the court found that defendant was entitled to an order modifying the decree and exempting him from payment of any allowance to plaintiff until further order of the court. An order was subsequently entered that the decree "be, and the same is, hereby modified by annulling" that portion thereof directing payment of such alimony. Held, that the portion of such decree annulling so much of the former decree as awarded alimony was erroneous and in excess of the court's jurisdiction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; H. A. Melvin, Judge.

Suit by Ella Bacon Soule against Frank Soule. On petition of defendant for modification of a decree awarding plaintiff alimony. From an order granting such relief, plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Lloyd & Wood and A. Heynemann, for appellant. Deamer & Stetson, for respondent.

HARRISON, P. J. A decree of divorce between the parties herein was rendered by the superior court of the county of Alameda December 19, 1896, of which the following is a portion: "It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed by this court that the defendant shall pay to the plaintiff the sum of $75 per month in United States gold coin for her support, which said sum of $75 shall be payable on the 5th day of each and every month and shall be permanent alimony." In August, 1903, the defendant therein, in pursuance of previous notice thereof, moved the court for an order vacating and annulling the above portion of the judgment, and releasing him from the payment of any further sums under the provisions of the decree, stating generally as the grounds of his motion that the circumstances of the parties to the judgment had materially changed since its rendition; that he was unable further to continue said payments, and that the plaintiff had no need of support from him; that it was not necessary, just, or equitable that he be longer required to make any payment for her support; and in connection therewith presented an affidavit setting forth the facts relied upon by him in support of said motion. The plaintiff filed an objection to the court entertaining the motion, on the ground that, inasmuch as no appeal had been taken from the judgment and the time for an appeal had expired, the court had no jurisdiction to make the order asked for. The court overruled this objection, and the plaintiff then filed her affidavit in reply to the application, traversing many of its averments, and averring that intermediate the commencement of the action and the rendition of the decree the defendant agreed with her that, if she would assign her interest in certain insurance policies and in certain real estate, he would, in consideration of such assignment and transfer, pay to her the sum of $75 per month as alimony, and that said payment should continue for all time during the life of the plaintiff; that she accepted said proposition and made said assignments; and that the court signed a decree in conformity with such agreement. At the hearing of the motion testimony was given by the respective parties, and by the attorneys by whom the action for divorce had been conducted, and upon its conclusion the court found, among other facts that the plaintiff is a wealthy woman; that her fortune has greatly increased since the making and entry of the decree, and is more than sufficient for her support and maintenance and the support and maintenance of her children; that the defendant is poor and in debt, and that his income has not increased since the making and entry of said decree, but his necessary expenses and the cost of living have increased; that the monthly payment of said sum of $75 to the plaintiff by him works a hardship on him, and is not necessary to the plaintiff for her support and maintenance, or for the support or maintenance of any one depending upon her; that said sum is necessary for the proper support of the defendant and his family. The court also found that prior to the entry of the decree the plaintiff quitclaimed to the attorneys for the defendant her interest in certain of his separate real property (of the value of about $1,500) and in certain community property (of the value of about $400) which he had previously conveyed to them as security for their fees, and transferred to her children, the issue of the marriage between her and the defendant, her interest in a certain paid-up policy of life insurance (her interest therein being contingent upon her surviving the defendant, and in case she did not survive him the policy being payable to the said children); that, as a part of the consideration for the said assignments, it was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant that the decree in the action should contain the above-quoted provision. The court further found that the defendant did not agree to or with the plaintiff that he would pay the said sum of $75 per month or any sum during her life, or that any sum agreed by him to be paid to her as alimony or allowance was agreed by him to be paid for any period, and that he never agreed to pay to her or for her support any money or allowance for any fixed time, or for or during her lifetime, and never agreed or intended that said decree should be unchangeable in respect to the allowance to her. Upon the facts found by it the superior court held that "the defendant is entitled to an order of the court modifying said decree, and exempting him from the payment of any allowance to the plaintiff until the further order of the court," and directed that an order to that effect be entered. From the order entered thereon the present appeal has been taken.

1. The court had jurisdiction to entertain the application of the defendant notwithstanding his failure to appeal from the judgment. Section 139, Civil Code, declares: "Where a divorce is granted for an offense of the husband the court may compel him to provide for the maintenance of the children of the marriage, and to make such suitable allowance to the wife for her support during her life or for a shorter period as the court may deem just, having regard to the circumstances of the parties respectively; and the court may from time to time modify its orders in these respects." This statutory provision enters into every decree in an action for divorce which provides for the payment by the husband of an allowance for the support of the wife, as fully as though it should be incorporated into the terms of the decree. The authority of the court to modify its decree in this respect does not depend upon a reservation therefor in the decree itself, but exists by virtue of the statute, and, being conferred upon it by the Legislature, it is beyond its power to divest itself of such authority. Campbell v. Campbell, 37 Wis. 206.

2. The objection that under its power to "modify" its decree the court is not authorized to grant the defendant a temporary exemption or release from the payment of any alimony must be overruled. The section of the Code places no limitation upon the extent to which it may make such modification, the principle upon which the authority is to be exercised being that which determines its original order, viz., that the allowance to be made by the order as modified shall be such as the court may deem just, "having regard to the circumstances of the case." Under this section it may modify its former order, either by increasing or reducing the amount of money to be paid at any one time, or enlarging or diminishing the frequency with which the payments are to be made. Neither is the authority to modify the decree limited by the section to a mere change in the amount of the allowance to be paid, but it includes a modification of the order in any respect which, under the circumstances of the particular case, may seem just to the court. Under such discretionary authority, it is within the power of the court, not only to change the amount of the allowance, but also to suspend any enforcement of the order until its further direction. That the circumstances of the present case justified the court in modifying the original decree appears from its finding that the monthly payment of $75 is not necessary to the plaintiff for her support or maintenance, but is necessary for the proper support of the defendant, and that the payment thereof works a hardship upon him. The sufficiency of the evidence to sustain this finding is not challenged by the appellant, and, indeed, the fact was itself practically admitted by her merely denying in her answer that her income is "far in excess" of the sum required or sufficient for her maintenance or support. The case of Howell v. Howell, 104 Cal. 45, 37 Pac. 770, 43 Am. St. Rep. 70, is not inconsistent with this rule. In that case there was nothing in either the complaint or the judgment about alimony. The right of the wife to an allowance for her support had not been established in the decree. It would have been competent for her in her action for divorce to ask for such allowance from the defendant, but by her choosing to waive such demand she could not assert her claim for alimony after she had ceased to be his wife. The court held that section 139 clearly contemplates that the right to alimony "shall have been presented and litigated in the action for divorce and established by the judgment, and that when the right to alimony has been thus established the amount may be changed by a modification of the order." In the present case the right of the plaintiff to alimony was established by the decree in her action for divorce, and section 139 gives to the court the authority to modify it.

3. The chief ground urged in support of the appeal is that the provision for alimony in the decree was inserted therein by reason of an agreement between the parties that the defendant should pay to the plaintiff for her support the sum of $75 per month during her lifetime, and that the finding of the court that such agreement was not made is contrary to the evidence. The burden of establishing such agreement was upon the plaintiff, and in her affidavit in reply to the defendant's application, after stating his agreement to pay $75 per month for her support, she stated that he agreed that such payment "should continue for all time during the life of the plaintiff." She presented, however, no evidence in support of this averment. Upon her oral examination at the hearing she stated that she had nothing to do with the making of the agreement and did not personally deal with either the defendant or any attorney in his behalf. The defendant testified in direct terms that he never agreed to pay any amount of money to her during her life, or authorized any other person to make such agreement, and that he never heard or was informed that the plaintiff made such claim until her affidavit was read at the hearing of this motion. Mr. Lloyd, who was one of the attorneys for the plaintiff in the action for divorce, and who conducted the negotiations on her behalf on this subject, testified that in the only interview with him of which he had any recollection the defendant never made any statement that he would pay the allowance to the plaintiff during her life, and that the defendant never used that language; that his negotiations on the subject were with Mr. Whitney, the defendant's attorney, and with the plaintiff; that prior to the signing of the decree he had several discussions with Mr. Whitney; and that these conversations "led to the agreement in writing which is the decree itself." Mr. Whitney testified that he agreed only to what is in the decree, that he and Lloyd came to an understanding that the plaintiff was to have $75 a month as permanent alimony, and that the decree embodied all that they agreed on. Mr. Lloyd also testified that on behalf of the plaintiff he demanded at the commencement of the negotiations an allowance of $150 per month, that Mr. Whitney protested against it and said that the defendant could not pay it, and that the plaintiff finally acquiesced in $75. He also testified that Mr. Whitney never said in substance or effect that the allowance should continue during her lifetime; that he said to Mr. Whitney: "If I reduce it down to $75, this is the end of the thing, and it remains that way to be put in here as permanent alimony, and I put it in the decree as permanent alimony, fixed and ended between them." He also stated that the decree, together with the quitclaims and the assignment of the insurance policy by the plaintiff, embody the whole agreement between her and the defendant. The decree was thereupon prepared by Mr. Lloyd, with the above provision for alimony therein, and submitted to Mr. Whitney, who said to him that it was satisfactory; and they thereafter went into court, and, upon stating that it had been agreed upon between them, it was signed by the judge. Before it was presented to the judge, it was submitted to the defendant by his attorney, and, upon his inquiring the meaning of the words "permanent alimony," Mr. Whitney stated to him that it was the same as any other alimony, and might be changed by the court, either by diminishing or abolishing or increasing the amount, to which the defendant replied, "On that understanding it is all right." The plaintiff, on the other hand, on asking her attorney the meaning of the same, was told that it meant for as long as she lived. It thus very clearly appears that there was no agreement between the parties, either by themselves or through their attorneys, that the defendant should pay alimony to the plaintiff throughout her lifetime; and it does not appear that there was any mutual understanding by the parties that by the use of the term "permanent alimony" such an agreement was implied, or that the term was inserted in the provision with any agreement or understanding between them that it should have any meaning other than its legal significance. As it does not appear that the attorneys, or either of them, at any time in their negotiations stated that the payment was to continue during her life, it cannot be contended that there was any oral stipulation between them of which the terms were so agreed upon that it can be enforced. See Smith v. Whittier, 95 Cal. 279, 30 Pac. 529. It is equally clear that no agreement of this nature on the part of either the parties or their attorneys was at any time brought to the notice or knowledge of the court, and it is not to be assumed that the court intended to incorporate an agreement into its order unless it is shown that the terms of that agreement were made known to it before the decree was signed. The decree is the act of the court, and any agreement between the parties with reference to its provisions that was not made known to the court will have no weight in construing the intention of the court. Parkhurst v. Parkhurst, 118 Cal. 18, 50 Pac. 9, is inapplicable. In that case the parties had made and signed a written stipulation that the wife should be awarded the greater portion of the property, and be charged with the maintenance and education of the infant children at her own expense, and that she should not have any alimony or allowance from her husband; and the decree was entered in accordance with the terms of this stipulation. The authority given the court by section 139 to modify its decree respecting alimony was not involved; the only question presented being the right of the wife under section 138 to its modification in respect to the maintenance and education of the children. The refusal by the superior court to grant the wife's application for a modification of this provision in the decree was affirmed by the Supreme Court, upon the ground that it was to be assumed that the property was awarded to her for the very purpose of maintaining and educating the children, and that it did not appear that they were not being properly maintained and educated. In Wilson v. Wilson, 45 Cal. 399, it was held that a prior or contemporaneous parol agreement between the parties, the effect of which would be to materially vary the terms of the decree and change the rights of the parties thereunder, could not be shown.

4. The decree of the court is therefore not to be construed as having been based upon any agreement, but is to be assumed as having been made upon its own consideration of the relative situation of the parties—the faculties of the husband and the needs of the wife; and its effect is to be determined in accordance with the legal significance of its language under the statutory power given to the court by section 139, and, in determining the extent of this power it is to be borne in mind that, if the decree had provided that the payment of alimony to the plaintiff should continue "during her life," its modification by the court is expressly authorized by that section. The term "permanent" is not the equivalent of "perpetual," or "unending," or "lifelong," or "unchangeable"; and in using the term "permanent alimony" in the decree the court simply designated the character of the alimony which it awarded, rather than the amount to be paid, or the time during which the payment should continue. Alimony which is awarded by a final decree of divorce is designated as "permanent," in distinction from that which is awarded during the pendency of the action, which is designated as "temporary." Bishop on M., D. & S. § 1386; 2 Am. & Eng. Cyc. of Law (2d Ed.) 92; Anderson's Law Dict. q. v.; Abbott, Law Dict.; Bouvier, Law Dict. "Permanent alimony is alimony awarded on or after the determination of the suit. It is permanent only as distinguished from temporary, for it may be increased or diminished." Stewart in M. & D. § 360. That the designation of the amount of alimony awarded to the wife in a decree of divorce as "permanent" does not preclude the court from a subsequent modification of the provision has been many times declared by the Supreme Court. In Ex parte Spencer, 83 Cal. 460, 23 Pac. 395, 17 Am. St. Rep. 266, the court awarded the wife $50 per month "as permanent alimony," which was afterwards reduced to $25 per month. In discussing the subject the court said: "The court is to fix the measure of the compensation by 'having regard to the circumstances of the parties respectively'; these circumstances furnishing the best means for determining such amount. As these circumstances may differ at different times 'the court may from time to time modify its orders in that respect.'" In Wolff v. Wolff, 102 Cal. 433, 36 Pac. 767, 1037, where a certain amount had been awarded the wife as permanent alimony in the decree of divorce, the court said: "It will always be within the power and discretion of the court to modify the allowance of alimony in the future, if just cause appear for such modification." See, also, Ex parte Hart, 94 Cal. 254, 29 Pac. 774.

5. The failure of the court to find, in accordance with the averments of the plaintiff, that the transfers of property by her were made in consideration of an agreement on the part of the defendant that the payment by him to her of $75 per month as alimony should continue for all time during her life, was in legal effect a finding that they were not made upon that consideration (Thompson v. McKay, 41 Cal. 221; Lamb v. Wahlenmaier, 144 Cal. 91, 77 Pac. 765, 103 Am. St. Rep. 66); and its finding that a part of the consideration therefor was that the decree should contain the clause above quoted is in accordance with the testimony of witnesses that the only agreement between the parties was that the decree should provide that the plaintiff should have $75 per month as permanent alimony.

6. In its conclusion of law from the facts found by it the court found that "the defendant is entitled to the order of the court, modifying the said decree and exempting the defendant from the payment of any allowance to the plaintiff until the further order of the court," and directed that "a proper order be entered accordingly." In the order which was subsequently entered thereon it is ordered and adjudged that the decree 'be had and the same is hereby modified by annulling that portion of said decree which is in the words and figures following [reciting the above quoted provision], and it is hereby ordered and adjudged that the said portion of said decree be, and the same is, hereby annulled accordingly. And it is hereby ordered and adjudged that until the further order of the court the defendant hereby be, and he hereby is, wholly relieved and exempted from paying any sum whatever to the plaintiff as alimony or as allowance for her support." In thus "annulling" that portion of the decree the court exceeded its jurisdiction. The decree which was rendered in 1896 was a determination of the rights of the parties, and had become final, except as the power was reserved to the court by section 139 to modify "from time to time" that portion directing the payment of alimony. By that decree the court adjudged that the plaintiff was entitled to alimony from the defendant; but the effect of an order annulling this portion of the decree would be to vacate and set aside that portion of the court's adjudication, and leave the decree as if the court had omitted to make any provision for her support, and the parties would thereupon be in the position presented in Howell v. Howell, supra; whereas, the only authority given to the court by section 139 is to modify this portion of the decree "from time to time" as the court may deem just in view of any changed circumstances of the parties. The closing paragraph of the order by which the court orders that the defendant be "wholly released and exempted" from the payment of alimony "until the further order of the court" is inconsistent with the provision of the order annulling that portion of the decree which provides for the payment of alimony, but is in accordance with the provisions of section 139, and in direct harmony with the findings of the court.

7. The appellant has assigned as error many of the rulings of the court upon the admission of evidence at the hearing; but we are of the opinion that the appellant suffered no prejudice thereby, and that the conclusion of the court was in no respect affected by its rulings on such objections.

The cause is therefore remanded to the superior court, and that court is directed to modify its order by eliminating therefrom all the provisions purporting to annul any portion of the original decree of December 19, 1896, and, as so modified, the said order shall stand affirmed. Each party to pay its costs incurred upon this appeal.

CROCKER et al. v. GARLAND.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 9, 1906.)

1. New Trial—Findings—Evidence.

Where, in an action against a broker for fraud in the sale of plaintiff's land, the findings, which were in favor of the defendant, were either in express conflict with the allegations of defendant's answer or were in conflict with the testimony, and there was also evidence opposed to the general finding, it was proper for the court to grant plaintiff a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, §§ 135–143.]

2. Appeal—New Trial—Review.

The discretion of the trial court in granting a new trial for insufficiency of the evidence will not be disturbed, except in cases of manifest abuse.

3. Pleading—Variance.

Where an objection to the sufficiency of the complaint to entitle plaintiffs to the profit made by defendant on a sale of certain property presented at most a mere question of variance, the court was authorized to disregard the same by Code Civ. Proc. § 469.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Henry J. Crocker and others against William M. Garland. From an order granting plaintiffs' motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Clarence A. Miller and George J. Denis, for appellant. Hunsaker & Britt, Mastick, Van Fleet & Mastick, and Edward F. Treadwell, for respondents.

SMITH, J. This is an appeal from an order granting the plaintiffs' motion for a new trial.

The suit was brought by the plaintiffs for damages for fraud of the defendant, committed by him while acting as their agent for the sale of the land described in the complaint. The nominal purchaser was one Schweppe, with whom the defendant as plaintiffs' agent had made a contract of sale August 21, 1901, for the sum of $25,000, and to whom a deed of conveyance, executed to him as grantee by the plaintiffs and placed in escrow for delivery on receipt of the purchase money, was delivered on the 16th day of October. Schweppe had executed a prior unrecorded deed of the land to one Hinman; but the land was shortly afterwards reconveyed to him, and by him conveyed to one Earl by deed of date November 12, 1891. It is alleged in the complaint that Schweppe was not the real purchaser; that he was an intimate associate and blood relation of the defendant and Hinman, who was his father-in-law, and by agreement with the defendant permitted him to use their names in the transaction, but that in truth they had no interest in the purchase, but took the deeds referred to for the use and benefit of the defendant; and that the defendant fraudulently represented to the plaintiffs that Schweppe was the real purchaser, which was believed by them. The answer of the defendant alleges, in effect, that the real purchaser of the property was the said Hinman, and that the deed was taken by Schweppe in trust for him and as his agent; that neither he nor any one except Hinman had any beneficial interest in such sale; that the entire purchase money of $25,000 was paid by Hinman; that the defendant had no interest whatever in the said sale of the said property or any portion thereof; that the plaintiffs knew and had reason to believe that Schweppe was not in truth or in fact the real purchaser of the land, but knew that the real purchaser was some person living "at or near Dunkirk, the residence of Hinman"; and that Hinman was known to them as the real purchaser from and after October 14th. The sale to Earl, it appears from the defendant's evidence, included a lot adjoining the plaintiffs', standing in the name of Schweppe, but belonging to the defendant, who had paid therefor the sum of $14,000. The aggregate purchase money received for the two lots was $60,000, of which $30,000 was paid to Hinman and the balance retained by the defendant.

The case was tried by a jury, who rendered a general verdict for the defendant, with special findings on certain questions submitted to them, among which were the following: (1) That the defendant did not conceal from plaintiffs the name of the real purchaser of the property; (2) that prior to the closing of the sale the defendant had no agreement with Hinman to the effect that the defendant should have the profits which might be made upon a resale of the property over and above the sum of $5,000; (3) that the real purchaser of plaintiffs' property under the deed was Schweppe; and (4) that the plaintiffs, prior to the closing of the sale, did discover who was the real person to whom the property was being sold. On the motion for a new trial, these findings, as well as the general verdict, were attacked on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain them; and the motion for new trial was granted on the grounds, so far as the sufficiency of the evidence is concerned, (1) that the evidence was insufficient to support the special findings enumerated, and (2) that by reason of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the special findings, it was insufficient also to sustain the general verdict; and the question is whether, on the record before us, these rulings of the court can be sustained.

With regard to the special findings, the first and third of the findings enumerated are in conflict with the express allegations of the answer; the fourth, if it can be construed as referring to Hinman, is without any evidence to sustain it; and the second is in direct conflict with the testimony of the defendant, who admits that he did have such agreement with Hinman prior to the closing of the sale. It is clear, therefore, that as to these findings, the ruling of the court cannot be disturbed. With regard to the general finding, it may be inferred from the special findings that it was based on the assumed fact that Schweppe was the real purchaser; and upon this, indeed, is based the principal argument of the appellant on this appeal, which is, in effect, that the functions of the defendant as agent of the plaintiffs ceased upon the execution of the contract made by him with Schweppe on August 21st. But this argument assumes, not only that the contract was thus made to Schweppe as the bona fide purchaser, but that Schweppe continued to be ready and willing to perform the contract, and that in fact the deed was made to him as the real purchaser. But not only is this in conflict with the repeated and explicit allegations of the answer, but the evidence at least tends to show that the contract was in fact abandoned by Schweppe almost immediately after it was made, and that the defendant, after that, proceeded as the agent, not of Schweppe, but of the plaintiffs, availing himself of the contract with Schweppe merely for the purpose of gaining time to effect the sale at the price specified. The evidence may, indeed, be susceptible of a different construction; but, if it could be assumed that the issue was before the jury, a finding of the jury to the effect stated, approved by the court, would have been conclusive, and equally the action of the court in granting a new trial would be within its discretion. Here not only is the evidence bearing upon the question inconclusive, but the actual fact found by the jury and relied upon by the appellant is in conflict with the allegations of the answer. We do not doubt, therefore, that it was within the discretion of the lower court to set aside the general verdict on this ground. Nor upon a review of the evidence can we say, as a matter of law, that the court was not justified in granting a new trial on other grounds. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the order of the lower court must be affirmed, not only upon the special grounds above stated, but on the general ground that the discretion of the lower court in granting a new trial for insufficiency of the evidence will not be disturbed, except in cases of manifest abuse.

An objection is made by the appellant to the sufficiency of the complaint to entitle the plaintiffs to the profit made by the defendant by the sale of the property to Earl. But this, at most, was a mere question of variance, which it was within the right of the court to disregard (Code Civ. Proc. § 469 et seq.), and which in fact it did disregard in its instructions.

Other objections are urged to the instructions; but, as the case is presented to us, we do not deem it necessary to consider them.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

FRAUDS, STATUTE OF — SALES OF GOODS — WRITTEN CONTRACTS—MODIFICATION—PERFORMANCE.

Civ. Code, § 1698, provides that a contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing or by an executed oral agreement and not otherwise. Held that, where a written contract is modified by parol, the statute is complied with by the subsequent execution of the contract as modified.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Action by E. J. Oatman and others against R. A. Eddy and others. From an order denying plaintiffs' motions for a new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

Purington & Adair, for appellants. Collier & Carnahan, for respondents.

SMITH, J. The suit was brought to recover the price of plaintiffs' orange crop, alleged to have been sold under a contract between plaintiffs and defendants, of date November 26, 1900, set out below. It was found by the court that the plaintiffs were indebted to the defendants in the sum of $1,509.05, as the balance due them for advances to plaintiffs over the receipts from sales and interest; and judgment was entered accordingly. The plaintiffs appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The contract referred to above is as follows: "Riverside, Cal., November 26, 1900. In consideration of the Highgrove Fruit Company having this day advanced us the sum of three thousand ($3,000) dollars, on our present orange crop at Highgrove, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, we have agreed for the handling of same through said Highgrove Fruit Company on the following terms and conditions: We agree to pick and deliver our crop at Highgrove Fruit Company's packing house, fruit to be delivered at times mutually agreed upon. Highgrove Fruit Company agree to sell all fancy and choice grades oranges, at the ruling f. o. b. price at the time of shipment. Highgrove Fruit Company to receive for their services for handling and selling said crop fifty (50c) cents per box. Highgrove Fruit Company further agree to render account sales at time of shipment. Also agree to advance two thousand ($2,000) dollars on December 10th, 1900." There was sold under this contract, during the year 1900, 888 boxes of oranges, about which there is no dispute, and during the month of January and the first part of February, there was sold 2,094 boxes, about which there is no dispute, except that it is claimed by the appellants that the amount found by the court to have been received by the defendants was too little by $86.55; and on this point the finding seems to be sustained by the evidence. The principal, and, indeed, the only serious, question, therefore, is as to the oranges sold subsequent to the 25th day of March, 1901, amounting to 4,068 boxes. As to these it is found by the court: That prior to the 25th day of March, 1901, the original agreement was modified by an oral agreement between the parties, made at the request of the plaintiffs, and afterwards fully executed, by the terms of which it was agreed "that said remaining oranges should be shipped east and sold at auction in the cities of New York and Boston"; that the oranges were sold at auction pursuant to this agreement, "and were not sold at ruling f. o. b. prices at Highgrove," as stipulated in the original agreement; and that defendants received therefrom as net proceeds the sum of $1,326.34, and no more. This finding seems to be fully supported by the evidence; and, if we understand it rightly, the position of appellants is that a contract in writing can be altered only by a contract in writing, or by an oral agreement executed at the time of its inception. Civ. Code, § 1698. But we do not understand this to be the law, and are of the opinion that the provisions of the statute are complied with by the subsequent execution of the contract. We are also of the opinion that the modified contract took the place of the original contract, and that it was correctly construed by the court.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Petition by Josephine A. C. Johnston for writ of prohibition to the superior court of Sacramento county, P. J. Shields, Judge. Writ denied.

C. M. Beckwith and A. L. Shinn, for petitioner. White & Miller, for respondent.

McLAUGHLIN, J. Petitioner and one Frank A. Edinger are rival applicants for letters of administration of the estate of William Johnston, deceased. The petition of Edinger was first filed, and it is therein alleged that the sole heirs at law of said deceased are two daughters and one son, all of whom have signed and filed a written request that he be appointed administrator. The petitioner, however, in her answer to Edinger's petition, and in her application for letters, alleges that she is the surviving wife of decedent, having been married to him about two months prior to his death. Edinger, in his answer to her petition for letters of administration, denies that petitioner was ever married to decedent, or is one of his heirs at law, and further denies that she is a competent or proper person to have charge of his estate. The denials are specific, and are followed by affirmative allegations to the effect that petitioner, since 1893, has been, and now is, the lawful wife of one J. West Goodwin, and that decedent for more than one year prior to his death was mentally incompetent, and being entirely without understanding or capacity to comprehend or enter into any contract was incapable of entering into the marriage relation with petitioner. Upon the issues thus made the cause came on for hearing before the respondent court, and petitioner seeks, through the medium of the writ here applied for, to restrain the trial court from hearing, determining, or receiving evidence relating to the competency of decedent to enter into the marriage contract with the petitioner.

It is well settled that the writ of prohibition will not issue to arrest the proceedings of an inferior tribunal, unless such proceedings are without or in excess of the jurisdiction of such tribunal, and there is no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1102, 1103; Works on Courts and Jurisdiction, § 81, and cases cited; Maurer v. Mitchell, 53 Cal. 292; White v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 58, 42 Pac. 471. That the respondent court has jurisdiction of the probate proceeding and contest is admitted, and if it has such jurisdiction it certainly has power to hear and determine every question relating to the respective claims of the applicants for letters of administration. This petitioner seems to concede, but contends that the court cannot go behind the ordinary proof and authentication of marriage to inquire into and pass upon the mental competency of the decedent at the time the marriage ceremony was performed, and many authorities are cited in the able and exhaustive arguments on this point. We think, however, that it would be improper for us to discuss or attempt to decide the interesting question thus presented, for even if the soundness of petitioner's contention in this behalf be conceded, we are thoroughly convinced that prohibition cannot be invoked for the purpose of regulating the course of a trial, or obviating the effect of rulings made by a court engaged in trying issues over which it has undoubted jurisdiction. That the respondent court has jurisdiction to determine which of the contending applicants is entitled to letters of administration must be conceded. This being true, then certainly the vital, essential, and controlling question to be inquired into is the number of surviving heirs at law and the relationship of each to the decedent, for in no other way could the court determine which of the applicants was entitled to preference under section 1365, Code Civ. Proc. The questions of heirship and degree of kinship are necessarily involved in every contest between relatives for letters of administration, and if, in such contests, the trial court erroneously holds that particular facts are relevant and pertinent to the main inquiry, either as a matter of pleading or proof such ruling amounts to no more than a mere error reviewable and correctible through the ordinary remedy of appeal. Agassiz v. Superior Court, 90 Cal. 102, 27 Pac. 49; Mines d'Or v. Superior Court, 91 Cal. 102, 27 Pac. 532; Murphy v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 596, 24 Pac. 310; Maurer v. Mitchell, 53 Cal. 292; Bandy v. Ransom, 54 Cal. 88; High on Extraordinary Legal Remedies, §§ 767, 767b, 770, 772; Works on Courts and their Jurisdiction, § 81; and "The fact that a question of jurisdiction arises does not change the rule as to the adequacy of the remedy by appeal"; Jacobs v. Superior Court, 133 Cal. 366, 65 Pac. 826, 85 Am. St. Rep. 204.

One of the pertinent questions involved in the contest between petitioner and Edinger is the relationship of the former to the decedent. If she was decedent's wife at the time of his death, and is otherwise competent, then she is entitled to letters, and if she was not his wife then she is a mere intermeddler. This specific question was before the court for trial and solution, and if the court erred in refusing to strike out that portion of Edinger's answer relating to the mental incompetency of the decedent at the time of the alleged marriage, and is likely to make similar rulings in passing upon the admissibility of evidence relating to such incompetency, we can see no reason for holding that these particular errors of law cannot be as readily and adequately dealt with on appeal as other errors committed during the course of the hearing. The court having jurisdiction to make the rulings, the fact that it may have ruled erroneously does not oust it of jurisdiction. Such errors can be reviewed at the same time and in the same manner as ordinary errors in ordinary cases, and the fact that petitioner elected to base her objections on jurisdictional grounds cannot change the well-settled rule regulating the review and correction of errors of law occurring during the course of a trial. The writ of prohibition will not be issued except in cases of extreme necessity, and it certainly cannot be used for the purpose of regulating the issues in a pending cause and confining them to a particular scope, or to test the correctness of rulings on motions to strike out the whole or any part of a pleading filed in a cause over which the court has complete and unquestioned jurisdiction. To tolerate such a practice would be subversive of the purpose of the writ which is to restrain inferior tribunals and bodies from inflicting wrong under the guise of jurisdiction or authority which has no potential existence. It would invite intolerable delay and annoyance in every case where a jurisdictional question might, perchance, be incidentally involved, and make this prerogative writ the medium through which appellate courts could exercise supervisory control over inferior tribunals acting within the scope of their legitimate powers. We are not unmindful of cases holding that prohibition will issue even where an appeal lies, if the delay incident to an appeal will result in irreparable injury or great and useless expense for which petitioner cannot be compensated. But in the case at bar none of these conditions are shown. The court has jurisdiction of the persons of the contending applicants for letters, and of the subject-matter of the contest, and even grossly erroneous rulings during the progress of the hearing cannot oust it of jurisdiction nor vest this court with arbitrary power to interfere with and direct the course of such proceedings. The contest must proceed even if the objectionable defense be eliminated, for the propriety and relevancy of other questions raised by Edinger's answer stand unchallenged. The delay incident to such contest, and a probable or possible appeal from the order the court may make at its close, cannot be avoided, and there is no apparent reason for holding that this case falls within the exception to the general rule forbidding interference by prohibition unless urgent necessity demands such course.

The writ is denied.

JONES et al. v. DEARDORFF et al.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 23, 1906.)

1. Appeal—Record—Evidence—Admission—Review.

A specification of error to the admission of a deed in evidence cannot be reviewed where the record fails to show the ground of objection made when the deed was offered, and it is not inadmissible for every purpose.

2. Easements — Waterway — Irrigation Ditch.

A right of way for an irrigation ditch, and the right to receive water from or discharge the same on land, constitute easements which may attach to other lands as incidents or appurtenances.

3. Same—Appurtenant Easement—Deeds—Construction.

A deed providing that the grantee should not use an irrigation ditch except to convey water to the north half of a certain section for use thereon, unless by the consent of the grantor, created an easement which, by use became appurtenant to such section, and was not a mere easement in gross personal to the grantee.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Easements, §§ 8–12.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by Mrs. A. B. Jones and another against John Deardorff and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

R. J. Hudson, for appellant. E. T. Cosper, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action to quiet title. It is alleged in the complaint that plaintiff Mrs. Jones is the owner, as her separate estate, of section 4, township 19 S., range 22 E., in Kings county, and also of all water ditches passing across said land, except what is called the "Settlers Ditch"; that defendants claim some interest or estate in said premises, namely, the right to run water over said land in ditches now existing on said land, but that said claim is without right, etc.

Defendants in their answer deny that plaintiff Mrs. Jones is or ever was the owner of the water ditch mentioned in the complaint; allege that in 1897 one Mary Kirkendall was the owner of said land and at the same time one Mary Deardorff, wife of Samuel Deardorff, was the owner of the north half of section 8 in said township and range, and that defendant, together with one Oscar Deardorff, are now the owners thereof; that said Mary Kirkendall conveyed in said year by deed a right of way for a lateral ditch through her said land from the said Settlers ditch, for the benefit of said land in said section 8, which deed was duly acknowledged and recorded; that immediately thereafter said Samuel and Mary Deardorff constructed a ditch along the right of way so deeded, and that "ever thereafter until about the first of January, 1904, they and their successors and grantees of said land in said section 8 maintained and used said ditch in conveying water to and upon said land"; that said deed provided that said ditch should be used to convey water to the lands in both said sections. A prescriptive right to said right of way is also pleaded; defendants also pleaded the statute of limitations. By way of cross-complaint defendants set forth the facts as above stated in their answer; alleged that large and valuable crops of alfalfa and pasturage are produced on said section by defendants by means of said ditch and that the water carried through said ditch is essential to the growing of said crops; alleged that in January, 1904, plaintiffs against the will of defendants wrongfully placed obstructions in said lateral ditch and diverted defendants' water therefrom to their irreparable damage; and they pray, among other things, for an injunction restraining plaintiffs from further interference in the said ditch.

Answering defendants' cross-complaint, plaintiffs deny most of its allegations; allege that the said deed executed by Mary Kirkendall contained the following provision, to wit: "The said water ditch is not to be used by S. F. Deardorff except for conveying of water to the N. ½ of Sec. 8, said township and range, for use therein without the consent of myself, nor for conveying water to any other person without my consent" and that "such consent was never obtained from Mrs. Deardorff or her grantee that the water running in said lateral ditch should be used by any other person other than S. F. Deardorff. That the said S. F. Deardorff died on or about August, 1901"; allege that on December 4, 1896, said Mary Deardorff executed a trust deed on said lands owned by her (said section 4) and that her said deed to S. F. Deardorff was made subsequently, namely, on August 7, 1897; that she defaulted in the payment of the money secured by said trust deed; that the land was thereafter, to wit, on August 17, 1898, sold pursuant to the trust deed and was thereafter conveyed to said Mrs. A. B. Jones, one of plaintiffs herein, who is now the sole owner thereof.

The court found the facts generally as alleged by defendants; that the said land in section 4 was owned in fee simple absolute by plaintiff Mrs. Jones; that in August, 1897, Mary Deardorff, wife of Samuel, was the owner of said land in section 8, "which land was worked, managed, rented, and looked after by the husband of said owner, the said Samuel F. Deardorff. That while in the management of said land of the said Mary Deardorff as aforesaid, and for the purpose of making the same appurtenant to the said" land in section 8, "the said Samuel F. Deardorff purchased of one Mary E. Kirkendall a right of way for a water ditch over and across" the said land in section 4, "and took the conveyance thereof in his own name for the use and benefit of the said" land in section 8, "then owned by the said Mary Deardorff, and for the use and benefit of the said Mary Deardorff and her grantees." The court found that Mary Kirkendall was, on August 7, 1897, the owner of the land in section 4, subject to the deed of trust as alleged by plaintiffs and that "on said date executed to Samuel Deardorff a conveyance of said right of way so purchased by him as aforesaid, which conveyance was, and is in words and figures following, to wit: "I, Mary E. Kirkendall, of the county of Kings, state of California, do grant unto Samuel F. Deardorff, of the same county and state, a right of way for a water ditch over and across (describing land in section 4) subject to the following reservation and limitations; the said water ditch (describing its dimensions) is not to be used by said S. F. Deardorff, except for the conveying of water to (land in section 8) for use thereon, without the consent of myself or grantee, nor for conveying water to any other person without my consent. The said Samuel F. Deardorff is to keep said water ditch in good order and to use the same so as to do no injury or damage to the adjacent land. I reserve the right to run sufficient water in said ditch at any time to irrigate my own lands situate in and being a part of said quarter section." The court found that immediately after said conveyance was executed the said Samuel Deardorff and his wife, Mary, constructed a ditch along the right of way so conveyed and that they and their grantees have ever since maintained and kept in good order the said ditch, and the said Samuel and Mary Deardorff and their successors in interest have ever since used and still use said water ditch for said purposes without injury to the adjacent lands; and that plaintiff Mrs. Jones and her predecessors in interest have also used said ditch for the purpose of irrigating said land in section 4; that defendants and Oscar Deardorff are the owners of the land in section 8, and that the water from said ditch is necessary for the production of crops on their said land, and that defendant John Deardorff owns water running through said Settlers ditch. The court also found that plaintiffs have wrongfully obstructed said lateral ditch; also that the deed of the land in said section 4, to said plaintiff Mrs. Jones, coming through the Sacramento Bank by the trustees' sale under said deed of trust, conveyed the land to her, "expressly reserving in its conveyance of said land all water ditches and roads theretofore conveyed." The court found against defendants' alleged prescriptive right and against the alleged bar of the state of limitations. In its conclusions of law the court found: That defendants are the owners of the ditch in question and the right to maintain and keep the same in order and jointly with plaintiff Mrs. Jones to run water through the same and that defendants are entitled to a decree quieting the title in said ditch and to an injunction perpetually restraining plaintiffs from interfering therewith. Judgment was accordingly entered from which and from the order denying their motion for a new trial plaintiffs appeal.

It is claimed that the court erred in admitting the deed to Samuel Deardorff. The record fails to show the ground of the objection made when the deed was offered in evidence, and hence the specification raises no question for it cannot be said to have been inadmissible for every purpose. In making objection to evidence the ground must be stated in order that the court may determine whether the ruling of the lower court was correct or otherwise. It is claimed also that the evidence is insufficient to support the following findings: (a) that defendants have a right to maintain a ditch over the land in section 4; (b) that when Samuel Deardorff took a deed for the water ditch across section 4 he did so that the same should become a permanent use or benefit to section 8, or that the ditch ever became appurtenant to said section. The legal proposition upon which appellants rely is: That the grant from Kirkendall to Samuel Deardorff was simply a grant in gross, and was limited as a right in the grantee, and was not intended by either party to become appurtenant to any land; that it was not in the nature of an easement, and hence not an estate of inheritance, but a simple right of way that died with the grantee.

By the terms of the deed to Deardorff, the ditch was not to be used by the grantee "except for the conveying of water to the north half of section 8 for use thereon," unless by the consent of the grantor, Mary Kirkendall. This was a negative form of expressing the right to use the ditch to convey water to said section. The consent of the grantor was necessary if water was to be conveyed elsewhere. The deed also provided that the ditch was not to be used, without grantor's consent, for conveying water to any other person than the grantee. It is apparently upon this clause that appellants rely to show that the grant was personal only to Samuel Deardorff—or a technical grant in gross. Whether the deed standing alone should be given the construction contended for it is not necessary to decide. Defendants were permitted to show without objection, and it appears by the record, that Mary Deardorff's husband was acting for her in the matter as her agent, and that he took the deed "for the use and benefit of said north half of said section 8"; that his wife, the said Mary, assisted in the construction of the ditch and that they constructed the ditch together conformably to the terms of the deed at a considerable expense to themselves; that the ditch was constructed immediately after the deed was received and that it has been used ever since by Deardorff and his successors in interest, "and they have since maintained and kept in good order the said ditch agreeably to said deed" and that "they (Deardorff and his wife) have since used said water ditch for conveying water to said" section 8 without "injury or damage to the adjacent land." The court found, and the finding is not challenged, that plaintiff Mrs. Jones and her predecessors used said ditch to convey water to their land in section 4. The testimony is not set forth in the transcript; appellants in preparing it have given what purports to be but the legal effect of the testimony. Nor does the bill of exceptions purport to contain all the evidence or the legal effect of it at all. Upon the record before us, however, we think the findings are supported and that the court drew just conclusions from the findings. Mary Deardorff died in 1901, and her husband died in 1902, and defendants succeeded to their interest in section 8 by decree of distribution, and "are now the owners thereof and irrigation thereof is necessary to its proper cultivation" and they "have been wont to run water through said ditch during all the irrigating seasons since the fall of 1902." The cause was tried in November, 1904. "The right of way" and "the right of receiving water from or discharging the same upon land," are among the burdens or servitudes which "may be attached to other land as incidents or appurtenances and are then called easements." Civ. Code, § 811. "A thing is deemed to be incidental or appurtenant to land when it is by right used with the land for its benefit." Civ. Code, § 662. The grant in this case created an easement, and the evidence shows that it became appurtenant to defendants' land as the court found. Whether an easement in a given case is appurtenant or in gross is determined mainly by the nature of the right and of the intention of the parties creating it; but the courts favor the construction of grants of these rights as appurtenant rather than in gross, and if the right in question is in its nature an appropriate and useful adjunct of the land conveyed, having in view the intention of the grantee as to its use, and there being nothing to show that the parties intended it to be a mere personal right, it would be held to be an easement appurtenant to the land, and not an easement in gross. 10 Am. & Eng. Ency. (2d Ed.) p. 405; Hopper v. Barnes, 113 Cal. 636, 45 Pac. 874. The deed to plaintiff, Mrs. Jones, is not in the record, but it is stated in the transcript that her grantor, the Sacramento Bank, "reserved in its conveyance * * * all water ditches and roads theretofore conveyed," from which it may be inferred that the purchaser at the sale under the trust deed regarded his purchase as subject to the easement created for the benefit of defendants' land. The permission given to the Deardorffs, contemporaneously with the grant, to enter upon the land and construct the ditch, and its use by them and their successors in interest for so long a time, without objection, to convey water to section 8, where it was necessary to the proper enjoyment of the land, both by them and their successors in interest, would give rise to a strong inference that the original intention of the parties was that the ditch should become a servitude upon section 4 of which section 8 was the dominant tenement. "The estate of a servitude is determined by the terms of the grant, or the nature of the enjoyment by which it was acquired." Civ. Code, § 806.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. TAYLOR.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 27, 1906.)

1. Criminal Law—Statements of Defendant—Self-Serving Declarations.

Defendant shot deceased while standing on the bank of an irrigation ditch, and in a prosecution for the homicide a witness testified that he, with others, had searched the ditch at the point where the shooting occurred, and found a bullet in the bottom of the ditch which was of the same caliber as the one found in deceased's body; that the search for the bullet was because of a statement made by defendant to witness about having fired a shot into the water. Held, that defendant's statement, made to witness at the time defendant told him of having fired the first shot into the ditch, was a hearsay, self-serving declaration and inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 933.]

2. SAME—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—OPINION OF COURT.

Where. in a prosecution for homicide, the judge charged that the jury, and not the judge, were the judges of the facts, and that he did not intend, by giving the instruction, to imply the existence or nonexistence of any fact in the case, an instruction that if the jury should find certain material matters as facts beyond a reasonable doubt, and believed from such facts that defendant wrongfully, unlawfully, and unnecessarily brought on the struggle, or became and was the aggressor, and did not attempt to abandon or withdraw from the altercation during which he killed deceased, he could not avail himself of the plea of self-defense, etc., was not objectionable as intimating the judge's opinion on the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 1731-1735, 1758.]

3. HOMICIDE—SELF-DEFENSE—IMMINENCE OF DANGER.

In order to justify a killing as committed in self-defense, the danger must have existed, or have reasonably appeared to exist, at the very time defendant fired the fatal shot; defendant's belief that the danger was about to become imminent, or that it would become imminent in the future, being insufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, §§ 158-163.]

4. CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—CHARACTER AND NATIONALITY OF PARTIES.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, defendant's attorney in his argument many times referred to deceased as "this Armenian," and to the defendant as having a father and mother "in the good old state of Missouri," it was proper for the court to charge that the jury had nothing to do with the place of birth or the nationality of deceased, or the situation of the defendant or deceased with reference to their families.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 1693, 1974-1977.]

5. SAME—REQUEST TO CHARGE—INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN.

It is not error for the court to refuse instructions requested by accused, the material portions of which are covered by the charge.

6. SAME—VERDICT—AMENDMENT.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, the verdict as first rendered fixed defendant's term of imprisonment, the judge properly told the jury that it was informal, and instructed them to eliminate the portion fixing the punishment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 2110, 2112.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

David F. Taylor was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

James A. Burns, E. Klette, and S. J. Hinds, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

COOPER, J. The defendant was charged in the information with having killed and murdered one Bedrosian on the 28th day of June, 1905. The jury returned a verdict of manslaughter, recommending the defendant to the mercy of the court, and he was sentenced to a term of six years in the state prison. This appeal is from the judgment and an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The homicide was the result of a dispute as to water rights from an irrigating ditch. The deceased and the defendant each had a right to take certain water from the same ditch, but the trouble arose as to the time at which the water should be taken by each. The defendant could not get water below at times when deceased put extra boards in the headgate and backed the water so that it would flow through a branch ditch onto the land of the deceased, and the deceased could not get the water to his land without putting in the extra boards. The defendant, from his own testimony, appears to have armed himself with a pistol on the morning of the homicide, as he was about to start to the point in the irrigating ditch where the boards had been placed by deceased. He made the declaration that he would have the water if it caused him trouble. When he reached the headgate he took out two boards, the longest one of which he pushed out so it would float away down the ditch. As he was leaving he saw deceased down the road, and went to meet him. Deceased appeared to be in a good humor, and proposed to defendant that they measure the water. They then went together to the ditch, the deceased to his small headgate, and defendant to the large headgate. After deceased put his hand down into the water as if to measure it, he went from the small headgate over to the large headgate, and told defendant that he did not have enough water, and that he was going to put in the boards. Defendant replied that it would be all right, but that deceased would have to take out the boards if defendant had to flood the ditch to make him do it. Defendant testified that deceased had a shovel in his hands, and swore at defendant, calling him names, raising his shovel and striking at defendant, hitting his hands. The defendant then describes the subsequent events as follows: "I drew my gun from my hip pocket. I had carried that pistol ever since the 6th of January. Had been in the custom of carrying a pistol. I carried it for sport. When I pulled the revolver from my pocket, I put it over in my left hand and fired a shot down into the water. I did that as I thought probably I would run a bluff on him. I did not shoot at him. Could have shot at him if I had wanted to. When I fired the pistol he kind of dodged down, just kind of pitched the shovel back that way like. He kind of raised up then, and wanted to know what I meant. I said: 'I mean I don't want any more trouble with you.' Then I pointed the pistol in his face that way, and told him to stand back. He just kind of stepped back, probably one step, but a little towards the fence, a little northeast. I thought the trouble was all over with, and he holloed to some one, called him 'Paul' or 'Izer,' or something of that kind. I stuck the pistol in my hip pocket. I thought I would go across the ditch and get my wheel. I jumped from the running board of the drop onto the bank. As I reached the ground he grabbed me. I whirled around facing him. I struck him a couple of times with my left hand. He caught me at that time so I couldn't use my right hand. I hit him on the breast or ribs. * * * While we were scuffling there, I took the gun out of my pocket with my left hand. I put it over in my right hand; passed it in front of him to my right hand or around his neck. I told him, if he did not let loose of me, I would shoot. * * * At the time the shot was fired Paul was coming through the fence. I didn't aim to fire the shot just at that instant, but I would have had to fire in a second or two. When the shot was fired Bedrosian let loose of me. I ran out in the road." Defendant admitted that in the preliminary examination he testified as follows: "I didn't think there was any necessity for defending myself with the gun. * * * The reason why I drew my gun the second time was that I thought I would run a bluff on him. I was not drawing the gun for the reason that I was afraid he was going to hurt me. I am not afraid of any one man. I was not afraid of him then. When I fired the first shot, I then raised the gun up towards him with my left hand. He dodged down and threw the shovel around that way, and says something or other—I couldn't say what. He seemed so excited; but it sort of tickled me, and I had a kind of grin. I couldn't help it." The witness Saunders testified that he heard a shot, and looked up and saw deceased have hold of defendant's arm; that he heard deceased say, "Don't shoot! don't shoot!" and that he heard a second shot, and looked and saw deceased just about to the ground, falling. The above is stated for the purpose of more clearly elucidating the points discussed. It is not claimed that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict.

It is urged that the court erred in sustaining objections to questions asked by defendant's counsel in direct examination of the witness Tremper as to what statement defendant made to him at the time defendant told him of having fired the first shot into the water ditch. The court correctly sustained the objections. The witness had testified that he, with others, had searched the ditch at or about the point where the shooting took place, and found a bullet in the bottom of the ditch, which was a 38-caliber bullet similar to the one found in the body of deceased; that the searching for the bullet was because of the statement made by the defendant to the witness about having fired a shot into the water. Counsel say that the object in asking the question was to corroborate the defendant by showing that he made a statement of a material fact, which proved to be true by an examination of the ditch. The court certainly was very liberal to the defendant by allowing in evidence the portion of the statement made to the witness as to having fired into the ditch. It was not permissible to allow the witness, without any restrictions, to state all that defendant said to him. It was not part of the res gestæ, and was purely hearsay and a self-serving declaration. There was no claim made by the prosecution that the account or statement made by the defendant as to firing the bullet into the water was fabricated, and hence the rule cannot be invoked which, in some exceptional cases, allows statements made by a defendant at or about the time of the act to be received in evidence for the purpose of corroborating the statement or account he has given upon the stand. Where a defendant has given an account of a transaction, and the prosecution has attempted to impeach him by evidence as to a different account of the same transaction made to other parties, the law, in its spirit of fairness to the defendant, allows him to call other witnesses for the purpose of showing that other accounts or statements made by him immediately after the occurrence and while it was fresh in his mind are the same in substance as that given by him as a witness upon the stand. The question in such case is as to the credibility of the defendant or the witness. See People v. Doyell, 48 Cal. 85. In this case there was no such question to which the evidence sought to be elicited would have been admissible.

We have carefully examined the instruction complained of in which the court charged the jury that if they should find certain material matters as facts beyond a reasonable doubt, and that if the jury believed from such facts that defendant wrongfully, unlawfully, and unnecessarily brought on the struggle, or became and was the aggressor, and did not attempt to abandon or withdraw from the altercation, and during the altercation defendant killed deceased, that defendant could not avail himself of the plea of self-defense in case he did so create a real or apparent necessity for the killing, by his own unlawful acts. The objection urged to the instruction is that it "left the jury to infer that although they were the sole judges of the effect and value and weight of testimony, they were listening to a judge who really did have an opinion in regard to the guilt or innocence of the defendant." It is certainly reasonable to infer that the judge really did have an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant, but we can find no expression or intimation of such opinion in the instruction. Not only this, but the judge said to the jury: "I again charge you that you, and not I, are the judges of the facts in the case; and I do not intend by giving you these instructions to imply the existence or nonexistence of any fact in the case."

The claim is made that it was error for the court to charge the jury that "the danger to the defendant, if any, must have existed, or have reasonably appeared to exist, at the very time the defendant fired the fatal shot" in order to justify the killing. The portion of the instruction quoted must be read in connection with what is subsequently stated in the same instruction, to wit, "If you should believe from the evidence that at the time he did fire the fatal shot—if you find that he did so from the evidence—the defendant was at that time in no danger of suffering death or great bodily harm, and that the situation and surrounding circumstances were not such as to cause it to appear to the defendant as a reasonable person that, at the time, he was in danger of his life or of suffering great bodily injury, then I instruct you that, unless it did appear to the defendant as a reasonable man that he [the defendant] at the time of firing the fatal shot was in danger of suffering great bodily harm, then and under such circumstances the defendant could not justify the shooting and killing of the deceased upon the ground that the same was done in self defense." The instruction gives the rule as favorably to the defendant as the law would justify. If the criticism of appellant's attorney is correct, then the danger need not have existed at the time the fatal shot was fired. It certainly is not the law that a defendant can justify the taking of human life upon the belief that danger is about to become imminent, or that it will in the future become imminent. There must have been reasonable ground to apprehend a design to commit a felony, or to do great bodily harm, and imminent danger of such design being accomplished, and this at the time the fatal shot was fired.

It was not error for the court to charge the jury that they had nothing to do with the place of birth or the nationality of the deceased, or the situation of the defendant or the deceased with reference to their families. The attorney for the defendant in his argument to the jury had many times referred to deceased as "this Armenian," and to the defendant as having a father and mother in the "good old state of Missouri." The deceased, no matter what his nationality, was entitled to the equal protection of the laws, and defendant was not entitled to any special privileges because his father and mother lived in the state of Missouri. It would import a new principle into our criminal law if the place of birth or nationality of the parties concerned in the commission of a crime could be considered as material to the guilt or innocence of a defendant.

The defendant insists that the court erred in refusing to give requested instructions explaining the law of self-defense, and the right of a defendant to act upon appearances. We have examined the requested instructions which were refused and the instructions given, and we are of opinion that the material portions of the instructions refused were given elsewhere in the charge of the court. The instructions given by the court cover about 90 folios of the transcript and every phase of the case. While it may be said that they are unnecessarily voluminous, they show that the learned judge of the court below carefully guarded the rights of the defendant. To have repeated the substance of any of these instructions, even though in different words, could not have aided the jury, but would have tended to confuse them. The rights of the defendant were not only guarded, but the rulings on all doubtful questions were in his favor.

The claim that the verdict was obtained by means other than a fair expression of opinion of the jurors is entirely without merit. The verdict as first rendered fixed the term of imprisonment of the defendant. The judge properly told the jury that it was informal, and instructed them to eliminate the portion of it fixing the punishment. One of the jurors asked the judge to inform them the penalty that could be imposed under a verdict of manslaughter. The judge in reply stated that the punishment was a matter entirely for the court, but that it was not "a matter that was so arbitrary as to preclude a recommendation or anything of that sort, but the jury have no power to fix it." No objection was made to the remark of the judge, and no exception taken to it. The jury then retired, and afterwards brought in the verdict, accompanied with a recommendation of the defendant to the mercy of the court. At the request of the defendant the jury was polled, and the verdict was then recorded.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

DINNIGAN v. PETERSON.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 22, 1906.)

1. CARRIERS—INJURY TO PASSENGER—STAGECOACH—NEGLIGENCE—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where a stagecoach was overturned by striking a boulder, in turning back into the road after turning out, negligence of the driver is presumable.

2. SAME—CARE REQUIRED.

Where the driver of a coach approaches a place of particular danger to passengers, he is bound to warn them of the nature of the danger.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, §§ 1193, 1196.]

3. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

It was not contributory negligence for a passenger in a stagecoach to jump out when it began to tip over.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1352.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Paul W. Bennett, Judge.

Action by Richard R. Dinnigan against N.

P. Peterson. Appeal by plaintiff from a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying a new trial. Reversed.

Bien & Jackson and Anderson & Kaye, for appellant. C. L. Claflin, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Action for damages on account of personal injuries. Findings and judgment for defendant. Appeal by the plaintiff from said judgment, and from the order denying a new trial.

Plaintiff was a passenger for hire upon defendant's stagecoach, such stagecoach having capacity for nine, but was carrying only six passengers. The route being traversed was rough and mountainous. The stage was driven by a thoroughly competent and skilled man, and all of the appointments were in perfect condition. The stage thus driven was met by a 10-horse team upon this mountain road, and the driver of the stage undertook to pass the team by turning to the right. The evidence of Pritchard, the driver, is: "The place outside the road where I drove down was not bad looking from above. As far as I could see, it was a rocky ridge that went down and narrowed up. At the point where we turned in it hadn't been very bad only for the big loose boulders. Looking on down it got narrower and the hills broke off steep to the right, and the road was very abrupt on the left-hand side also until you got further down. The embankment was formed by throwing loose rocks out of the road. The rut where I turned in was about eight or ten inches deep and the bank had a gradual slope toward it a distance of eight or ten feet. The slope was not steep, but was gradual and easy. * * * The ridge becomes narrower as you go down until it pinches out."

The defendant, called in his own behalf, testified, and was asked whether it was possible, by the exercise of care on the driver's part, to have driven the coach into the road at that point without tipping over; his answer was: "I don't know of any way that he could prevent it." When asked if, by the exercise of the highest degree of care, by watching everything in the road, the driver could "have driven that coach in there without turning over," defendant answered: "Well, I don't think he could." To the further question, do you think any man could drive that coach in there where he turned off from the road without turning it over? defendant answered: "I don't think so." Again, he says: "Of course, I would try and be safe, but I might be turned over. I say I don't think it could be done with safety because I had as safe a man as ever drove on the road." And to the further question: "Then it was a matter of impossibility to have driven that coach around that cement wagon and gotten in again without turning over; that is a fact, is it not?" Answer: "It seems so." The driver further testified: "I knew that the ground at the side of the road was covered with loose stones and boulders as far down as I could see. * * * I discovered that fact at the time I drove down there, and knew it before. * * * A man might reach the road with an empty stage. He might do it one time in ten." While the witness Pritchard stated that "the place outside the road where I drove down was not bad looking from above," the entire description of the road over which he was compelled to drive in turning out indicates that it was an exceedingly bad and dangerous point at which to undertake to leave the road. It is admitted that no notice was given to the passengers of the dangerous character of this particular turnout. It further appears from the testimony that after driving past the team, in an effort to turn back into the road, the right fore wheel struck one of these boulders of which witness Pritchard speaks and upset the stage; that after the stage started to turn over plaintiff leaped therefrom, and was caught and injured.

The court finds that there was no negligence upon the part of the defendant, although it makes no specific finding as to the danger to be apprehended at the point where the driver undertook to turn out of the road, and pass the cement team. The court does find, however, and there is testimony in its support, that the place where he undertook to turn back into the road after having passed the cement team was apparently a safe place.

It is insisted by the appellant that there is no evidence to support the finding that no negligence was attributable to the defendant. With this we are inclined to agree. The care which defendant, as a common carrier, owed to plaintiff was the utmost care. Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 588, 22 Pac. 266, 5 L. R. A. 498, 13 Am. St. Rep. 175. The passenger was injured by an instrumentality used by defendant in the prosecution of his business, and the presumption is that it occurred by the negligence of the coachman. We find nothing in the evidence tending to rebut this presumption. "Moreover, where the driver of a coach approaches a place of particular danger to passengers, he is bound to warn them of the nature of the danger, to the end that they may choose whether they will run the risk of it or not." Thompson's Carrier of Passengers, p. 240. We think that the general tenor of the authorities cited by the appellant sustains the position that it was negligence upon the part of the driver, in view of the rough character of the turn out, which he must of necessity traverse in order to pass this wagon, in not giving the passengers notice of the danger apparent, that an opportunity might be offered them to alight and avoid the same. His omission in this regard was negligence. No contributory negligence is shown. Assuming as we do that the driver drove his coach into a dangerous place and exposed the passengers to peril, the act of the plaintiff in attempting to jump from the coach was not contributory negligence. It is said by our Supreme Court in Schneider v. Market Street Ry. Co., 134 Cal. 482, 66 Pac. 734, that "even if, in bewilderment, he runs directly into the very danger which he fears, he is not in fault. The confusion of mind caused by such negligence is part of the injury inflicted by the negligent person." There is nothing in the evidence to indicate that the action of plaintiff in jumping from the stage contributed in any degree to its overturning, for the uncontradicted testimony is that the stage was overturning before he jumped.

In our opinion, the judgment and order should be reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings; and it is so ordered.

We concur: GRAY, P. J.; SMITH, J.

ROWE v. SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA RY. CO.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 23, 1906.)

1. Railroads—Crossing Accident—Injuries to Pedestrians — Willful Injury — Contributory Negligence.

Intestate approached a railroad crossing without paying any attention to his surroundings or to a train approaching at a speed of from five to six miles an hour. The engineer saw intestate before he came on the track and blew three or four quick blasts. He then called to deceased to "look out," and seeing that he paid no attention immediately turned on the whistle again and at the same time set the air brakes, but it was then impossible to prevent the collision, and intestate unheedingly stepped immediately before, and into, the cowcatcher, receiving injuries from which he subsequently died. After the brakes were set, the locomotive and train stopped in about 30 feet. Held, that the engineer was not guilty of gross or wanton negligence in failing to stop the train in time to avoid the injury.

2. Same—Proximate Cause.

Intestate's contributory negligence, and not the negligence of the engineer in not bringing the train to a standstill when he first saw deceased, was the proximate cause of the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 41, Cent. Dig. Railroads, § 1028.]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by Henrietta J. Rowe, as administratrix of the estate of Edwin Rowe, deceased, against the Southern California Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henry M. Willis, for appellant. T. J. Norton and E. E. Millikin, for respondent.

GRAY, P. J. This action is brought by plaintiff to recover damages from defendant for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's husband by one of defendant's passenger trains at a street crossing in the city of San Bernardino. At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence, defendant's motion for a nonsuit was granted. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment which followed.

The only question presented arises upon the order granting the nonsuit. It is contended by appellant that, while the negligence of the deceased must be admitted to have contributed to his death, yet the defendant's engineer had notice of the negligence of the deceased in time to have avoided the killing if he had used proper care and stopped the train. The facts of the case are in many respects similar to the facts in the case of Green v. Los Angeles Terminal Ry. Co., 143 Cal. 31, 76 Pac. 719, 101 Am. St. Rep. 68, and may be briefly stated as follows: The deceased was approaching the defendant's track from the west on the sidewalk which traversed the south side of the street. The defendant's locomotive, with a train of cars attached, was approaching from the northwest, the same point to which the deceased was going, at an angle of about 45 degrees with the course deceased was traveling. The speed of the train was five or six miles an hour, and, as it was approaching the deceased partially from behind and to the left, it could not be seen readily by him unless he turned his head. This was in the evening, nearly dark. An oil lamp was burning in the headlight of the locomotive. The engineer, leaning out the window from the right-hand side of his cab, saw deceased passing along the south sidewalk, while the engineer was still north of the street. He observed that deceased was walking slowly and without any attention to his surroundings, and, for the purpose of attracting his attention, he blew three or four quick blasts upon his locomotive whistle. He then called to the deceased in a loud voice, "Look out there," and seeing that the deceased still paid no attention he immediately turned on the whistle again. at the same time setting the air brakes; but it was then impossible for the engineer to prevent a collision. The deceased unheedingly stepped immediately before or into the cowcatcher. Both his legs were broken between the ankles and knees, and he was thrown back from the track upon the same side from which he approached. A day or two later he died. After the brakes were set, the locomotive and train were brought to a stop in about 30 feet. The engine bell was kept ringing from the time the deceased was first seen by the engineer. The deceased held the office of constable in the township where he was killed. He was habitually given to spells of abstraction and absent-mindedness, and was partially deaf in the left ear (the one nearest the approaching locomotive). These physical defects were not known by the engineer.

The contributory negligence of deceased is conceded by appellant, and the complaint is framed and the trial proceeded on the theory that the recovery must be had, if at all, for the gross and wanton negligence of defendant's engineer. This gross and wanton negligence is alleged to consist in his not having stopped the train in time to avoid striking the deceased. We cannot agree with this. The engineer evinced no wanton desire to injure deceased, nor is there any evidence of a reckless disregard on his part of the safety of the deceased. The very contrary of this clearly appears from the undisputed evidence. He promptly resorted to, and industriously persisted in, all those means which are usually effective to call an absent-minded man to his senses, and this is all that the rule in such cases requires. When he sees that a person is walking into danger, he must use ordinary care to warn him of such danger and prevent the injury. The engineer had no notice that deceased was going to disregard all his warnings until he had given the warnings, and it was then too late to make the stopping of the train effective to avoid the killing. This was not the engineer's fault, but the fault of deceased arising from his physical defects which the engineer knew nothing about. The doctrine which makes a personal injury the fault of him who has the last clear opportunity to prevent it has coupled with it and in it the element of notice. And "under this rule a defendant is not liable because he ought to have known." Herbert v. S. P. Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 Pac. 651. Here the engineer had no notice and no reasonable ground to think that it was necessary to stop his train to avoid running over deceased, until it was too late to do so. After he discovered that he must stop his train or kill a man he had no clear opportunity to do it. Up to this time it would have been something beyond ordinary care for him to stop his train; it would have been extraordinary care. Trains are not ordinarily stopped, or even held stationary, to allow people on foot to pass in front of them. Another element of the rule with which we are here concerned is that circumstances must be such, and must appear to the party to be charged to be such, "that the deceased cannot, and the defendant can, prevent the injury." "This principle cannot govern where both parties are contemporaneously and actively in fault, and by their mutual carelessness an injury ensues to one or both of them." Holmes v. South Pac. C. Ry. Co., 97 Cal. 169, 31 Pac. 834.

If we were to concede that the engineer was negligent in not bringing the train to a standstill when he first saw the decedent, still the plaintiff could not recover because of the fact that decedent was in no danger so long as he did not step upon the track. He brought himself into a position of immediate danger by so stepping upon the track, and this was the proximate and immediate cause of his injury, and the previous failure to stop the train had only a remote connection therewith. To be sure, if the train had been stopped in time, the injury would not have happened. This is so, however, not because the engineer would have thus refrained from injuring the deceased, but because he would have thus prevented the deceased from injuring himself by walking into the pilot of the moving locomotive. It is not a reasonable deduction from the conduct of the engineer to say that he did know, or should have known, from the conduct of the deceased, immediately on the sounding of the whistle the first time, that he was going to thereafter walk upon the track heedless of all further warning. It is fair, however, to say that the engineer never for a moment thought that deceased was going finally to ignore the several warnings given him during that short few seconds of time until it was too late to prevent striking him, and the instant that he realized that those warnings were ineffective he did his best to stop the train. This is all the law requires. Green v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 143 Cal. 31, 76 Pac. 719, 101 Am. St. Rep. 68. Even under the dissenting opinion of the Chief Justice in the Green Case, and the principles therein laid down, the plaintiff herein should not recover, for it is plain that the dissent of the Chief Justice was largely influenced by the excessive speed of the train and the absence of all warning of its approach.

The appellant cites many cases from this and other states. Some of the latter support her position, but we think them in principle at variance with the decisions of our own Supreme Court. In this state no case has gone to the extent of sustaining a recovery where, as here, the injury was the immediate, if not the sole, result of the negligence of the party injured. The case of Esrey v. S. P. Co., 103 Cal. 544, 37 Pac. 500, is a fair illustration of the California cases on this question; but, in that case the injured party was not only in a place of danger to the knowledge of the brakeman, but unable to extricate herself at the time the signal was given to start the train. The strongest case cited by appellant is Lee v. Market St. Ry. Co., 135 Cal. 293, 67 Pac. 765. This, however, was a street car case, and, in the nature of things, there is a difference between that and a steam railway case. A street car is more readily brought to a standstill than a heavy train; besides, a street car must necessarily be frequently operated among great masses of people. The Supreme Court has recognized this distinction. Clark v. Bennett, 123 Cal. 278, 55 Pac. 908. Moreover, in the Lee Case it was shown that the car was going at a high and "unusual rate of speed and sounding no gong nor alarm bell"; and that the motorman's attention was called by a passenger to the dangerous position of plaintiff. For these reasons, the case is not analogous to the one before us.

Unless we are to hold that contributory negligence is never a question of law, but always a question of fact for the jury, we must hold in this case, as a matter of law, that the injury was shown to be the direct and proximate result of the negligence of the deceased, and that the trial court was warranted in granting the nonsuit.

The judgment is affirmed.

I concur: ALLEN, J.

SMITH, J. I concur in the judgment of affirmance. It appears clearly from the evidence that if the defendant's engineer, at the time he hallooed at the plaintiff, had put on the brakes instead of hallooing, the accident would not have occurred. The evidence was also of such a character as would have justified the jury in finding that, at this point of time, the plaintiff was unaware of the approach of the train, and that the engineer knew of this fact, and that plaintiff was about to step in front of the engine. On this appeal, therefore, which is from a judgment of nonsuit, these facts must be assumed as established. The sole question in the case, then, is whether the engineer, being aware of the inevitability of the accident unless he stopped the train, was guilty of such negligence as to bring the case within the doctrine that "the party who last has a clear opportunity of avoiding the accident, notwithstanding the negligence of his opponent, is considered solely responsible. Esrey v. Southern Pacific Co., 103 Cal. 545, 37 Pac. 500.

The doctrine in question, as above and elsewhere expressed, is susceptible of two interpretations: The one is that the doctrine will apply only to cases where the negligence of the injured party is wholly antecedent to the negligence of the party causing the accident; and hence that, where the negligence of the injured party is continued up to the time of the accident, it will not apply if there be a physical possibility for him to escape. The other is that it will apply even to cases where the negligence of the injured party continues up to the time of the accident, if it be known to the other party that he is unaware of his danger and that the accident will inevitably occur. The former doctrine is asserted in the following, and some other cases: Holmes v. South Pac. C. Ry. Co., 97 Cal. 161, 31 Pac. 834; Everett v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 119, 43 Pac. 207, 46 Pac. 889, 34 L. R. A. 350; Green v. Los Angeles Terminal Ry. Co., 143 Cal. 31, 76 Pac. 719, 101 Am. St. Rep. 68. The latter is expressed in the opinion of the dissenting judges in Everett v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 111, 43 Pac. 207, 46 Pac. 889, 34 L. R. A. 350, and in Herbert v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 232, 53 Pac. 651, and Lee v. Market St. Ry. Co., 135 Cal. 293, 67 Pac. 765. In Esrey v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, as in Harrington v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 140 Cal. 514, 74 Pac. 15, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85, the case was one in which, after the danger became imminent, there was a physical impossibility for the plaintiff to escape, but the language of the court seems to accord with the more liberal doctrine. The preponderance of authority would, therefore, seem to have been in favor of the more liberal application of the doctrine, prior to the decision in Green v. Los Angeles Terminal Ry. Co., but that case seems to be in conflict with this view, and upon its authority I feel constrained to concur in the conclusion of my associates.

I do not, however, concur altogether in the view that the doctrine of last opportunity can apply only where there is "gross and wanton negligence" on the part of the engineer, or "a reckless disregard on his part" of the safety of the deceased. This proposition is true only in a qualified sense. But the term "ordinary care" as applied to the engineer on a train in an emergency, means the ordinary care of competent men in that position, and cannot be regarded as anything less than great care (Henderson v. Los Angeles Traction Co. [Cal. Sup.] 89 Pac. 976); and, as has been expressed in several cases, the failure to exercise such care by a defendant may be regarded as amounting "to a degree of reckless conduct that may well be termed willful and wanton" (Esrey v. Southern Pacific Co., 103 Cal. 544, 545, 37 Pac. 500; Everett v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 114, 43 Pac. 207, 46 Pac. 889, 34 L. R. A. 350).

BRETT v. BERGER.

(Court of Appeal, Third District. California. June 23, 1906.)

1. Landlord and Tenant—Duty to Repair.

At common law the burden of making repairs was on the tenant; the landlord being under no obligations so to do, unless by express agreement to that effect.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Landlord and Tenant, § 536.]

2. Same — Contract to Repair — Construction.

Where a lease provided that, in the event of any repairs being necessary to the fences or buildings on the premises, the landlord should furnish all material necessary thereto, together with one man's labor, at his own cost and expense, and that the tenant should furnish all the additional labor necessary thereto at his own cost and expense, the landlord was only required to furnish materials for repairs and one man's labor when called on by the tenant to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Landlord and Tenant, § 548.]

3. Damages—Contract—Breach.

Where a landlord agreed to furnish materials and one man's labor necessary for subsequent repairs on fences and buildings, the lessee could not stand by and see his crops destroyed by his own stock after the landlord had refused to furnish material and labor on demand and seek compensation for the ensuing damage, but was bound to make the repairs and sue the landlord for the outlay in money.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Landlord and Tenant, § 649.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

Action by T. I. Brett against L. P. Berger. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Bond & Haycock, for appellant. H. V. Kreling and Crawford & Crawford, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant had judgment on motion for nonsuit at the close of plaintiff's evidence. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment on bill of exceptions.

Plaintiff and defendant entered into a written lease whereby defendant let to plaintiff the premises called the "Mt. Carlo Ranche" for the term of five years commencing October 15, 1901, reserving to defendant the use of certain land and buildings thereon. The lease was for a cash rental of $350, payable in equal semiannual installments. Among other provisions of the lease was the following: "It is also understood and agreed between the aforesaid parties that in the event of any repairs being necessary to the fences or buildings on said premises and herein leased, that the party of the first part shall furnish all material necessary thereto, together with one man at his own cost and expense, and that said party of the second part shall furnish all the labor necessary thereto at his own cost and expense." The action is for alleged damage to plaintiff's crops during three different years of the term; namely, to his growing crops during the summer of 1902 by reason of plaintiff's hogs breaking through the fences by which they were inclosed; by certain hay stored in the barns on the premises during the winter of 1902–1903 being injured by rain beating through the alleged leaky roofs; by similar damage from plaintiff's hogs destroying his crops in 1904; by loss of time in pursuing his cattle and hogs because of their escaping from their inclosures through the dilapidated fences. Damages are claimed solely "by reason of defendant's breach of said covenant (above set forth) committed by the defendant in not furnishing material necessary to repair said barn and fences and in not furnishing a man therefor, as aforesaid." It is alleged in the complaint and was proved that plaintiff frequently informed defendant of the condition of the fences and roof of the barn and called upon him to furnish the material required for necessary repairs and the labor of one man to make needed repairs, but defendant neglected and refused to do so. There is no allegation and no proof that plaintiff demanded of defendant that he make the repairs or do more than to furnish the material and the labor of one man therefor. Plaintiff testified that he "did all he could to repair said fences, and used such material as he could find on the place in repairing them, and also used his own material therefor, but that he did not have sufficient material to put them in condition to protect his said crops and control his stock"; whether plaintiff made any effort to obtain material by purchase or otherwise with which to make the repairs or that he was financially unable to provide the necessary money, does not appear. It did appear, however, that there were more than six miles of fencing on the place which latter was divided into several fields and that much of the fence needed "extensive repairs to make it sufficient to control his stock and to protect his said crops, and that the necessary repairs would have cost a large sum of money." It also appeared that defendant had a 40-acre vineyard, reserved in the lease, and that defendant kept the fence around it in repair; plaintiff also testified that "he inspected the fences on said premises at the time he entered into the lease, and that said fences and other improvements were in a poor state of repair at that time, as poor, in fact, as they have been at any time since."

The motion for nonsuit was on the grounds: (1) That the complaint fails to state a cause of action. (2) That under the covenant sued upon, defendant is under no obligation to make any repairs and that the measure of damages, if any, is the reasonable value of the services of a man, and the cost of the material necessary for making repairs, and that no such damage has been alleged or proved; that under the terms of the lease, or the said covenant, plaintiff is not entitled to recover anything for the value of the crops destroyed or by reason of defendant's failure to make repairs to any improvements on the premises. Appellant concedes that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action if it be true, as held by the lower court, that plaintiff's only remedy, on the breach of the alleged covenant, was to procure the material and labor necessary to make the needed repairs, make them himself, and to recover the cost of the material and labor of one man; for, as is admitted, the complaint nowhere alleges and the proof fails to show that plaintiff made any repairs, or furnished any material or labor for making them. We are thus brought to consider what seems to us the sole inquiry in the case—namely: (1) Was defendant under any obligation to do more than furnish the material and the labor of one man; and (2) failing to do this was he liable for the damage to the crops as the pleadings stand?

Appellant's contention is: (1) That the covenant in question "is a covenant on the part of the landlord to repair"; and hence the tenant may make the repairs and recover the cost from the landlord; or, he may leave the premises unrepaired, and recover any damage he may have sustained from the landlord's fault therein. Respondent's contention is: That the lessor is not compelled to make repairs unless there is some express agreement thereto, and that in the present case the obligation of the lessor, as to repairs, is limited solely to the furnishing of the necessary material and the labor of one man; and, failing in this, and upon demand of the lessee, the latter had the right to supply both, make the repairs and charge the cost of the material and of this labor to the lessor; and that this is the measure and extent of the lessee's damages. We know of no statute in this state, and our attention has been called to none, except in relation to "a building intended for occupation of human beings" (§§ 1941, 1942, Civ. Code), which, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, requires the lessor to put the premises "into condition fit for occupation" or "to repair subsequent dilapidations thereof." The common law has always thrown the burden of repairs upon the tenant, as being, in fact, as a bailee of the premises, and bound to restore them substantially as he received them; and the rule is that the tenant cannot compel the landlord to repair, unless he has bound himself by express agreement to that effect. Taylor on Landlord & Tenant (9th Ed.) § 327. The tenant cannot make repairs at the expense of the landlord, unless there be a special agreement between them authorizing him to do so. He takes the premises for better or for worse, and cannot involve the landlord in expense for repairs without his consent. Id. § 328; see Sieber v. Blanc, 76 Cal. 173, 18 Pac. 260; Callahan v. Loughran, 102 Cal. 476, 36 Pac. 835.

There being no statute changing the common-law rule in this state, in cases such as this one, and the common-law rule being against appellant's contention, the right of action in appellant must flow from the agreement alone. As there is no implied covenant, raised by law, that the landlord must make needed repairs, we do not think that the covenant in question should be given a construction not clearly deducible from its language. There is certainly no obligation cast upon the lessor to make repairs in any of the terms of the covenant. If any inference is to be drawn from the surrounding circumstances, at the time the contract was entered into, it is that as to the then condition of the fences and barns, it was known to the lessee and that condition must be presumed to have been accepted by him as satisfactory and that the repairs mentioned had reference to future requirements. It appeared by plaintiff's testimony that the condition of the fences and barns was the same, when the damage complained of accrued, as when the lease was entered into. If at this latter time immediate and extensive repairs had been contemplated, the parties would naturally have provided in the lease for making them. It seems to us that no argument is required to show that the lessor's obligation, by the terms of the lease, extended no further than to furnish materials for repairs and one man's labor, when called upon to do so; and this seems to have been the lessee's construction of the lease, for by his testimony it appears that the only demand made by him upon the lessor, was to do this and no more. When the lessor refused to comply with this demand, inasmuch as there was no duty put upon him to do more, the lessee's only course left was to purchase the material necessary to make the repairs, supply the labor of one man and he could then look to the lessor to pay for the outlay in money. We are clearly of opinion that the lessor could not stand by and see his crops destroyed by his own stock and expect the law to afford him compensation for ensuing damage. His damage and his only damage is to be measured by the material and labor which the lessor agreed to furnish. Plaintiff testified that "he did all he could to repair the fences." But he explained what he did and what he failed to do and hence what he testified to was but a conclusion. The cases cited by appellant to the effect that the lessee was not called upon to do that which the lessor had agreed to do, have no bearing on this case, as we do not think the lessor had agreed to make repairs.

SMITH v. HAMPSHIRE et al.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 23, 1906.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—PRESCRIPTIVE RIGHT—IRRIGATION DITCHES.

Where plaintiff constructed an irrigation ditch across defendants' land, plaintiff could acquire a prescriptive right to use and maintain the ditch for the specific purpose of conveying a given quantity of water while defendants at the same time were using a portion of the same ditch to convey a separate distinct quantity of water to a given point where defendants' checks and side ditch were maintained, plaintiff's prescriptive right being limited to his use, measured by the quantity of his water carried through the ditch.

2. APPEAL — FINDINGS — CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

Where the evidence on a particular issue is conflicting, and there is some evidence to support the finding made by the trial court, it cannot be disturbed on appeal, though the preponderance of the evidence is against it.

3. SAME—BRIEFS—DESIGNATION OF FOLIOS.

Where rulings on the admissibility of evidence are sought to be reviewed on appeal, appellant's brief should direct attention to the folios of the record where the rulings may be found.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, § 3095.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by Thomas Smith against Wyatt Hampshire and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. L. Phillips and J. F. Pryor, for appellant. Bradley & Farnsworth and W. R. McQuiddy, for respondents.

McLAUGHLIN, J. This action involves the respective rights of the parties to a water ditch and its use. It was alleged in the complaint that appellant owned the ditch with the right to its untrammeled use, and that respondents were hindering and obstructing him in the enjoyment of such rights. Title by adverse use and possession for the statutory period was specially pleaded and damages in the sum of $1,000 were claimed. The answer contained specific denials of these averments, set up the statute of limitations generally and by special plea of right to use the ditch and checks and side ditches connected therewith, acquired by adverse possession. The court found that respondents owned the land over which the ditch runs; that plaintiff in 1893 constructed the ditch across said land from a general ditch owned by the Lakeside Ditch Company (a corporation), and had used the same adversely to respondents, during the irrigating season, for 10 successive years, for the purpose of conveying a quantity of water to which he was entitled by reason of his ownership of 200 shares of the capital stock of said ditch company, to and upon his land for irrigating the same. It was further found that appellant, by long continued adverse use had acquired the right to enter upon said land and ditch for the purpose of cleaning out and repairing the latter, but that respondents had not interfered with this right, nor with the use of the ditch for the purpose of conveying the quantity of water above mentioned. Touching the rights of respondents, it was found that for more than 6 years before the commencement of this action, they had used a portion of said ditch jointly with appellant for the purpose of conveying a quantity of water, representing 70 shares in the ditch company, to a side ditch or open cut, where they at all times during the irrigating season of each year maintained checks to turn the said quantity of water into the side ditch for use in irrigating their land, and that such use of the ditch, side ditch and checks, was "open, notorious, peaceable, uninterrupted, continuous, exclusive, under a claim of right and adverse to the plaintiff and the whole world."

It is contended that this finding is utterly inconsistent with the finding as to appellant's prescriptive right, and that the conflict is so irreconcilable as to necessitate reversal. This raises the question whether appellant could acquire a prescriptive right to use and maintain the ditch for the specific purpose of conveying a given quantity of water over respondent's land, while respondents at the same time were using a portion of the same ditch for the purpose of conveying a separate distinct quantity to a given point where the checks and side ditch were maintained. We think that under the authorities in this state this question must be answered in the affirmative. Appellant's ripening prescriptive right was limited to his use, measured by the quantity of his water carried through the ditch, and if there was no hostile interference with that use, a permanent prescriptive right would accrue. This, the court found to be the fact, and as respondents have not appealed, this finding must be taken as importing absolute verity. The measure of appellant's right being thus fixed, respondents retained the right to their land, burdened only by the servitude growing out of appellant's easement acquired by prescription. Respondent's hostile, adverse use of the ditch for a purpose not in conflict with appellant's use, was a limitation of the latter right to the specific measured use apparently recognized. In other words, respondents could concede and recognize appellant's hostile claim of right to a given extent, but dispute and claim in hostility to the full measure of right asserted by the former. A ditch is no more than a right of way for the passage of water, and it was not essential that the use of the ditch, either by appellant or respondents, should be exclusive in order to confer the separate and distinct rights found and awarded by the court. This doctrine was announced by our Supreme Court in a well-considered case, where it was said: "Neither was the word 'exclusively' necessary to the answer. The ditch might have been used also as a waterway by plaintiff and others, and this would not prevent the use of the several defendants from ripening into a right by prescription, provided the latter use was in no way interfered with. Several parties could use and require a permanent and several right to use the same for waste water, just as several persons could use and acquire a private road." Abbott v. Pond, 142 Cal. 396, 76 Pac. 60, 61. Appellant asserts with earnestness and confidence that his right could not ripen if respondents were hostilely interfering with it. This is undoubtedly sound, but respondents, under the findings, did not interfere with appellant's use of the ditch, or right to keep it in repair, for the specific purpose of carrying his water over their land. They allowed it to flow on by the checks and side ditch without interference or diminution, hence the existence of appellant's prescriptive right. Had they turned his water out of, and their own into the ditch, this would have been a hostile interference with appellant's right which would have prevented it from ripening. But their acts were hostile merely to his asserted claim of exclusive right to use the ditch. They consisted only of going into the ditch appellant excavated, to erect and maintain dams during the irrigating season of each year, to turn their water which they, under hostile claim of right to do so, commingled with his water, through the side ditch, also maintained under an adverse claim of right. This limited, adverse, and hostile use conserved respondent's rights to so use the ditch and maintain its checks and side ditch. While respondents could not acquire a prescriptive right to a right of way over their own land, they could destroy appellant's claim of exclusive right by open, peaceable, notorious, and continuous adverse use, and thus establish their right (as against his asserted, exclusive claim) to use the ditch themselves for a limited purpose and commingle their water with his in so doing. The findings are, therefore, not conflicting.

It is said that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding in respondent's favor above mentioned. It may be said that the preponderance of evidence is against the finding, but as the evidence is conflicting, and there is some evidence to support the finding, it cannot be disturbed. "In support of the decision of the court below we must construe the testimony as favorably as possible for the defendants." Carteri v. Roberts, 140 Cal. 165, 73 Pac. 818, 819. While appellant undoubtedly ploughed through the sacks used as checks whenever he cleaned the ditch, there is no evidence to show that this was done at any time during the irrigating season when the respondents were using the same. Indeed, appellant recognized their right to maintain the checks and side ditch by suggesting a change of method in doing so. The respondents erected certain fences along and across the ditch and it is claimed by appellant that this constituted an unwarranted interference with his right. The court found against him on this point and we are not only convinced that the evidence sustains the finding, but feel certain that appellant gained a distinct advantage in this regard by having the burden of maintaining the ditch above the cross-fence saddled on the respondents. The other findings assailed are fully supported by the evidence.

Counsel for appellant in their briefs failed to direct attention to the folios where particular rulings on the admissibility of evidence might be found, but we have nevertheless traced and examined each ruling assailed, and found no prejudicial error.

The judgment is affirmed.

GUIBERSON v. ARGABRITE, Auditor.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 22, 1906.)

1. Justices of the Peace — Approval of Bond—Presumption.

The approval of the bond of a justice of the peace by the judge of the superior court being the exercise of a judicial function, it will be presumed, when such a bond approved by him is offered in evidence to show that the justice qualified, that when presented to the judge it was, as required by statute, accompanied by an affidavit showing the sureties were freeholders and householders, so as to warrant his approval, though no such affidavit is shown; it not being required to be indorsed on the bond, or to be recorded.

2. Appeal—Presumption.

Though the township in which plaintiff was justice of the peace was formed after the taking of the census of 1900, by which only can its population be determined for the purpose of fixing his compensation for services as such justice, the finding of the court that the population was a certain amount will, in the absence of anything to the contrary, be presumed to have been based on such census, it not being impossible that it could be so determined.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; J. W. Taggart, Judge.

Application by J. W. Guiberson for writ of mandate to J. L. Argabrite, auditor of Ventura County. Judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed with directions.

Thos. O. Toland and M. J. Rogers, for appellant. Edward M. Selby, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Application for writ of mandate. Judgment for defendant. Motion for new trial denied. Plaintiff appeals from such judgment and order.

Plaintiff makes this application for a writ of mandate to compel the auditor of Ventura county to issue his warrant upon the treasury of said county for $120 for plaintiff's salary as justice of the peace of Camulos township in criminal cases, for the six months beginning with April and ending with September, 1904. The auditor refused to issue such warrant upon the ground that Camulos township did not have a population of 500, according to the federal census of 1900, and upon the further ground that such justice has not qualified as such by filing an official bond in the form required by law, and that he did not perform the duties of such office. Upon the hearing of the case the court found that Camulos township, since September 6, 1901, has been a duly organized township with a population of more than 500 and less than 1,000; that said justice did not file his bond in the form required by law, and did not enter upon the discharge of the duties of his office, or continue in the discharge thereof, for the time mentioned in the application, and that no salary was due him.

The principal question argued in the original briefs was in relation to the sufficiency of the bond. The record shows a bond in due form of law, indorsed thereon an affidavit of justification by the sureties to the effect that the signers thereof were each property holders and residents within Ventura county. The bond also contained an indorsed approval by the judge of the superior court of the county, together with an indorsement of its filing and record in the recorder's office upon the date of its approval. This bond the court refused to accept in evidence, because it did not appear that the sureties had justified, for the reason that no affidavit was presented showing that the sureties were freeholders or householders, as the statute requires. The refusal to receive such bond in evidence was error, and the finding that no bond was filed has no support in the record. The statute requires that a bond presented to the superior court for approval shall be accompanied by an affidavit showing that the sureties are freeholders and householders. The affidavit is no part of the bond, is not required to be indorsed thereon, nor to be recorded. The statute, however, directs the character of evidence which should be received by the court, and that it should be in the nature of an affidavit presented to him. The approval by the judge was in the exercise of a judicial function (Miller v. Board, 25 Cal. 97), and it will be presumed that he had before him competent evidence warranting the approval, and that the evidence was of the character directed by the statute. We may not say that the affidavit indorsed was the only evidence in that regard, and that no affidavit accompanied the bond containing the things required by law. The approval of the judge was sufficient to entitle the instrument to be recorded and to be received in evidence, the same being in all other respects in due form of law. There is no evidence in support of the finding that the plaintiff did not enter upon and continue in the discharge of the duties of the office; on the contrary, the undisputed evidence is that he did perform such duties.

In a supplemental brief, it is insisted, upon the authority of Chinn v. Gunn (Cal. Sup.) 84 Pac. 669, that Camulos township, having been formed after the census of 1900, contains no population which may be ascertained by such census, and, therefore, is a township within the class and to which section 187, subsec. 13 of the Act of 1901, does not apply. See St. 1901, p. 755, c. 234. This section provides that townships in the class of counties to which Ventura belongs are classified by the population as shown by the federal census of 1900, and that townships having a population of over 500 and less than 1,000 shall be of the fourth class, and townships of less than 500 shall be of the fifth class; that the salary of a justice in criminal matters in townships of the fourth class shall be $20, and of the fifth class $10 per month. It is held by the Supreme Court in Chinn v. Gunn, supra, that this population can only be determined by the census of 1900. The finding of the court that the population is of a fixed amount, in the absence of anything to the contrary, will be assumed to have been based upon such census. The statement on motion for a new trial shows that such evidence as was pertinent to the specifications of error is all that such statement purports to contain. There is no specification in relation to the finding that the township has a fixed population. We do not know what evidence was before the court in its support. That the township was formed after the census of 1900 was taken does not of necessity demonstrate that the population within the new township may not be determined from such census. It may be true that Camulos township is composed of two or more townships which were existing at the date of the taking of the census, and the court was able to determine the population from such aggregate population. In addition to all of this, there is no specification of error in relation to such finding, and, for the purposes of this decision, such population must be accepted. The case is then presented of an official discharging duties in a township having a classification, with a fixed salary, for which services he has presented his claim. It was the duty of the court to have issued the mandate prayed for.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to issue the writ.

PEOPLE v. HEMPLE.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 18, 1906.)

1. EMBEZZLEMENT—ACTS OF AGENT—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE.

Under Pen. Code, § 508, defining embezzlement by an agent or servant, it is necessary to prove that the accused was an agent, that the property came into his hands as the property of his employer, that he received it in the course of his employment, and that he appropriated it to his own use with intent to steal it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 18, Cent. Dig. Embezzlement, § 13.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE—EMBEZZLEMENT.

In a prosecution for embezzlement by an agent of a theater company of money received on the sale of tickets, where the only method of determining how many tickets had been sold was by referring to the racks containing the tickets for sale, or to the stubs of the tickets received at the door, testimony of another agent who followed accused in selling tickets, from a memorandum as to what the stubs and unsold tickets showed, was inadmissible, the original evidence having been immediately destroyed.

3. SAME—HEARSAY.

Testimony from a memorandum as to the contents of a receipt from a theatrical company for its proportion of the receipts for a certain day, admitted in a prosecution for embezzlement, to show the total receipts by the theater company for the day, was hearsay.

4. EMBEZZLEMENT—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence in a prosecution for embezzlement held insufficient to show that the defendant received the amount alleged to have been embezzled.

5. SAME—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Evidence, in a prosecution for embezzlement, held to present a question for the jury as to whether defendant fled to escape arrest.

6. CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—MODIFICATION OF REQUEST.

Where the court was requested to instruct that to warrant a conviction the prosecution must prove "so clearly and conclusively to your minds," etc., or "so clearly and conclusively that there is no reasonable theory upon which he can be innocent when all the evidence in the case is considered together," there was no error in striking out the phrases quoted and inserting in place of each the words "beyond all reasonable doubt."

7. EMBEZZLEMENT—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution for embezzlement, where there was evidence that other persons had equal opportunities with defendant to have taken the money, it was error to refuse an instruction that the defendant was the only person on trial, and that if the evidence points as clearly to some other person as the one who committed the crime, as to the defendant, or if the jury entertain a reasonable doubt as to whether the defendant or some other person is the guilty party, the defendant should be acquitted.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; W. B. Nutter, Judge.

George Hemple was convicted of embezzlement. From the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

T. J. Butts, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

BUCKLES, J. The defendant was charged with embezzling $142.50, convicted, moved for a new trial, which was denied, and was then sentenced to five years' imprisonment. He appeals from the order denying a new trial and from the judgment.

The charging part of the information is as follows: "The said George Hemple was agent and servant to one C. P. Hall, and, being agent and servant as aforesaid, by virtue of his said employment as such agent and servant, there came into the care and control of the said George Hemple, for and on account of the said C. P. Hall, the sum of one hundred forty-two and fifty one-hundredths ($142.50) dollars, lawful money of the United States, and the said George Hemple aforesaid, so received and took into his control and care the said money for and on account of the said C. P. Hall, and afterwards, to wit, on the 5th day of December, 1902, at and in said county and state, the said George Hemple willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and fraudulently did embezzle, convert, and appropriate the same to his own use, and not in the due and lawful execution of the said trust of him, the said George Hemple. * * *." The information is assailed on the ground that it is not charged therein that the defendant was the agent of Hall at the time of the alleged conversion.

It is charged that defendant received the money as the agent and servant of Hall and that he thereafter unlawfully, willfully, feloniously, and fraudulently did embezzle, convert, and appropriate the same to his own use and not to the due and lawful execution of the said trust. We think this language sufficiently charges the continuance of the trust up to and including the time of the alleged conversion. The allegation is that he received the money on December 5th, and converted it the same day. That he was in the possession of it, if at all, as the agent and servant of Hall, there could be no doubt. He is distinctly charged with having received the money for and on account of Hall and of having feloniously embezzled and converted it to his own use, and not in the due and lawful execution of his trust. The information was sufficient. People v. Johnson, 71 Cal. 384, 12 Pac. 261; People v. Gordon, 133 Cal. 328, 65 Pac. 746, 85 Am. St. Rep. 174; People v. McLean, 135 Cal. 306, 67 Pac. 770; People v. Goodrich, 142 Cal. 216, 75 Pac. 796.

The facts are as follows: The defendant was in the employ of C. P. Hall in the theatrical business. His duties under such employment were to advertise coming attractions, prepare tickets for sale of seats, sell them, receive the money therefor, safely keep the same, and turn it over to Hall or his agent Henry on the night of the performance. On December 5, 1902, the "Florodora Company" gave a performance at the Yosemite Theater in Stockton. About a week prior to that time Henry had given defendant instructions about the sale of tickets and the prices to be charged for seats in different parts of the theater, and the defendant began the sale of these tickets at the box office of the theater about the 1st day of December, and continued selling up to shortly after noon on the 5th, when Henry arrived at the box office and took charge. There had been some controversy about the salary defendant was to have. He had been at work at this employment for at least two months and was demanding $75 per month, but had been paid only $50 per month for the two months he had worked up to December 1st. When he learned from Henry that Hall would not pay $75 per month, he left the box office, and never returned. He says he informed Henry as he left that he would work no more at the wages paid and did not care for that kind of work any more and that he was through, and he did quit and left Mr. Henry in charge at the box office. The defendant says he knew the different prices at which he was to sell the tickets and he did sell them at such prices—but no price is mentioned—and put the money for all the tickets he sold in the till, and, so far as he knew, it was all there when he left on the 5th, and that he never appropriated any of it. The testimony of defendant further shows that on the 5th of December, while the sale of tickets was on, he was at the same time engaged in a room across the hall from the box office in arranging the advertising, etc., and when there was a call for tickets he would go across to the box office, sell the tickets and then return to his work in the room across the hall. There were numerous other persons about there, but no evidence that any other person than defendant and Henry had access to the money drawer. There was a lock on the door to the box office, but no evidence tending to show whether it was kept locked when defendant was out, or not. When defendant did not return, Henry says he made a casual count of the money in the drawer, examined the tickets, and concluded the money was not all there. There was about $600 there. Henry continued the sale of tickets, and that night when the show was over he says he counted the money and compared the stubs of the tickets found in the box at the door with the money in the drawer, and found the money was short $142.50. The prices at which the different tickets were to be sold were not placed on the tickets or stubs.

Henry testified, over the objection of defendant, that at the time, December 5th, he made an entry in his account book of the tickets sold, from the stubs in the box, for the "Florodora Show," which he testified to be as follows:

10	seats at $2.00 each............	$ 20 00
325	seats at $1.50 each.............	487 50
193	seats at $1.00 each.............	193 00
48	Box seats at $1.00 each........	48 00
247	Balcony circle seats at $.75 each..	185 25
215	Gallery seats at $.50 each......	107 50
7	admissions at $.50 each........	3 50
	Making a total of.............	$1,044 75

The amount of money in the till or money drawer was then but $902.25. Different prices were indicated by different colored tickets. Both the unsold tickets and the stubs which Henry says he counted in the box at the door of the theater, he destroyed at the end of the performance when he had made the count. He also testified from an entry in a book that he paid the "Florodora Co." $835.80, 80 per cent. of $1,044.75.

The foregoing is the evidence, and the only evidence, so far as can be learned from the transcript, by which it was sought to show that defendant collected and had in his possession from the sale of those tickets the sum of $1,044.75, and the only evidence tending to show that he appropriated $142.50 of it. In order to make out a case of embezzlement of property by an agent, four things must concur, and each must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt: (1) That the defendant was such agent. This fact is admitted in this case. (2) That the property charged to have been embezzled must have come into the hands of the defendant as the property of his employer. (3) That he received it in the course of his employment; and (4) that he appropriated it to his own use with intent to steal it. Pen. Code, §§ 506, 508; Ex parte Hedley, 31 Cal. 108; People v. Gordon, 133 Cal. 538, 65 Pac. 746, 85 Am. St. Rep. 174; 10 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 983 (2d Ed); Pullan v. State, 56 Am. Rep. 21. The money received for the sale of tickets was to be distributed as follows: 80 per cent. of the gross receipts to the Florodora Company and 20 per cent. of the gross receipts to be retained by Hall, and, until this division was made, the whole of the proceeds of the sale of tickets would be the property of Hall, and, therefore, if defendant received the money he is charged with embezzling, it was the property of Hall as charged so far as the purposes of this case are concerned. The first question then, is: Did defendant receive the $142.50? As has been seen there is no direct or positive evidence that he did, and we are simply left to infer he did because he sold tickets at the prices at which they were to be sold and put the money he received therefrom in the money drawer; that Henry found about $600 in the drawer when he took charge, and the evidence of Henry that when he counted the money when the ticket office closed there was $902.25 in the drawer and that when he counted the stubs he found there should have been $1,044.75 there. The tickets were sold at various prices for seats in different parts of the theater, so that to know the aggregate of money which should have been taken in it would be necessary to know just how many tickets of each kind were sold. This could be ascertained in only two ways: (1) To know just the number of tickets of each kind in the rack when the selling began and then count what remained after the selling closed; and (2) to count the stubs of each kind of ticket found in the box at the door of the theater and in each case taking into account passes issued. Henry testified that he concluded there was about $600 in the cash drawer when he commenced selling tickets the afternoon of the 5th, and no accurate count was made until the ticket selling had closed that evening. He then testified, over the objection of defendant, from a memorandum he says he made at the time, that counting the tickets unsold and the stubs in the box, there should have been $1,044.75 in the cash drawer when in fact there was but $902.25. He further says that immediately upon making the count and settling with the show people, he destroyed the stubs and the unsold tickets. Henry says he could not tell how much money was in the till that night when he came to settle with the show people without referring to his memorandum. Under all the circumstances shown in this case, we say it was error to permit Henry to testify from his memorandum. He and defendant were both the agents of Hall, both had sold tickets for that same show that day and all the money both received should have been in the drawer. Defendant testified that he put in the money drawer all the money he received from the sale of tickets, and the evidence shows he had previously borne a good reputation. Henry continued to sell tickets that afternoon, but he does not pretend to say he put all the money he received into the money drawer. Having destroyed the only evidence by which it could be ascertained how much money there should have been in the money drawer, if all the money to represent the tickets sold had gone into the money drawer, and he being equally liable with defendant for this money, he should not have been permitted to testify from the memorandum made by him even though made at the time, for, under the circumstances, it is no more nor less than a self-serving declaration. To further strengthen Henry's position that defendant stole the $142.50, he testifies, over defendant's objection, from what he says is the receipt of the Florodora Company's manager for $835.80, which would be 80 per cent. of $1,044.75, the amount which he says, from his memorandum, should have been in the money drawer, but the receipt was not put in evidence. The receipt of Henry Elsner, the manager of the Florodora Company, seems from the evidence to have consisted merely in signing his name in a book. This was the kind of evidence denominated "hearsay," and the most dangerous to a defendant in a criminal case, who is entitled to be confronted with the witnesses against him that he may cross-examine them. The prosecution deemed it important to show that the Florodora Company had received $835.80, which was 80 per cent. of $1,044.75, in order to support the statement in Henry's memorandum that that sum should have been in the money drawer. Henry Elsner, for aught that appears, might have been brought into court to have testified.

There is absolutely no evidence tending to show that the defendant ever received more money for the sale of tickets than he left with Henry, except what may be inferred from Henry's memorandum and from what he says is Henry Elsner's receipt, and the evidence based upon these two instruments should have been excluded. It is true that after the cross-examination of Henry and the prosecution took him for redirect examination, he testified that he destroyed the stubs and unsold tickets because it was the custom to do so, and that he did not know they would ever be needed. But if there was a shortage in the money he knew it and had also suspected defendant of stealing it. From these facts and the further fact that having the same opportunity of taking the money as defendant had, he would most naturally have saved the evidence by which the crime might have been fastened upon defendant. The errors here pointed out, we think, entitle the defendant to a new trial.

The following testimony was given for and against the theory that the defendant fled: Henry testified that when he came to the ticket office between 12 and 1 o'clock of December 5th, defendant was there and that defendant said nothing about quitting, but soon put on his coat, and went out. Not returning by the middle of the afternoon, he made inquiry for defendant, and got no information as to where he was. Then Henry counted the money and concluded the money was not all there. He telephoned for defendant and remained in the office till 6 o'clock. At that time the defendant had four or five days' wages due him at $50 per month. When Henry did not find the defendant after inquiring at the newspaper offices, his hotel, and his usual haunts, some time that afternoon he reported to the police. Defendant testified that when he left the ticket office the afternoon of December 5th, he went to his hotel, laid down a half hour, then walked around town, and finally took the afternoon train for San Francisco, and did not know he was wanted by any one, and never knew until his arrest that the officers were looking for him. He remained in San Francisco a few days, and went to Petaluma, where he remained for two months, and then went to Camp Meeker and remained in that vicinity—except a few times when he went to the city—until his arrest in July, 1905. During all this time he went by the name of George Hemple, met and talked with officers from San Francisco, and people from Stockton, and knew all the officers and constables about the places he frequented, knew the sheriff of Sonoma county, with whom he did business. That the reason he quit his employers in the unceremonious manner he did was that he had had words with Henry about his salary; that he wanted $75 a month and had been informed he would not get that, and had then told Henry he would quit, and thereupon left. There seems to have been no concealment or attempt on the part of the defendant to keep out of the way of the officers, and we do not think there was sufficient evidence of his fleeing from the place where the crime is alleged to have been committed, or that he attempted to conceal himself to prevent arrest. But as there was some evidence tending to show flight, the jury is left to determine the weight.

The court gave eight instructions of its own motion. Defendant assigns as error all of these. We have read these instructions over, and see no error in any of them. It is the duty of counsel to point out the specific instruction which he believes does not state the law, so that the appellate court may properly test the same.

The next error assigned is that the defendant requested two instructions, which the court modified and then gave. The first was as follows: "To warrant a conviction of the defendant the prosecution must prove so clearly and conclusively to your minds, not only that the defendant actually received the sum of $142.50 in cash over and above the sum left in the drawer at the theater, but that he thereafter feloniously, etc." The court cut out the words italicized in the above instruction, and inserted instead the words "beyond all reasonable doubt." In the other the language offered was as follows: "To warrant a conviction of the defendant, he must be proved to be guilty so clearly and conclusively that there is no reasonable theory upon which he can be innocent when all the evidence in the case is considered together." The words italicized were stricken out and the following inserted in their stead: "beyond all reasonable doubt." In both of these instructions as the court modified the language, the jury was plainly informed that if the defendant was guilty the proof must satisfy their minds beyond all reasonable doubt of his guilt or he was entitled to a verdict of acquittal, and it seems to us the language tendered by the defendant could have no greater weight or significance. It amounts to but a choice of words in expressing the same thing. We see no error in this. However, the court should give an instruction requested by a defendant which clearly expresses the law, in the language asked.

The court refused the following instruction, which is assigned as error: "I instruct you the defendant George Hemple is the only person on trial before you for this alleged offense, and that if you find from a consideration of all the evidence that it points as clearly to some other person, as the person who committed the crime in question as it does to the defendant, or if, after a fair and full consideration of all the evidence, the jury entertain a reasonable doubt as to whether the said George Hemple or some other person is the guilty party, then it is your duty to acquit the defendant."

A defendant is entitled to have an instruction given when it announces the law, responsive to every element of his defense shown by the evidence. The defendant testified to circumstances and facts that stand undisputed which showed that other persons than himself had opportunities of—in one instance taking the money from the till, and, in another—committing the crime of embezzling the same. On the 5th day of December, while selling tickets at the ticket office, he was also engaged in doing other work in another room across the entrance from the ticket window. This evidence was offered for no other purpose than to show that while defendant was attending to other duties away from the drawer where the money was kept, others had at least the opportunity, however slight, of "tapping the till" and stealing the money. Then, again, the witness Henry who had testified to having discovered the shortage had the same opportunity to appropriate the $142.50 as did defendant. He was but an agent of Hall himself, and handling Hall's money. The defendant proved a good character, and had testified that he sold the tickets at the proper prices, and put all the money received in the money drawer and that so far as he knew, it was all there when Henry took charge. I think that under the facts appearing in this case, this instruction should have been given, and it was prejudicial error to have refused it.

There are many errors assigned relating to the rulings of the court upon the admissibility of evidence, but seeing no prejudicial error in any not referred to here, we will not set them forth.

The order and judgment are reversed.

KOYER v. BENEDICT et al.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 3, 1906.)

1. Appeal—Necessary Parties.

On appeal from a judgment foreclosing a mortgage by a subsequent grantee of the property who contends that the mortgage was void, his codefendants, the mortgagors, who executed the notes for the mortgage debt and might become personally liable therefor if such contention were sustained, are adverse parties on whom notice of appeal must be served.

2. Same—Service of Notice.

Where it appears that the residence of necessary parties to an appeal is in the same place and was known to the appellants, notice of appeal cannot be served on them by mail, but service must be made at their residence, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1011, subsec. 2.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 2, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 2151, 2162–2164.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Action by A. S. Koyer against Charles E. Benedict and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Stull appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Charles S. McKelvey and Gertrude Stull, for appellant. Will A. Harris and Harris & Harris, for respondent.

GRAY, P. J. This is an action upon a promissory note and to foreclose a mortgage given to secure said note. The mortgage and note were executed by Charles E. Benedict and his wife, Martha S. Benedict, to the plaintiff. Summons was duly served upon some 13 defendants, and the defendants so served seem to have defaulted, except the defendant Gertrude Stull, who answered the complaint; and, judgment having gone against her, she appeals from said judgment.

The plaintiff moves to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that no proper service of the notice of appeal was made upon the Benedicts. The Benedicts are interested in the result of the appeal herein, for the reason that if the judgment should be reversed, and the contention of the appellant that the mortgage is null and void be sustained on a new trial of the case, the Benedicts might be left personally liable on the note, with nothing to be derived from a foreclosure sale to satisfy any part of that liability. They were, therefore, adverse parties, and it was necessary that the Benedicts should have been duly served with the notice of appeal. Pending the hearing of the motion to dismiss the appeal, appellant obtained leave of this court to file affidavits showing said service. These affidavits were subsequently filed, and show that service of the notice was attempted to be made by mailing the same in Los Angeles, addressed to the Benedicts in Los Angeles, "at the corner of 20th and Barnard Park, * * * their said place of residence." It appears from this that the residence of the Benedicts was known to the parties making the service; therefore, the service could not be made by mail, but should have been made "by leaving the notice or other paper at his residence, between the hours of 8 in the morning and 6 in the evening, with some person of suitable age and discretion." Code Civ. Proc. § 1011, subsec. 2. The affidavits fail to show that the parties "reside or have their offices in different places," so as to bring the case under section 1012 of the Code of Civil Procedure. On the contrary, the affidavits show that both parties reside in Los Angeles.

The affidavit of W. J. Ford, as we understand it, relates to a former attempted appeal, which was not perfected and is not before us.

The appeal is dismissed.

GRAHAM v. BRYANT.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 24, 1906.)

APPEAL—FINDINGS—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

A verdict based on conflicting evidence and sustained by the trial court, will not be reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. C. Sloss, Judge.

Action by F. J. Graham against A. M. Bryant. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George D. Collins and A. E. Ball for appellant. William Cannon, for respondent.

HARRISON, P. J. Action upon a promissory note. The cause was tried before a jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of the defendant. Plaintiff moved for a new trial upon the grounds that the verdict was not sustained by the evidence, and that certain errors of law were committed at the trial. The motion was denied, and from this order the plaintiff has appealed.

The signing of the note by the defendant was conceded, and the only issue presented to the jury was the want of consideration for making the same. Upon this issue there was a direct conflict of testimony between the defendant and the witness for the plaintiff with whom the defendant had the transaction in which the note was signed. It is unnecessary to recount this testimony, since the determination of the jury as to which of these witnesses was entitled to credit is conclusive. The jury were fully and clearly instructed as to the elements necessary to constitute a consideration for the note in view of the evidence before them, and no exception was taken to these instructions. The fact, moreover, that the trial court declined to set the verdict aside is an additional ground for us to hold that it was fully sustained by the evidence. The contract of the defendant in reference to the prosecution of her claim against the Adler estate was properly received in evidence as illustrative of the circumstances connected with her signing of the note sued upon. The exhibit shown to the witness for the plaintiff was offered solely for the purpose of affecting his credibility, and was admissible for that purpose.

The other errors relied upon do not require consideration.

The order is affirmed.

AHLERS v. BARRETT.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 23, 1906.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT—UNLAWFUL DETAINER—EVIDENCE—FINDINGS.

In an action of unlawful detainer, evidence held insufficient to sustain findings that plaintiff was entitled to possession, and for the recovery of a specified sum as rent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Landlord and Tenant, § 1248.]

2. APPEAL—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—INSUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—SPECIFCATIONS.

An assignment of error that there was "no" evidence to sustain, or tending to prove, the allegations of plaintiff's complaint, which the court found to be true, was not objectionable for failure to point out the respects in which the evidence was insufficient.

3. SAME.

A specification of error alleged that the evidence was insufficient to justify or support the decision and particularly finding No. 4, for the reason that there was no evidence that at the time of the commencement of the action there was due plaintiff from defendant for rent the sum of $150 or any other sum. Another specification recited that the evidence was insufficient to support the decision, and particularly finding No. 5, for the reason that there was no evidence that there was due or owing plaintiff from defendant for rent of the premises described, in addition to the sum named in finding No. 4, the sum of $300, or any other sum. Held, that such specifications were sufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Henry Ahlers against Minnie E. Barrett. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, she appeals. Reversed.

George A. Clough, for appellant. George H. Perry and Frank McGowan, for respondent.

COOPER, J. Appeal from judgment, and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The complaint alleges that about September 1, 1902, Eleanor Sudden and others by verbal lease let to defendant the premises known and designated as "103 Eighth street," in the city and county of San Francisco, up to, but not including, the 1st day of May, 1903, at the monthly rent of $25 per month, payable monthly; that defendant entered under the lease, and ever since has continued to hold and occupy the premises; that defendant holds over and continues in possession without the permission of plaintiff and contrary to the terms of the lease; that plaintiff, on the 30th day of September, 1903, notified the defendant in writing that the tenancy of said premises would expire November 1, 1903, but that defendant continued to hold possession notwithstanding demand in writing was made by plaintiff for the possession of the same; that more than three days has elapsed since said demand, and defendant has ever since failed and neglected to deliver up to plaintiff the possession of the said premises; that the monthly rents and profits of the premises is the sum of $25; that about the 1st day of May, 1903, the said Eleanor Sudden and others leased the said premises to plaintiff by a written lease for the term of three years from date, under, and by virtue of, which plaintiff became, and still is, entitled to the possession of the said premises. There is no allegation in the complaint that the defendant has ever failed to pay the rent. Although it is alleged in the complaint that the verbal lease to defendant expired May 1, 1903, it is also alleged that the plaintiff notified defendant that her tenancy would expire November 1, 1903. The defendant in her answer denies the material allegations of the complaint; denies that on the 1st day of May, or at any other time, the said Eleanor Sudden and others executed or delivered to plaintiff any lease of said premises for a term of three years or for any term; denies that by virtue of any written lease the plaintiff is, or ever has been, entitled to the possession of the said premises; denies that the term for which the premises were leased to her has expired; and alleges affirmatively that she entered into possession of the premises under a written lease from said Eleanor Sudden and others, which lease is still in force and effect, and under which she is still entitled to the possession of the premises. The pleadings were verified. The court found that all allegations of the answer are untrue; that the amount of rent due from defendant to plaintiff at the time the action was commenced was $150; and that the amount that had accrued after the action was commenced was the sum of $300, which said latter sum should be trebled. Judgment was accordingly entered for plaintiff for the possession of the premises and for $1,050 and costs of suit. Defendant claims that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings, and the claim must be sustained. The only evidence offered in behalf of plaintiff was his own testimony to the effect that he knows the defendant, and that she lives on the premises described. The defendant testified that she was occupying the premises, and had been so occupying them since 1900; that a paper shown to her was the contract under which she went into possession of the premises. This is all the evidence in the case. The plaintiff showed no title or right of possession in himself. He showed no lease between himself and defendant, or anything to show that the relation of landlord and tenant ever existed between them. He did not attempt to prove that defendant was wrongfully occupying the premises, or that she had made default in the payment of rent. When defendant offered in evidence the writing under which she went into possession, the plaintiff objected to it, and the court sustained the objection. We are at a loss to comprehend the theory upon which the plaintiff submitted the case, or upon which the court made the findings.

Plaintiff contends that the evidence cannot be considered here because the specifications of insufficiency are not sufficient in law. The specifications are sufficient under the liberal rule now followed here. The first one states that there is no evidence to sustain, or tending to prove, the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, which allegations the court found to be true. If there is no evidence, that is about all that could be said about it. It is not necessary to point out the respects wherein no evidence is insufficient to sustain a finding. It is specified that "the evidence is insufficient to justify or support the decision, and particularly finding 4, for the reason that there was no evidence produced at the trial to prove, or tending to prove, that at the time of the commencement of the action there was due from defendant to plaintiff for rent of the premises described in the amended complaint, the sum of $150, or any other sum." It is further specified that "the evidence is insufficient to justify or support the decision, and particularly finding 5, for the reason that there was no evidence offered at the trial proving, or tending to prove, that there is now due or owing plaintiff from defendant for rent of the premises described in the amended complaint, in addition to the sum named in finding 4, the sum of $300, or any other sum." There are 10 specifications in all, and they certainly called the attention of the plaintiff to the fact that defendant intended to claim that the evidence was insufficient as to the material findings. They were in the nature of a notice to plaintiff which must be regarded with liberality. American Type, etc., Co. v. Packer, 130 Cal. 459, 62 Pac. 744; Standard Quicksilver Co. v. Habishaw, 132 Cal. 124, 64 Pac. 113; Swift v. Occidental Mining, etc., Co., 141 Cal. 168, 74 Pac. 700; Bell v. Staack, 141 Cal. 186, 74 Pac. 774.

PEOPLE v. THORNBURGH.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 27, 1906.)

1. FORGERY—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE—NATURE OF INSTRUMENT.

A check drawn payable to the maker or order and not indorsed cannot be the subject of forgery, and where the forgery of the indorsement therein is relied upon to constitute the offense, under Pen. Code, § 470, it must be so charged in the information.

2. SAME—SUFFICIENCY OF INFORMATION.

An information charging the forgery of "a certain instrument in writing" which is set out and shown to be a check payable to the maker or order and with his name indorsed thereon does not charge the forgery of the indorsement, which is not a part of the check. but creates a separate contract, nor does it charge a public offense.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; William P. Lawlor, Judge.

Information for forgery against Herbert T. Thornburgh. Defendant was convicted, and appeals. Reversed.

Wm. S. Barnes and H. H. McCloskey, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

HALL, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of forgery, and the case is before this court on his appeal from an order denying his motion for a new trial, and from the judgment.

The point was made, both upon demurrer and upon motion in arrest of judgment, that the information does not charge a public offense, and this is now the principal point relied upon for a reversal of the judgment. The information charges that defendant "did then and there willfully, unlawfully, feloniously and fraudulently, and with intent then and there to damage, prejudice and defraud one, Ignatz Beck, make and forge a certain instrument in writing, check, draft, order and writing obligatory, in the words and figures following, to wit: 'San Francisco, April 15th, 1905. No. ———. The Crocker Woolworth National Bank of San Francisco. Pay to self or order $10.00 ten dollars. Clearing House No. 21. C. A. Baxter.' Indorsed 'C. A. Baxter.'" And then follows a charge in apt language of uttering the same instrument to Beck.

It is urged that because the instrument set forth in the information appears upon its face to be payable to the maker thereof no one could be defrauded thereby; that the defendant is not charged with forging the indorsement of the name of the maker and payee on the back of the instrument, which makes the instrument in legal effect payable to bearer, but is charged with forging the face of the instrument only. The check set forth in the information, without the indorsement, is not such an instrument as could be the means of defrauding any one. It purports to be an order signed by C. A. Baxter for the payment of money to C. A. Baxter. If the order should be complied with and the money called for paid to Baxter, he certainly would not be defrauded; neither would the payer be defrauded, for, by accepting payment, Baxter would at once be estopped from disputing the genuineness of the signature. So, too, if Baxter indorsed the check, he would be liable on the check as fully as though he signed it. "An order to pay money to one's self cannot be the subject of forgery until the maker indorses it." Com. v. Dallinger, 118 Mass. 439.

This brings us to a consideration of the words following the check set forth in the information, to wit, "Indorsed 'C. A. Baxter.'" In the case of People v. Cole, 130 Cal. 13, 62 Pac. 274, the defendant E. J. Cole was charged with the forgery and utterance of a check which was set forth in the information as follows: "'Sacramento, Cal. Aug. 31, 1899. National Bank of D. O. Mills & Co. Pay to E. J. Cole or order, Ten dollars ($10.00). [Signed] E. J. Cole.' Indorsed on back 'S. B. Smith.'" In discussing the question as to whether or not the information charged a public offense against Cole, the court, after determining that the instrument on its face (without the indorsement) was not a subject of forgery, said: "It is claimed that the indorsement of 'S. B. Smith' was forged. If so, the information should have so stated. It shows that the check was indorsed 'S. B. Smith,' and we must presume that S. B. Smith indorsed it as stated in the information. It is not even hinted that the indorsement was forged or made without the authority of Smith. * * * The information shows the check to bear the indorsement 'S. B. Smith,' but the indorsement is no part of the check. The contract of the indorser is a different and distinct contract from that of the maker. His liability is only conditional and dependent upon circumstances that may never transpire." The cause was remanded, with directions to the lower court to sustain the demurrer.

Applying the doctrine of the Cole Case to the information now before us, we must hold that defendant is not charged with forging the indorsement, but on the contrary we must presume that the indorsement was in fact made by Baxter on the instrument set forth. If this were so, Baxter at once became liable on the instrument set forth as fully as though he had in fact drawn and signed it, and no one could be defrauded thereby. It must be remembered that our statute makes it a crime to forge certain instruments with intent to defraud, and also to forge an indorsement to certain instruments with such intent. Pen. Code, § 470. Where the prosecution relies upon the forgery of the indorsement to make out the crime, it is a very simple matter to expressly charge a forgery of the indorsement.

For the foregoing reasons, and upon the authority of People v. Cole, supra, the judgment and order are reversed, with directions to the trial court to sustain the demurrer.

We concur: HARRISON, P. J.; COOPER, J.

DONNELLAN v. WOOD, CURTIS & CO.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 31, 1906.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT — LEASE — CONSTRUCTION—TERMINATION.

A lease of reclaimed land at $10 per acre provided that if, by reason of flood or imperfect reclamation, any part of the land should be submerged or overflowed, so as to be impossible of cultivation prior to June 1st in any year, during the term of the lease, the lessee should not be bound to pay rent for the parts so submerged, and that the lease was subject to cancellation by the lessee by giving notice at any time during the term, should the reclamation not be sufficient to permit the cultivation and farming thereof at seasonable times of the year. On February 26, 1904, the premises were submerged, so that it was impossible to cultivate the land prior to the month of June, and on May 10, 1904, the lessee canceled the lease by notice, and in an action for rent prior to the date of cancellation it was proved that the cultivation prior to February was merely by way of preparation for seeding, and was profitless. Held that, the premises having been overflowed prior to June 1st, the lessee was not liable for rent for the first half of the year, payable April 1, 1904.

2. APPEAL—JUDGMENT FOR PLAINTIFF—PREJUDICE.

Where defendant did not appeal from the judgment in favor of plaintiff for $20, such judgment will not be reviewed on plaintiff's appeal; she not being injured thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 4052–4062.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Marion J. Donnellan against Wood, Curtis & Co. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff for less than the relief demanded, she appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Shinn, for appellant. J. Frank Brown, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action for rent of farming land under the terms of a written lease made by plaintiff to defendant. The land leased (about 531 acres) was situated in reclamation district No. 673, in the county of Sacramento. The lease was entered into October 29, 1902, and was for the term of five years commencing January 1, 1903. The rental was $10 per acre, and was to be paid in equal semiannual installments on April 1st and September 1st during the term. The lease contained, among other provisions, the following: "(5) It is further understood and agreed that if by reason of flood or imperfect reclamation any part of the leased premises shall be submerged or overflowed to such an extent as to render it impossible to cultivate the same prior to the month of June in any year during the term of this lease, the party of the second part shall not be obliged to pay rental for the part or parts that may become submerged or overflowed. (6) It is further agreed that the party of the second part may at its option, cancel this lease by giving notice in writing to the party of the first part, or her duly accredited agent, at any time during the term of this lease, should the reclamation of the leased premises be not sufficient to permit the cultivation and farming thereof at seasonable times of the year." The defense made in the answer was that on February 26, 1904, the premises were overflowed and submerged to such extent as to render all the land impossible of cultivation prior to the month of June, or "to permit of the cultivation and farming thereof at seasonable times of the year"; that under the terms of the lease defendant did, "on the 10th day of May, 1904, cancel said lease by then and there giving plaintiff notice in writing, * * * and that thereafter, on the 11th day of May, 1904, plaintiff signified her concurrence in the cancellation thereof in writing, and then and there signified her intention to and did treat said lease as terminated of said 10th day of May, 1904." There was evidence sufficient to show these allegations to be true, and the court so found. The record contains the following admissions: "That the lease was canceled by the defendant with the consent of the plaintiff and on the 10th day of May, 1094, according to its terms, and that plaintiff took possession of the leased premises on said day; that the reclamation of the premises * * * was not sufficient to permit the cultivation and farming thereof at seasonable times of the year; that the leased premises were flooded on the 1st day of June, 1904." In his letter, replying to defendant's notice of cancellation, plaintiff wrote: "While not admitting that the condition which justified you to cancel the lease existed, I nevertheless concur in the cancellation of the lease, and consider the same terminated of the date of your communication, namely, May 10, 1904, and I hereby demand of you payment of the rent due for said premises up to and including May 10, 1904, amounting to $3,145.85." The complaint was filed May 19, 1904, and the cause was tried in December, 1904.

After the cause was submitted the court of its own motion set the submission aside, "and asked the defendant to introduce evidence as to the use of the premises by the defendant after the 1st day of January, 1904, and the value of such use." Thereupon defendant asked and obtained leave to amend its answer by alleging that the premises were rented for farming purposes, and that from January 1st to February 26, 1904, "defendant farmed and cultivated said premises, but that no rents, revenues, or profits were derived by defendant therefrom; that said premises were not susceptible of farming or cultivation for profit during said time, and that the use thereof was of no benefit to defendant; that from said 26th day of February to May 10, 1904, said premises could not be farmed, cultivated, nor used for any purpose." The amendment was objected to by plaintiff, as also was all evidence thereafter submitted on the question of use and value of use from January 1st to February 26th as not within the issues. It appeared by the evidence that the cultivation given the land prior to February was by way of preparing it for seeding later on in the season, and that all the labor thus bestowed was profitless.

The court found that defendant had used the barns, for the storage of hay, from January 1 to May 10, 1904, which defendant had sold but had not delivered, and which was destroyed by the overflow of the premises, and for "the value of the use of said premises to defendant for the storage of said hay" the court awarded plaintiff judgment for $20, but denied any recovery for the stipulated rental payable April 1, 1904. The court was of the opinion that the defendant might have rested its defense upon the fact that it was wholly deprived of the beneficial use of the leased premises up to April 1st, but the learned judge preferred, as he stated in his opinion, to place his decision upon the provisions of section 1935 of the Civil Code, which provides: "When the hiring of a thing is terminated before the time originally agreed upon, the hirer must pay the due proportion of the hire for such use as he has actually made of the thing, unless such use is merely nominal, and of no benefit to him." Appellant contends that this section has no application to the leasing of real property, and that the rights of the parties rest alone on the terms of the lease. The question is an important one and ably argued; but, as we do not find it necessary to resort to the statute, we prefer to express no opinion upon the view taken by the trial judge.

Appellant states the question thus: Does the cancellation of the lease, made after rent has become due under the terms of the lease, relate back so as to cancel the obligations that have arisen between the parties before such cancellation? Answering the question in the negative, appellant advances the following propositions, which fairly present the points made in the argument: That the parties through the lease contracted definitely with reference to the time of payment, the condition for revocation, and specially provided conditions upon which rent should not be paid; that an action might have been maintained for rent due under the terms of this lease on the 2d day of April, 1904; that the defendant made it impossible to consider the conditions on the 1st day of June by terminating the contract, and therefore deprived itself of the benefit of that provision in the lease; that, having expressly stipulated that rent should be apportioned with reference to the condition of the land on a certain date, such stipulation excludes an apportionment because of a previous termination of the tenancy; that the surrender of a lease does not operate as a discharge of rent already due; that the right of cancellation under the lease does not declare what the effect of the cancellation shall be, and hence the effect is to leave the parties in the position occupied by them at the time of cancellation with reference to mutual liability. Appellant states the rights of defendant as follows: An election either to hold the lease, pay the amount due on the 1st day of April, 1904, and claim its deduction on the 1st day of June, if the conditions warranted it, or else cancel the lease "according to its terms," and pay whatever was due at the time of cancellation. It may be conceded that some of appellant's propositions are sound and well supported by the authorities cited. For example, it is doubtless the rule generally that the surrender of a lease does not operate a discharge of rent already due. But, after all, the case must rest, as we view it, upon a proper construction of the lease, guided, of course, by recognized rules of law in arriving at such construction. It required no evidence to show, what is patent on the face of the lease, that the parties contracted with reference to the possible overflow of the land, thus rendering it unsuitable for occupation or cultivation. Hence liability to pay rent was made to depend upon the fact that this contingency did not happen, and the right to cancel the lease also depended on the happening of this contingency. There might have been a sudden and transitory submergence of the land by water, prior to June 1st, that would have passed away in time to enable the lessee to cultivate the land. But in order to fix a time beyond which the parties regarded it as impossible to cultivate the land for any given year, the limit was fixed to a time "prior to the month of June"; that is, if the land was overflowed and remained so on May 31st "to such extent as to render it impossible to cultivate the same," the lessee "shall not be obliged to pay rental for the part or parts that may become submerged or overflowed." But that by no means implies that defendant was liable for rent on April 1st, regardless of the then condition of overflow. We cannot agree with plaintiff that he had a right of action and could have recovered for rent on April 2d, admitting, as he does, that at that time the land was so overflowed as to make its cultivation impossible. We think the very terms of the lease preclude such view of the case. It would violate the paramount object, manifestly in the minds of both parties, which was that there should be no payment of rental required if the land was rendered unsuitable for cultivation by reason of overflow. Any other construction would work gross injustice, and this the law will never tolerate unless the parties have, by their contract, so tied the hands of the courts as to make them powerless to administer justice, which is not the situation here.

Appellant would obviate the manifest inequity of holding defendant to the payment of the April installment, notwithstanding that the land was then submerged by several feet of water, as the evidence shows, by giving to defendant the right to recover back the rent on June 1st "if the conditions warranted it." The terms of the lease neither require nor admit of such construction. Cases cited where rented buildings were burned after rent had accrued do not seem to us to be in point, for here the possible use of the land was destroyed some time before April 1st, to wit, February 26th, and this condition continued not only to April 1st, but after June 1st. The water was so deep that it destroyed the hay stored in the barns, and the dwelling was inhabitable in the second story only. The land had ceased to be a farm, and had become a lake. But defendant had agreed to pay rent for land at a stated rate per acre. The risks of overflow were taken by plaintiff, and there would be an utter failure of consideration where the land had become impossible of cultivation from the cause stipulated against. We cannot agree with appellant as to the consequences flowing from the cancellation of the lease. It is true that it does not directly point out the effect of the cancellation, but reading the two clauses together, numbered 5 and 6, and considering the cause for which cancellation is allowable, it is quite evident that, if the cause existed, the lessee had the right not only to cancel, but to be acquitted of the promise to pay rent. Appellant says the effect was "to leave the parties in the position occupied by them at the time of cancellation with reference to mutual liability." What was that position? Simply this: If the premises were "overflowed to such extent as to render it impossible to cultivate the same, * * * the party of the second part shall not be obliged to pay rental."

On May 10th the flood of February was still on, and the parties, with this fact in their minds, mutually agreed that the lease might be and it was canceled. Plaintiff's consent was not necessary to the exercise of defendant's right, but he did consent, and, although demanding rent, it was not made a condition to his consent, and would have availed nothing if it had been. He went into possession and the contract was at an end. We have held that defendant was not liable for rent on April 1st, and, as the premises were overflowed and that was the cause of the cancellation, the "position of the parties" on May 10th was that of mutual nonliability, rather than that of liability of either to the other. It must have been obvious to both parties on May 10th that cultivation of the land "at seasonable times of the year" had become impossible, and such was the fact, as clearly appeared and was admitted. What would have been the liability of defendant had he canceled the lease on May 10th, and had the water subsided, and the land become susceptible of cultivation, "prior to the month of June," we need not consider, for no such event happened. The land was still under water on June 1st. We are unable to discover any legal or equitable ground upon which plaintiff could hope to recover under the lease, in view of the facts and circumstances. So far as the judgment for $20 is concerned, defendant has not appealed, and plaintiff is not injured thereby, although he objected to the evidence on which it rests and stoutly contends that the theory of the law supporting it is erroneous.

Some point is made, but we think not well founded, as to the lack of evidence to sustain certain findings.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

BULLY HILL COPPER MINING & SMELTING CO. v. BRUSON et al.

1. APPEAL—ASSIGNMENTS NOT DISCUSSED IN BRIEF.

Assignments of error not discussed in appellant's brief will be taken as waived.

2. EASEMENTS — WAY OF NECESSITY — RELATION OF PARTIES.

That there may be a way of necessity the relation of grantor and grantee must have existed between the parties, or persons in their lines of title; and it is not enough that the land was once part of the public domain, and hence owned by a common grantor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Easements, §§ 50–54.]

3. SAME—ABSENCE OF OTHER WAY.

That defendants may have a way of necessity over plaintiff's land it is necessary that there be no other way to reach their lands; and it is not enough that it is the only way by which a wagon can reach them, if a way can be constructed over defendants' lands.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; C. M. Head, Judge.

Action by the Bully Hill Copper Mining & Smelting Company against W. C. Bruson and others. From an adverse order, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court; Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

C. B. Sessions and Guy Shoup, for appellants. Reid and Dozier, for respondent.

McLAUGHLIN, J. This action involves the right of defendant to use a wagon road about three miles in length, extending from plaintiff's mines and buildings to the main road near Copper City, Shasta county. Plaintiff insists that the road is a private thoroughfare, while defendants insist that it is a public road. It crosses lands owned by plaintiff and other private owners, and public lands of the United States, and at one point passes over land owned by defendant, Shasta Electric Golden Copper Company. In 1877 or 1878 a tramway was constructed for the purpose of conveying ore from mines now owned by plaintiff to a mill near Copper City. In course of time the tramway was abandoned as such, and the ties and rails of which it was constructed were torn up and sold. From 1894 to 1896 the grade, theretofore used for the tramway, was at times freely used by persons having occasion to use the same, but the grade and bridges were so destroyed that it could only be used in places, and no part of it was used by the public generally for any purpose. In 1896 one Sallee, plaintiff's predecessor in interest, widened the grade into a wagon road and constructed the same for his own use and benefit as an appurtenance to said mines, and not for the public use or benefit, and whatever rights he acquired passed to plaintiff as appurtenant to the mines, which were thereafter conveyed to it. The public was not at any time invited, permitted, or allowed to use the road, nor was any person who had occasion to use it invited or given permission to do so. It was not freely, openly, notoriously, or continuously used as a public highway with the consent of plaintiff or its predecessors, but was used by plaintiff and its predecessors in interest for their own convenience and the convenience of their employés.

In October, 1904, defendants Camp and Brown, as lessees of the Shasta Electric Golden Copper Company, commenced the construction of a hotel on land owned by their lessor, near where this road crossed said land, and for the purpose of enabling four and six horse teams to go along said road and bring lumber and supplies to them said defendants widened said road in places and built a bridge and culvert thereon. As soon as plaintiff had knowledge of such work, its agent notified defendants that the road was a private thoroughfare, and later erected a gate across the road at a point on plaintiff's land in order to prevent defendants from using the road and cutting it up with heavy teaming. The only manner in which defendants can reach said hotel or the mines owned by said Shasta Electric Golden Copper Company from any public road by team or wagon is by going over said road. The road was constructed and used by plaintiff and its predecessors for years before the patent to lands owned by the Shasta Electric Golden Copper Company was issued, and the right of plaintiff to use it at any time or for any purpose is admitted. It clearly appears that plaintiff and its predecessors had not only used the road for their own convenience, but that they claimed and exercised the right to control or prevent its use by others. The municipal authorities neither constructed the road nor purchased it from those who did, and the overwhelming preponderance of the evidence shows that it was never directly or indirectly dedicated to the use of the public.

The appellants assign many errors and specify many particulars in which the evidence fails to support the findings in the statement of the case found in the transcript; but, as they do not mention or discuss any of these points in their brief, they must be taken as waived. Bell v. S. P. R. R., 144 Cal. 572, 77 Pac. 1124; Humphrey v. Pope (Cal. App.) 82 Pac. 223. In fact, the brief filed in behalf of appellants is virtually an abandonment of their original position and contention as disclosed by the pleadings. There is no word in the brief touching the public or private character of the road; the sole burden of the argument being that appellants are entitled to use it as a way of necessity. This argument is pregnant with the admission that the road is private, because it necessarily assumes that plaintiff's admitted and acknowledged right must yield to the necessities of defendants. There are many reasons why the contention of appellants in this behalf cannot be sustained. To begin with, no such defense was set up in the answer, and no such issues were tried by the court. But, waiving this, the facts essential to the existence of a way of necessity were not established by the evidence or found by the court. "The right of way from necessity must be in fact what the term naturally imports and cannot exist except in cases of strict necessity. It will not exist when a man can get to his property over his own land. That the way over his own land is too steep or too narrow or that other and like difficulties exist does not alter the case, and it is only when there is no way through his own land that a grantee can claim a right over that of his grantor. It must also appear that the grantee has no other way." Kripp v. Curtis, 71 Cal. 65, 11 Pac. 879.

There is nothing in this record to show that the relation of grantor and grantee ever existed between the plaintiff and any of the defendants. The mere fact that all of the land was originally part of the public domain and hence owned by a common grantor cannot confer the peculiar right out of which a way from necessity arises. If, however, it be fully conceded that all other basic facts essential to a way from necessity existed, the vital fact that there is no other way to reach the lands or property of defendants is lacking. True, the court found "that the only manner by which a wagon or team can reach said hotel and said mines of the Shasta Electric Golden Copper Company from any public road is by passing over the roadway hereinbefore described," but this is far from saying that another road to the mines and buildings cannot be constructed over said defendant's lands. Of course, it is very convenient to use a road already constructed in order to reach land along its route, but a way of necessity cannot exist unless there is "no other way." For aught that appears from this record, the defendants might easily construct a road on their own land which would enable wagons and teams to reach their hotel and mines. In the absence of evidence or findings to the contrary, the contention that appellants are entitled to use this road as a way from necessity cannot be sustained.

The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CRANE.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 19, 1906.)

1. Information—Demurrer.

Where, on demurrer to an information because the facts stated therein did not constitute a public offense, and because it did not state the particular circumstances of the offense, no suggestion was made that any circumstances connected with the offense other than those stated were "necessary to constitute a complete offense," as required by Pen. Code, § 952, the demurrer was properly overruled.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Indictment and Information, §§ 490-495.]

2. Forgery — Information — Description of Instruments.

Where an information for forgery of a check described it as containing the word "(Signed)" before the name of the drawer, and charged that the entire instrument so set out was false and forged, the information should be construed as alleging that the word "(Signed)" was a portion of the original instrument, and hence the information did not show that the instrument set out therein was a mere copy, which could not have damaged the person receiving it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Forgery, §§ 66-76.]

3. Same—Variance—Materiality.

In a prosecution for forgery of a check, the instrument set out in the declaration contained the word "(Signed)" before the name of the drawer. The check offered in evidence was identical in form with that set out in the information, except that the word "(Signed)" was not written thereon. Held, that such word was immaterial to the instrument, and that the variance was therefore harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Forgery, § 93.]

4. Same—Evidence.

In a prosecution for forgery of a check alleged to have been signed by H. as trustee of an estate, evidence as to whether H. had an account in the drawee bank during the month in which the check was drawn was admissible.

5. Same—Materiality.

Evidence as to whether H., as trustee, had drawn checks payable to defendant was immaterial.

6. Criminal Law—Appeal—Evidence—Prejudice.

In a prosecution for forgery of a check, evidence that the person who purported to be drawer of the forged check had at different times paid defendant his salary in checks was not prejudicial to defendant.

7. Same—Instructions—Duty of Jury.

It was not error in a criminal case for the court to charge that the jury should accept the law as given to them by court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 1797, 1798.]

8. Same—Definition of Offense—Reading Statute.

In a prosecution for forgery, it was not error for the court, in instructing the jury on the law applicable to the case, to read to them Pen. Code, § 470, defining forgery.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 1811, 1812.]

9. Forgery — Instructions — Uttering Forged Instrument.

In a prosecution for forgery, an instruction that the uttering of a forged instrument by defendant as true and genuine with knowledge that it was a forgery and with intent to defraud would constitute forgery as fully as a forgery of the instrument itself, was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Forgery, §§ 51-53, 128.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County.

Arthur Crane was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. Lair Hill, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

HARRISON, P. J. The information herein filed against the appellant charges him with having willfully and feloniously uttered and passed to Charles E. Noyes a certain false, forged, and counterfeit check as the true and genuine check of the purported maker thereof, knowing the same to be false, forged, and counterfeit, with the intent to defraud the said Noyes, "which said check is in the words and figures as follows, to wit: 'Central Bank. Savings and Commercial. No. 90. Oakland, Cal., June 3rd, 1905. Pay to Arthur Crane or bearer $18 eighteen dollars. [Signed] D. J. Hall, Trustee Hutchinson Estate,' and which was indorsed on the back thereof as follows: 'Arthur Crane.'" Upon the trial thereof the defendant was convicted of the crime of forgery, and has appealed from the judgment thereon and from an order denying a new trial.

1. The defendant demurred to the information on the ground that the facts stated therein do not constitute a public offense, and that it does not state the particular circumstances of the alleged offense charged. No suggestion is made that any circumstances connected with the offense other than those stated are "necessary to constitute a complete offense"; and, unless such is the fact, the information is not demurrable under the provisions of section 952 (2), Pen. Code.

It is urged, however, by the appellant that, as the information states that the instrument charged to have been uttered by him and passed to Noyes had the word "Signed" prefixed to the name of D. J. Hall, it appears upon its face that it was not the true and genuine check of Hall, but only a copy of the check purporting to have been made by him, and therefore that Noyes could not have been damaged or prejudiced by receiving it. It is without question a very unusual mode of drawing a check for the maker thereof to prefix his signature with the word "Signed"; but as it cannot be said that a check could not be drawn in this form, or that if so drawn such prefix would in any respect qualify the liability of the drawer, it cannot be assumed, as a matter of law, that the prefix did not purport to have been written by him before its delivery. Under the charge in the information that the entire instrument as set forth therein was false and forged, and that the defendant passed the same well knowing that it was false and forged, it must be held that the word "Signed" was included in the information as being a portion of the written instrument which the defendant is charged with having passed as the true and genuine check of Hall. The demurrer was therefore properly overruled.

2. At the trial the prosecution offered in evidence in support of the charge a check identical in form with that set forth in the information, except that the word "Signed" was not written thereon. The defendant objected to its introduction upon the ground that it was not the same instrument which is charged in the information to have been uttered by him. The court overruled this objection, and allowed the check to be read to the jury, to which ruling the defendant excepted. There was no error in this ruling. The rule which in early days prevailed in prosecutions for forgery, that the instrument set forth in the indictment must be an exact copy of that offered in support of the charge, has been in modern days relaxed to the extent that, unless the variance is such that the defendant may have been prejudiced in making his defense, or exposed to the danger of being again put in jeopardy for the same offense, it will be held to be immaterial. See People v. Phillips, 70 Cal. 61, 11 Pac. 493. The requirement that the instrument offered in evidence must conform to that laid in the indictment has reference to its identity and the manner in which it is described. If its identity is so apparent that a conviction or acquittal of the defendant would be a bar to any further prosecution for the same offense, the variance will be insufficient to justify its exclusion. The presence or absence of unimportant words which do not affect the sense of the instrument, or change its identity in any material respect, will not constitute a material variance.

In Wilson v. People, 5 Parker, Cr. R. (N. Y.) 178, upon a trial for the forgery of a promissory note, the note offered in evidence had upon its face the words "Countersigned and registered in the Bank Department," with the signature of the register, A. D. Ward, which were not upon the copy set forth in the indictment. The variance was held immaterial on the ground that those words formed no part of the note. In Alexander v. State, 28 Tex. App. 186, 12 S. W. 595, the instrument set forth in the indictment was as follows, viz.: "Mrs. A. C. Neal. Please send me my diploma by this young man (meaning T. S. Alexander). (Signed) W. W. Wolfe." The instrument offered in evidence did not contain the words included in the parentheses; but the court held that those words, inserted by way of inuendo, did not constitute a material variance. In Cross v. People, 47 Ill. 152, 95 Am. Dec. 474, the defendant was indicted for the forgery of a check purporting to have been made by C. H. Beckwith. The check offered in evidence was signed "C. H. Beckwith" with the word "Randolph" underneath. The variance was held to be immaterial upon the ground that the word Randolph did not explain itself, and might be a check word, or the name of the street in which Beckwith did business. In Trask v. People, 151 Ill. 523, 38 N. E. 248, the indictment for the forgery of a draft set forth a copy of the instrument purporting to have been drawn upon "C. C. Burt & Co., 115 Broadway." The instrument offered in evidence purported to have been drawn upon "C. C. Burt & Co., Broadway, New York." The court held the variance to be immaterial, upon the ground that those words were only a mere description of the drawee's residence, and not a part of the instrument. See, also, People v. Cummings, 57 Cal. 88; Paige v. People, 6 Parker, Cr. R. (N. Y.) 683; Lang-dale v. People, 100 Ill. 263; Sutton v. Commonwealth, 97 Ky. 308, 30 S. W. 661; Smith v. State, 29 Fla. 408, 10 South. 894. This subject was quite fully discussed in People v. Phillips, 70 Cal. 61, 11 Pac. 493, and in People v. Terrill, 132 Cal. 497, 64 Pac. 894, and many authorities are there cited in support of the proposition. In People v. Phillips, the court say: "We think the true rule is that, if the variance does not change the sense in any way, it is not material"; and again: "When in the indictment a word found in the instrument proved is omitted from the instrument as recited, or when a word is inserted in the instrument described which is not in the instrument proved, and the change in no manner or for any purpose alters the signification, the variance is unimportant." The identity of the check in question with that laid in the indictment is so apparent that the court was fully justified in receiving it in evidence. If the word "Signed" had been in fact written as a prefix to the name of Hall in the instrument which was passed by the defendant, it would not have changed the character of the instrument, or in any respect varied its legal import or the apparent obligation of the maker.

3. The several objections of the defendant to the evidence as it was offered, on the ground that the indictment stated no offense, require no further consideration. The objection to the question asked of the witness D. J. Hall, whether he had an account in the Central Bank of Oakland during the month of June, 1905, on the ground that it was "incompetent," was properly overruled. The question asked of the same witness, whether he, as trustee of the Hutchinson estate, had drawn a check payable to the defendant, was immaterial, and should have been sustained by the court; but it is very evident that the answer of the witness, that he had at different times paid him his salary in checks, could in no respect have been prejudicial to the defendant, especially in view of the testimony that the defendant, after his arrest, admitted that the check offered in evidence was forged by him.

4. It was not error to inform the jury that they were to accept the law as given to them by the court, or, in instructing them upon the law applicable to the case, to read to them the provisions of section 470, Pen. Code, defining forgery. It was proper that they should be instructed that the uttering of a forged instrument by the defendant as true and genuine, with the knowledge that it was a forgery and with the intent to defraud, would constitute the crime of forgery as fully as would a forgery itself of the instrument.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. GLASSELL et al.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 30, 1906.)

1. Municipal Corporations — Actions to Recover Taxes—Pleading and Evidence.

St. 1880, p. 136, c. 123, relating to actions by counties and cities for the collection of taxes, prescribing the form of complaint, etc., is constitutional, and where the complaint in an action by a city, whose charter provides that "the mode and manner of collecting such municipal taxes and enforcing such tax lien and the proceedings thereafter shall substantially be the same as the mode and manner at the time prescribed by the law for the collection of state and county taxes in said county," conforms to the requirements of such statute, it is sufficient, and under said provisions, also, the tax roll is made prima facie evidence of plaintiffs' right to recover.

2. Same.

In an action by a city against executors to recover taxes assessed and levied on personal property of the estate, which it is alleged defendants, as such executors, had in their possession and control in said city on the day when the same became assessable, it is not necessary to allege that the testator died in such city.

3. Taxation — Overvaluation of Property —Remedy of Owner.

The remedy for an overvaluation of property in assessment is by appeal to the board of equalization, failing in which the owner is concluded, and cannot set up such overvaluation as a defense pro tanto to an action to recover the taxes.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Action by the city of Los Angeles against Hugh Glassell and Andrew Glassell, executors. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

McNutt & Hannon, for appellants. W. B. Mathews and Hartley Shaw, for respondent.

WILBUR, Special Judge. This is an action brought by the city of Los Angeles, a municipal corporation, for the recovery of $1,335.18, taxes, with penalties, levied by said municipality upon the property of Andrew Glassell, deceased. The superior court gave judgment for the full amount claimed, and the defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The complaint is very brief. After alleging the death of Andrew Glassell on January 28, 1901, in the city of Los Angeles, the appointment, on February 19, 1901, of the defendants as executors of his last will, and their qualification as such, it is further alleged: "That said Hugh Glassell and Andrew Glassell, as executors of the last will and testament of said Andrew Glassell, deceased, are indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,335.18, with 10 per cent. penalty added thereto for nonpayment thereof, and interest thereon at the rate of 2 per cent. per month from December 1, 1901, which said taxes were duly assessed and levied by said city of Los Angeles for the fiscal year 1901–02, upon personal property which then and there belonged to and was part of the estate of said Andrew Glassell, deceased, and which said defendants, as such executors, had in their possession and control in said city of Los Angeles at 12 o'clock, noon, on the first Monday in March, 1901. That said personal property so assessed consisted of solvent credits in the amount of $101,605, bonds in the amount of $5,000, and money in the amount of $210." The defendants deny the allegations of the complaint, and allege that they were nonresidents of the city of Los Angeles on the first Monday in March, 1901, admit the ownership of the bonds and money described in the complaint, but deny the ownership of the solvent credits. The finding of the court in regard to solvent credits was that the defendants as executors had in their possession and control in the city of Los Angeles, solvent credits amounting to the sum of $71,756, and no more, at 12 o'clock m., on the first Monday in March, 1901.

Three questions are raised upon the appeal: First, whether the complaint states a cause of action; second, whether the production of the assessment book in evidence was sufficient prima facie proof of all facts essential to recovery; and, third, whether or not a recovery should be had for the full amount of taxes when the solvent credits actually owned were of less value than the amount assessed.

First. It is contended by the appellants that the complaint fails to state a cause of action for the reason that all of the proceedings leading up to the levy of the tax are not alleged in detail, that it is not alleged in the complaint that the property taxed was within the city of Los Angeles, and that no authority is alleged on the part of the city council for the bringing of this action, as is required by the provisions of section 64 of the ordinance of the city regulating the levy and collection of taxes. The respondent claims that the complaint is in the form prescribed by statute as the form of complaint in actions for the recovery of taxes. St. 1880, p. 136, c. 123. The constitutionality of this statute, however, is attacked by appellants upon the authority of People v. Central Pacific R. R. Co., 83 Cal. 393, 23 Pac. 303, in which a similar statute was held unconstitutional. This case was overruled and discredited to such an extent by the Supreme Court in the later case of People v. Central Pacific R. R. Co., 105 Cal. 576, 38 Pac. 905, that it can hardly be considered as an authority upon the question involved in this case, particularly as the earlier decision was brought about in part by an effort to harmonize conflicting provisions in the Code of Civil Procedure and the Political Code, while the construction of the statute in question, enacted subsequent to the Codes, and in form an independent statute, is not embarrassed by that consideration. The complaint at bar, however, in addition to the allegations required by the statutory form of complaint, contains a description of the property assessed, and an allegation that said taxes were "duly assessed and levied * * * upon personal property which then and there belonged to and was part of the estate of Andrew Glassell, * * * which said defendants, as such executors, had in their possession and control in said city of Los Angeles at 12 o'clock, noon, on the first Monday in March, 1901." In San Francisco v. Pennie, 93 Cal. 465, 29 Pac. 66, a similar complaint was held sufficient as against a general demurrer. On the authority of that case, it must be held that the complaint at bar sufficiently states a cause of action. It is claimed that, as the complaint fails to state that Andrew Glassell, deceased, died in the city of Los Angeles, it fails to show that the property was within the jurisdiction of the said city, as the personal property of a decedent is taxable at his place of death. But the complaint does show that the defendants had the property taxed in their possession and control in the city of Los Angeles at 12 o'clock, noon, on the first Monday in March. This is the ultimate fact to prove which it may have been necessary to show in evidence that the said decedent died in said city.

The ordinance of the city of Los Angeles with reference to the levy and collection of taxes was introduced in evidence in the court below. Section 64 thereof provides for the collection by suit of taxes amounting to $300 or more. This section corresponds in its language to section 3899 of the Political Code, and was evidently intended as an adaptation of that section to the proper city officials. It has been held that the remedy given by the statute of 1880, above mentioned, is independent and distinct from the remedy provided by section 3899 of the Political Code. Los Angeles v. Ballerino, 99 Cal. 593, 32 Pac. 581, 34 Pac. 329. If, therefore, the above-mentioned statute of 1880 applies to actions brought by the city of Los Angeles, a similar determination must be reached. This statute by its terms applies only to counties and cities and counties. The charter of the city of Los Angeles, however, contains the following provision: "The mode and manner of collecting such municipal taxes and enforcing such tax lien, and the proceedings thereafter, shall substantially be the same as the mode and manner at the time prescribed by the law for the collection of state and county taxes in said county." This provision is sufficient to authorize the bringing of the suit in question in the same manner as such suit might be maintained by a county.

Second. The sufficiency of the proof in this case is questioned in many particulars, but the respondent relies upon the assessment roll introduced in evidence as sufficient prima facie proof of its right to recover. It is provided in the statute of 1880 (page 136, c. 123), above referred to, that the assessment roll "shall be prima facie evidence of the plaintiff's right to recover." A similar provision is contained in the Political Code (section 3789). These provisions, we think, are made applicable by the provision of the charter of the city of Los Angeles above quoted to actions for the recovery of the municipal taxes.

Third. The plaintiff sued for taxes upon $101,605, solvent credits. The court found the solvent credits subject to taxation to be $71,756, and no more. The question presented, therefore, is whether the remedy of the taxpayer is by an appeal to the board of equalization for a reduction of the amount of assessment, failing in which he is liable for the full amount, or whether he can raise this question as a defense to an action to recover the tax. The determination of the board of equalization with reference to all matters upon which they are competent as a board to pass, and within their jurisdiction as such board, is final and conclusive, and where a remedy is given by an application to this board, that is ordinarily the only remedy, and a failure to follow that remedy concludes the property holder. In People v. Dunn, 59 Cal. 340, it was held by the Supreme Court that while money could not be assessed at more than its face value, solvent credits might properly be assessed at a higher valuation than the face of the obligation. It would therefore follow that the case at bar presents a case of overvaluation rather than of the assessment of nonexisting property, and that the remedy was an appeal to the board of equalization, failing in which the party cannot now complain. Columbia Savings Bank v. Los Angeles, 137 Cal. 467, 70 Pac. 308; Henne v. Los Angeles County, 129 Cal. 297, 61 Pac. 1081.

The views hereinbefore expressed render immaterial the question as to the admissibility of the inventory, and other questions raised with reference to the introduction of evidence. They, therefore, need not be considered.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

CURTIN et al. v. KROHN et al.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 18, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court September 13, 1906.)

1. Trusts—Enforcement—Refusal of Trustee to Foreclose Trust Deed—Action.

Where the makers of a note executed an instrument, denominated a trust deed, conveying certain realty and notes secured by mortgage to a trustee, creating a distinct and continuing obligation by the makers to reimburse the plaintiffs for all sums expended as sureties on the official bond of one of the makers, and allowing plaintiffs to pay off incumbrances and protect by suit the title to the property, and by which the trustee obligated himself, if possible, to obtain notes secured by mortgage from other sureties, which were to be held in trust for plaintiffs, the plaintiffs, on the trustee's refusal to execute the trust, could maintain a suit in equity to have the respective rights of the parties adjusted and the property sold.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 47, Cent. Dig. Trusts, §§ 497, 554.]

2. Same—Nature of Action—Pleading.

In such case the use of the formula, "barred and foreclosed of and from the equity of redemption," in the prayer of the complaint and in the judgment, does not conclusively establish the nature of the action nor impair the validity of the judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Bill by C. Curtin and others against L. W. Krohn and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Raleigh E. Rhodes, for appellants. G. J. Hely, for respondents.

McLAUGHLIN, J. The recitals in the complaint show that on June 3, 1898, the defendants L. W., W. J., H. A., and Louisa Krohn were indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $7,000, and to secure the payment of the same executed their promissory note to the defendant Commercial Bank of Madera, reciting therein that said bank was a trustee, and was to pay all moneys paid on the trust note to the plaintiffs in certain designated proportions. At the same time and place the promisors executed an instrument, denominated a trust deed, conveying certain realty, and notes secured by mortgage, to the said bank under conditions, and for purposes therein specifically mentioned. In this instrument the Krohns are designated parties of the first part, the bank, party of the second part, and plaintiffs, parties of the third part. It contains a succinct history of the circumstances under which the indebtedness of the Krohns to plaintiffs accrued, specifically fixes the sums due to each of the plaintiffs, and the proportion in which payments made on the note are to be distributed to them. It distinctly provides that the parties of the first part shall be, and remain, liable to the parties of the third part until the latter are fully compensated for all money paid or advanced by them as sureties on the official bond of L. W. Krohn as tax collector of Madera county. In this connection it was agreed that the second party, if possible, would secure notes from other sureties on said bond; that the third parties would have an interest in any notes so obtained; and the collection thereof and application of payments made thereon is provided for in detail. The performance of assessment work on certain mines, and the distribution of gross profits therefrom, is also provided for. There was also an attempt to regulate the rights of one Kate A. Burke, who held a mortgage on a portion of the property, but was not a party to the agreement. Provision was made for the reconveyance of the property in case of payment, for its sale and the execution of deeds in case of default, for the application of proceeds of any sale, and the return of any surplus to the parties of the first part. The third parties were specially authorized to pay, without notice, and according to their best judgment, all liens and incumbrances on the property, except taxes, and, in their discretion, to contest the payment of the same, and prosecute and defend suits to protect the title to the property. All payments and expenditures thus made were to be deemed secured by the instrument above mentioned. The granting clause in the instrument reads as follows: "That said parties of the first part, in consideration of the aforesaid indebtedness to the parties of the third part, and of one dollar to them in hand paid by the parties of the second part, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and for the purpose of securing the payment of said promissory note, and of any sum or sums of money with interest thereon, that may be paid or advanced by, or may otherwise be due to the parties of the third part under the provisions of this instrument, do by these presents grant, bargain, sell, convey and confirm unto the said party of the second part, and to its successors and assigns, the pieces and parcels of land situate in the county of Madera, state of California, described as follows, to wit."

The parties of the first part having failed to pay the whole or any part of the indebtedness evidenced by the note, according to the terms thereof, the plaintiffs, in writing, demanded that the trustee proceed to sell the premises as provided in the instrument in question, and the second party, in writing, expressly refused to comply with such demand. Thereupon this action was brought by plaintiffs against the first and second parties named in the instrument, and numerous other parties who claimed some interest in the premises. Many of the defendants failed to appear, and their default was duly entered, but L. W., W. J., H. A., J. J., F. W., Louisa, Dora, Theckla, and John C. Krohn appeared, and, by motion to strike out the allegations of the complaint and demurrer, raised the point that the court had no jurisdiction of the parties or of the subject-matter of the action, and the further point that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The motion and demurrer were overruled, and the court entered judgment, decreeing that the sum of $10,221.60 was due to plaintiffs upon the debt and deed of trust set forth in the complaint, and directing that the property described in said deed of trust be sold, and the proceeds be applied to the payment of the debt due to plaintiffs, and that a judgment for any deficiency be docketed against the parties of the first part named in said instrument. From the judgment so entered, the Krohns, who appeared by motion and demurrer, appeal.

Appellants base their demand for reversal on the single ground that an action to foreclose a trust deed cannot be maintained. If it be conceded that Kraft v. Bryan, 140 Cal. 80, 73 Pac. 745, and Koch v. Briggs, 14 Cal. 256, 73 Am. Dec. 651, cited in support of this contention, go to the extent of holding that an action to foreclose a trust deed can never be maintained under any state of facts, still we think that these authorities, and the legal principles upon which they rest, cannot be applied here.

To begin with, the instrument under consideration is something more than a trust deed. It defines the rights of the first and third parties in detail, and creates a distinct and continuing obligation on the part of the former to reimburse the latter for all sums expended, as sureties on the official bond of L. W. Krohn or as a result of their suretyship. It allows the third parties to pay off liens and incumbrances, and defend or prosecute suits, to protect the title to the property, according to their own judgment, without consulting anybody, or rendering any account of disbursements, made in this behalf, to the trustee. The trustee obligated himself, if possible, to obtain notes, secured by mortgage, from other sureties, which notes, if obtained, were to be held in trust for plaintiffs, all payments thereon to be applied in payment of the trust note. The conveyance expressly included certain notes and mortgages held by the Krohns against various parties, and all payments made to the trustee thereon were likewise to be applied on the trust note. We cannot imagine how the rights and obligations of the respective parties to such an instrument could be ascertained, adjusted, and conserved without resort to an action of some kind in some judicial form. Indeed, an accounting by the trustee and the third parties, for sums received by the former or expended by the latter, was indispensable, and a sale might have been enjoined until such accounting was had. More v. Calkins, 85 Cal. 188, 24 Pac. 729. The instrument on its face shows that doubt and uncertainty would exist in the absence of such an accounting, and that complications, involving the power of the trustee to sell the land, must result from its very terms, if notes and mortgages from the other sureties were obtained, and the amounts due on the various mortgages assigned by the instrument were paid or unpaid. Under these circumstances a proceeding in equity was necessary to a satisfactory adjustment of the matters involved. Waiving these considerations, however, this case cannot be classed or treated as an action to foreclose a trust deed. Such an action could only be brought by the trustee, while this action is brought by the beneficiaries against trusters, trustee, and others. The trustee having refused to comply with the demand that he execute the trust, the beneficiaries were forced to appeal to a court of equity, and in doing so they, very properly laid all of the facts before the court, and asked for the "usual decree or such decree or order as the court may see fit to make." The court, under such circumstances, would, upon well-established principles, take jurisdiction of the whole subject-matter of litigation, and also decree a sale of the real estate proper. Kraft v. De Forest, 53 Cal. 659; Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, vol. 28, p. 839; Washburn on Real Property, vol. 2, p. 523; Jones on Mortgages, § 1773. Equity will not permit litigation by piecemeal, but will determine the whole controversy where all the facts and parties are before it. Watson v. Sutro, 86 Cal. 529, 24 Pac. 172, 25 Pac. 64; Booker v. Aitken, 140 Cal. 473, 74 Pac. 11; More v. Calkins, supra. The granting clause clearly shows that the conveyance was made as security only, and it is well settled in this state that trust deeds in the nature of a mortgage convey only a defeasible estate having none of the incidents of ownership except that the trustees are deemed to have such an estate as will enable them to convey. Sacramento Bank v. Alcorn, 121 Cal. 383, 53 Pac. 813. They are in effect mortgages with power to sell. Hodgkins v. Wright, 127 Cal. 692, 60 Pac. 431; Pomeroy, Eq. Jur. 995. Hence, there was no reason in law or logic why the court could not act directly, without forcing the trustee to sell and convey the premises. Under the circumstances, the plaintiffs could maintain an action to have the accounts and respective rights of the parties adjusted and the property sold, and the court could order the sale to be made by its own commissioner. More v. Calkins, 85 Cal. 190, 24 Pac. 729. Under the terms of the instrument, the court could direct a judgment for any deficiency to be entered in favor of the plaintiffs against the four trusters, and its powers as a court of equity extended to a final adjustment of the rights of the parties, to the end that further litigation might be avoided.

A trustee may always apply to a court of equity for aid or directions, and such courts are likewise open to any of the other parties when a dispute as to the existence, character, or terms of a trust arises. And where an accounting is necessary or a question as to the amount due exists, or where a doubt arises as to whether the instrument creating a lien is a mortgage or deed of trust, recourse to a court is the safest, if not the only, course to pursue. Banta v. Wise, 135 Cal. 279, 67 Pac. 129; Godfrey v. Munroe, 101 Cal. 227, 35 Pac. 761; More v. Calkins, 85 Cal. 188, 24 Pac. 729. "Trust deeds to secure payment of a debt are an anomaly in our system, and are admittedly inconsistent with the policy of this state in regard to mortgages." This being the case, it would indeed be a harsh rule that would exclude any of the parties to such an instrument from the courts; hence, "it has only been held that such deeds are not mortgages which require foreclosure." Hodgkins v. Wright, supra. But if it be admitted that the rule absolutely forbids foreclosure of trust deeds, the mere use of the formula "barred and foreclosed of and from all equity of redemption," in the prayer of the complaint and judgment, does not conclusively or otherwise establish the nature of the action nor impair the validity of the judgment. Such formula cannot injure any of the parties, and the rule "superfluity does not vitiate" must be applied. "The law regards form less than substance," and looking at the substantial rights of the parties as disclosed by the instrument, and the subsequent conduct of the trustee, we think the judgment should be, and it is hereby, affirmed.

ELIZALDE v. MURPHY et al.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 18, 1906.)

1. Administrators—Advancement to Widow—Account.

Where an administrator anticipates distribution and advanced funds to the widow, such advancement was not a proper subject for inclusion in the administrator's final account, he being only entitled to reimbursement from the widow's distributive share on final distribution.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 22, Cent. Dig. Executors and Administrators, §§ 1219–1228, 2067.]

2. Same—Attorney's Fees—Expenses—Extraordinary Services.

That an administrator made no claim in prior accounts for an allowance of attorney's fees, expenses, and for extraordinary services, did not constitute an absolute waiver thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 22, Cent. Dig. Executors and Administrators, § 2068.]

3. Same—Bonds—Rights of Sureties.

In an action on an administrator's bond, his sureties are not entitled to credit for attorney's fees, expenses, and for extraordinary services to which the administrator never made claim in the probate court, the sureties' right to subrogation with reference to such claims, if any, being enforceable only by petition in the probate court.

4. Same—Administrator's Duty—Extent.

The measure of an administrator's duty is to act with fidelity and with that degree of prudence and diligence which a man of ordinary judgment would be expected to bestow on his own affairs of a like nature.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 22, Cent. Dig. Executors and Administrators, §§ 360, 397.]

5. Same—Collection of Assets.

Where the maker of a note received by an administrator was at all times insolvent, and the administrator placed the note in the hands of a collector without being able to realize anything thereon, he was not guilty of negligence because of his mere failure to sue thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 22, Cent. Dig. Executors and Administrators, § 394.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; B. T. Williams, Judge pro tem.

Action by Elisa P. Elizalde, as administratrix of the estate of Marcos A. Elizalde, deceased, against P. W. Murphy and others. From a judgment for plaintiff for less than the relief demanded, she appeals. Reversed.

McD. R. Venable and B. F. Thomas, for appellant. W. A. Richardson, W. H. Spencer, and Wm. Shipsey, for respondents.

ALLEN, J. Action upon an administrator's bond. Judgment for plaintiff for a lesser amount than claimed in the complaint. Plaintiff appeals from the order denying a new trial.

It is made to appear in the record that one Graves was appointed administrator of the estate of Elizalde on the 20th day of January, 1894, and executed a bond at the date of such appointment, and certain subsequent bonds, as required by the order of the court; that on May 28, 1898, said administrator filed his second annual account, which was duly allowed, from which it appears that on said date he held in his possession $5,133.50 belonging to said estate; that the administrator died July 15, 1900, without rendering any further account; that after the filing of his said account the administrator received $562 in addition. Upon a trial of this action, the court below found the administrator had received, and was chargeable with, $5,696, and credited him with certain payments not disputed, together with other payments the subject of controversy upon this appeal—one of $940 advanced to the widow as part of her distributive share, and $550 for expenses and attorney's fees to one Leme, and for expenses and extraordinary services of the administrator.

Appellant's contention is that these credits last mentioned were not proper matters to be credited by the court in this action, and no credit therefor should be allowed at the instance of the sureties. With this we agree. In so far as the advance to the widow is concerned, it was not even proper subject of the final account. Estate of Willey, 140 Cal. 240, 73 Pac. 998; Estate of Rose, 80 Cal. 179, 22 Pac. 86. The only rights of an administrator who anticipates the distribution to the widow or heirs and pays in advance of such distribution, is when distribution is ordered to have such payments retired therefrom and receive a credit on account thereof from the distributive share so to be charged. Estate of Willey, supra. It does not even appear that any sum will be due the widow upon final distribution; and it is not material what property may have heretofore been distributed to her, against which the administrator in making the advancements made no claim. Whatever may be the rights of subrogation to which defendants are entitled, the same can only be worked out upon the final decree of distribution. We are of opinion, also, that the allowance of attorney's fees, expenses, and for extraordinary services are matters which can only be adjudicated in the probate court in the final or some subsequent account. The mere fact that the administrator made no such claim when filing his previous accounts should not be taken as an absolute waiver. But the reimbursement to which an administrator is entitled on account of such payments or such services is a right personal to himself, and one which he may waive; and until it is asserted, either by the administrator or by his personal representatives, in an account and upon a petition presented to the probate court, they are not proper subjects of adjudication, and were we to say that this right of the principal on the bond to assert the claim is one to which sureties might be subrogated, yet it must follow that such sureties would be restricted in the enforcement of such subrogated rights to the mode prescribed for their enforcement by the principal. In re Moore, 96 Cal. 526, 31 Pac. 584; In re Levinson, 108 Cal. 456, 41 Pac. 483, 42 Pac. 479. And matters which are the subject of account are exclusively within the jurisdiction of the probate court. Toland v. Earl, 129 Cal. 152, 61 Pac. 914, 79 Am. St. Rep. 100; Estate of Freud, 134 Cal. 336, 66 Pac. 476.

Further objection is made by appellant to the refusal of the court to charge the administrator with the inventoried amount of a note of one Dargie. The court found that there was no negligence upon the part of the administrator in his failure to realize upon this asset. "It is true that when an administrator receives a note, and the maker thereof is solvent, but afterwards becomes insolvent, the burden of proof is on him to show that with due diligence he could not have collected it." In re Moore, 96 Cal. 526, 31 Pac. 584. The measure of an administrator's duty is to act with fidelity and with that degree of prudence and diligence which a man of ordinary judgment would be expected to bestow upon his own affairs of a like nature. In re Moore, supra. There is evidence in the record tending to show that, notwithstanding the return in the inventory, Dargie was at all times insolvent. There is evidence tending to show that the note was placed in the hands of a collector and that nothing could be realized thereon. This being true, were it even to be assumed that the taking of a new note with the insolvent wife as surety was not warranted, yet no loss upon the estate would be entailed. The mere failure to sue does not establish negligence. It is only the failure to proceed when a reasonable prospect of collection is apparent which should be said to be negligence. There being evidence tending to support the verdict of the trial court that there was no negligence upon the part of the administrator, we are not inclined to disturb the same. We find no other errors in the record.

The order is reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

I concur: GRAY, P. J.

SMITH, J. (concurring). I concur in the order of reversal, and also in much of the reasoning of the opinion of Mr. Justice Allen. But the reversal should, I think, be placed on the broader principle, established by the decisions of the Supreme Court, that a suit cannot be maintained against the sureties on an administrator's bond until there has been a settlement of his account, either in the probate proceedings under section 1629 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or by a bill in equity brought for that purpose. Graff v. Mesmer, 52 Cal. 636; Chaquette v. Ortet, 60 Cal. 594; Weihe v. Statham, 67 Cal. 84, 7 Pac. 143; Reither v. Murdock, 135 Cal. 197, 67 Pac. 784; Cook v. Ceas, 143 Cal. 225, 77 Pac. 65. In such a bill brought against the administrator the sureties may, perhaps, be joined (Chaquette v. Ortet, supra); and I can see no objection to this course. But in the present case the administratrix of the deceased Graves was not made a party; and, indeed, the demand of the defendants by proper supplemental pleadings to bring her in as a defendant was denied by the court. This error may be cured by a proper order requiring her to be brought in as a defendant (Code Civ. Proc. § 389); but the question will still remain whether the court will then have jurisdiction of the case. This question, under the existing Constitution and some of the older authorities, is not altogether clear. Generally speaking, the matter of accounts of administrators, like other matters of probate jurisdiction, belongs exclusively to the probate court. Hope v. Jones, 24 Cal. 93; Gurnee v. Maloney, 38 Cal. 87, 88, 99 Am. Dec. 352; Weihe v. Statham, 67 Cal. 84, 7 Pac. 143; Burris v. Kennedy, 108 Cal. 331, 41 Pac. 458. This is admittedly the case with regard to administrators generally; and by the express provision of the law an administrator whose authority has ceased, if he is still alive, may be cited to account (Code Civ. Proc. § 1629), and I can see no reason to suppose that it was intended to exclude the administrator of a deceased administrator from the provisions of this section. The language of the section, in describing the case provided for, applies equally to a deceased administrator as to any other; and there is nothing in its provisions to indicate an intention not to include his administrator, except in the use of the word "he," in the expression "he may be cited," etc. His case, I think, comes within the reason, and, therefore, presumably, within the intention of the law. I would have no difficulty, therefore, were the question a new one, in thus construing the provisions of the section. But under the old law there was a similar provision with reference to the probate court (Probate Act [St. 1850, p. 397, c. 129], § 230); and it was held, in effect, that the probate court did not have such authority, and that the account of a deceased administrator could be settled only by a suit in the district court sitting as a court of equity (Bush v. Lindsey, 44 Cal. 121; Wetzler v. Fitch, 52 Cal. 638; Chaquette v. Ortet, 60 Cal. 594; In re Allgier, 65 Cal. 228, 3 Pac. 849); and the rule has since been applied, in at least one case, to the superior court in the exercise of its probate jurisdiction. Estate of Curtiss, 65 Cal. 572, 4 Pac. 578. But with regard to the question of jurisdiction, there is a manifest difference between the old probate court and the superior court sitting in probate. The former had such jurisdiction only as was conferred upon it by the Legislature (Const. of 1849, art. 6, § 8), while under the present Constitution the superior court has jurisdiction "of all matters of probate" (Const. art. 6, § 5); and it has also such equitable jurisdiction as may be necessary to the exercise of its proper functions. Burris v. Kennedy, 108 Cal. 331, 41 Pac. 458; Heydenfeldt v. Superior Court, 117 Cal. 348, 49 Pac. 210; Toland v. Earl, 129 Cal. 148, 61 Pac. 914, 79 Am. St. Rep. 100; Estate of Freud, 131 Cal. 673, 63 Pac. 1080, 82 Am. St. Rep. 407; More v. More, 133 Cal. 494, 65 Pac. 1044, 85 Am. St. Rep. 166. It would seem, therefore, that, with this extensive jurisdiction, the court must have the power to require an accounting from the administrator of a deceased administrator, either under the provisions of section 1629 and in the mode there prescribed, or by virtue of its general constitutional jurisdiction and in such mode as the necessity of the case may require; and that its jurisdiction in this regard should be held exclusive. I assume, therefore, upon the authority of the decisions cited, that it is within the power of the court in the administration of an estate to adopt as the mode of procedure the form of a bill in equity; and to this no objection can be urged when the suit, as in this case, is in the court charged with the administration of the estate; but in such case, the equity suit must be regarded as merely ancillary to the administration and as a part of the proceedings therein. The court will, therefore, in the present case, upon making the proper parties, have as full jurisdiction to pass on all the questions presented to it as it would have in an ordinary proceeding in the matter of the estate. It will, therefore, not only have jurisdiction of the several questions relating to allowances for extraordinary services, etc., but also to the alleged payment of $940 to Mrs. Victoria Elizalde, who for this purpose should be made a party—as was demanded by the defendants in the case below. As to this, the action of the court should be in conformity with the course pursued in the matter of the Estate of Moore, 96 Cal. 527, 530, 31 Pac. 584, the authority of which case has not been affected by the later decision in Estate of Willey, 140 Cal. 241, 73 Pac. 998. I am of the opinion, also, that the credit claimed by the defendants for administrator's fees should be passed upon, as well as every other question that may arise between the pending estate and the estate of the deceased administrator that could be determined in an ordinary proceeding for the settlement of an administrator's account.

BERGEROW v. PARKER, Auditor.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 24, 1906.)

1. Pleading—Application for Judgment—Amendment.

Plaintiff filed a verified complaint for mandamus against defendant, and defendant filed an unverified answer, whereupon plaintiff moved for judgment on the pleadings. Held, that plaintiff's motion was in the nature of a demurrer to the answer, and it appearing that the defect could be obviated by amendment, it was within the court's discretion to deny plaintiff's motion and permit defendant to amend.

2. Officers—Disqualification—Arrest for Felony.

Where a constable was arrested for a felony, but the charge was subsequently dismissed without any hearing, neither the arrest nor his incarceration operated as a disqualification so as to create a vacancy in his office.

3. Same—Statutes—Construction.

Pol. Code, § 996, subd. 7, provides that an office becomes vacant by the ceasing of the incumbent to discharge the duties of the office for a period of three consecutive months, except when prevented by sickness or when absent from the state by permission of the Legislature. Held, that such section contemplated a "voluntary" abandonment or nonuser of the office for three consecutive months, and that an involuntary failure on the part of an incumbent to perform the duties of his office, caused by his incarceration for a felony during the statutory period, did not operate as an abandonment of the office within such section.

4. Same—Right to Salary.

Where plaintiff held the legal title to the office of constable of a town, he was entitled to receive the salary which attached as an incident to the office.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; M. H. Hyland, Judge.

Action for mandamus by Frederick Bergerow against W. F. Parker, as auditor of Santa Clara county. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

B. A. Herrington and George W. Waldorf, for appellant. James H. Campbell, for respondent.

HARRISON, P. J. The appellant was on June 30, 1900, a resident of the township of Alviso, in the county of Santa Clara, and eligible to the position of constable of that township, and was on said day regularly appointed by the board of supervisors of the county of Santa Clara constable of that township to fill a vacancy then and theretofore existing in said office, and on the same day qualified for said position by filing an approved bond and taking the oath of office as required by law, and entered upon the discharge of his duties as such constable. He was arrested July 15, 1900, upon a charge of murder, and was held and prosecuted upon said charge, and confined in the county jail at San Jose continuously from that date until July 26, 1902. On the last-named day, on motion of the district attorney of said county, the said charge was dismissed by the superior court, and the appellant was released from confinement, and immediately returned to Alviso township, and continuously resided there and performed the duties of constable of said township until August 16, 1902, on which day he ceased to be a resident of the county. He never resigned his position or voluntarily ceased the performance of any of the duties of his office, nor did the board of supervisors of the county, or any body with authority so to do, at any time between his appointment and August 16, 1902, declare said office vacant, or take any action therefor or for ousting him therefrom. The defendant is the auditor of the county of Santa Clara, and prior to the commencement of this action the appellant demanded of him that he draw a warrant in his favor upon the treasurer of the county for his salary as such constable at the rate of $25 a month from April 1, 1901, to August 15, 1902, as provided by the county government act of 1901, amounting to $412.50. Upon the refusal of the defendant to comply with his demand he applied to the superior court of said county for a writ of mandate, commanding him so to do. The application was submitted to the court upon an agreed statement of the foregoing facts, and the court found therefrom that the appellant ceased to be qualified to fill and discharge the duties of said office on the 15th day of July, 1900, and that the office became vacant on October 15, 1900, and on that day the plaintiff ceased to be such constable, and was not such constable at any time between April 1, 1901, and August 15, 1902, and held that he "was not and is not entitled to any compensation whatever as constable of said Alviso township for any period subsequent to October 15, 1900." The appellant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and from this order the present appeal has been taken.

1. The complaint was verified, and the defendant filed an answer thereto without verifying the same. Thereafter the plaintiff, upon proper motion therefor, moved the court for judgment upon the pleadings as prayed for in his complaint, upon the ground that the answer on file constituted no defense to his cause of action. At the hearing of the motion the court denied the same, and granted the defendant leave to serve and file an amended answer, to which ruling the plaintiff excepted, and now assigns such ruling as error. The defendant thereupon filed an amended answer properly verified, upon which the application was subsequently heard and judgment rendered in his favor. A motion by the plaintiff for judgment upon the pleadings is in the nature of a demurrer to the answer (Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 240); and if, upon the hearing of the motion, it is made to appear to the court that the defect in the answer is owing to any oversight or misprision on the part of the defendant, or that the defect can be so remedied as to present an issue to be tried and determined, it is within its discretion to permit an amendment that will obviate such defect (Fitzgerald v. Neustadt, 91 Cal. 600, 27 Pac. 936). The discretion of the court is at all times properly exercised by allowing parties to so frame their pleadings that the controversy between them may be determined upon its merits; and the rule is equally applicable whether the objection arises by reason of the failure to verify a pleading, or in the mode in which the defense has been pleaded. Whenever such defect is pointed out, and the defendant satisfies the court of his ability to obviate it, the court should grant him leave therefor (Kelley v. Kreiss, 68 Cal. 210, 9 Pac. 129; Guidery v. Green, 95 Cal. 630, 30 Pac. 786).

2. The finding that the appellant ceased to be qualified to discharge the duties of his office on July 15, 1900, has no support in the facts upon which the cause was submitted. His arrest and confinement on that day upon a charge of felony did not of itself operate as a disqualification, and would not have the effect to create a vacancy in the office until his conviction upon such charge. As he was never tried upon the charge, and consequently never convicted of the felony, and the charge was subsequently dismissed by the court without any hearing thereon, it must be assumed for the purposes of this case that he was innocent of the offense for which he was arrested. The ground upon which the respondent chiefly relies in support of the judgment is the finding of the court that "the office became vacant and said plaintiff ceased to be such constable on the 15th day of October, 1900, and was not such constable at any time between the 1st day of April, 1901, and the 15th day of August, 1902." It is, however, one of the agreed facts that from the time of the dismissal of the charge against him June 26, 1902, until the 16th day of August, 1902, he performed the duties of constable of that township. His performance of the duties of the office during this period of time, in the absence of any contrary showing, must be assumed to have been by virtue of his right thereto. Whether the duties of the office were performed by any one in his behalf or at all during the period of his confinement in the county jail is not stated in the agreed facts, and is not found by the court; but it is stated therein that the board of supervisors did not at any time after his original appointment to the office take any action declaring said office vacant, or ousting the plaintiff from said office, and that the plaintiff never resigned his position or voluntarily ceased to perform any of the duties of the office. It may therefore be assumed that there was no other incumbent of the office during the period of his confinement. To the extent, therefore, that the court finds that the appellant was not constable during the period between his discharge June 26, 1902, and August 16, 1902, the finding is not sustained by the agreed statement of facts. The finding of the court that "the office became vacant and the plaintiff ceased to be such constable on the 15th day of October, 1900" is based upon the provision of section 996 (7) of the Political Code, that an office becomes vacant by the "ceasing of the incumbent to discharge the duties of the office for the period of three consecutive months except when prevented by sickness, or when absent from the state by permission of the Legislature"; and it is urged that inasmuch as the appellant was continuously held in confinement at San Jose for a period of more than three consecutive months from the date of his arrest, he of necessity ceased to discharge the duties of his office during that period, and therefore at the expiration of three months from his arrest his office ipso facto became vacant. We are of the opinion, however, that this is not a proper construction to be given to this provision of the section, but that, in order to create a vacancy in the office, the cessation to discharge its duties for the designated period must be the voluntary act of the incumbent. The section provides for many of the contingencies upon which a vacancy will be created, and it will be noted that with the exception of the death of the incumbent each of these contingencies contemplates some proceeding against him, in which he will have an opportunity to controvert the ground on which the vacancy is claimed, or some act initiated by himself and voluntarily carried into effect. It is in harmony with the other provisions of the section that, in order to create a vacancy in the office, the cessation to discharge its duties for the period of three consecutive months must have been voluntary on his part, and we hold that such construction must be given to the provision. The provision is to be likened to a case of nonuser or abandonment of the office which, in the absence of any statutory provision, would be a ground for declaring a forfeiture of the office. The period during which such abandonment or nonuser must continue is fixed by the Code at three consecutive months, but as the term "abandonment" of itself implies a volition on the part of the incumbent against whom it is charged, such volition is essential to a cessation to discharge its duties before the penalty can be invoked. At common law a willful refusal to perform the duties of an office was required in order to work a forfeiture. People v. Hartwell, 67 Cal. 11, 6 Pac. 873.

The present case does not involve the right of the appellant to the office as was presented in People v. Brite, 55 Cal. 79, or the right of the board of supervisors to appoint another in his place, or of such appointee to discharge its duties, as was the case in People ex rel. Fleming v. Shorb, 100 Cal. 537, 35 Pac. 163, 38 Am. St. Rep. 310. Where the office appears to be without any incumbent authorized to discharge its duties, the interest of the public in having it filled so that its duties can be discharged authorizes the proper power to appoint some one for that purpose; but, as was said in People v. Fleming, though it may make an appointment in such cases upon any evidence which is satisfactory to it, "the incumbent of the office is not thereby concluded as to the fact of the occurrence of such event. He may always have his day in court before it can be conclusively adjudged against him that the office was vacant at the time the appointment was made." In the present case the board of supervisors did not appoint anyone to discharge the duties of the office, and after the liberation of the defendant he discharged its duties. The question herein involved is the right of the appellant to the salary which by law is attached to the office, and upon that question the rule is well established in this state that "the right to receive the salary is an incident which attaches itself to the legal title to the office." Ward v. Marshall, 96 Cal. 155, 30 Pac. 1113, 31 Am. St. Rep. 198, where many cases are cited in support thereof. In Ward v. Marshall the plaintiff was convicted of willful misconduct in office, and upon his appeal to the Supreme Court the judgment against him was reversed. Upon his conviction in the superior court the board of supervisors appointed another to the office, by whom its duties were discharged and to whom the salary was paid. It was held that, notwithstanding such appointment and payment, Ward was entitled to the salary accruing during the time that he was suspended from the performance of the duties of his office by the erroneous judgment of the superior court. If such be the right of an officer while his place is occupied by an appointee, much less can his right to the salary be disputed where no such appointment is made and he, upon returning from his absence, resumes the office and enters upon his functions without any objection. Ward's right to the salary was sustained upon the ground that "he was without fault on his part and against his consent released from the performance of the duties of the office for the period named." The agreed facts herein not only fail to show that there was any fault upon the part of the appellant, or that there was any voluntary cessation on his part in the discharge of the duties of his office, but instead thereof clearly show that he was prevented from their discharge during the period of his confinement by the direct act of those in whose behalf the defendant herein has presented the aforesaid defense, viz.: the people of the state. We have no hesitation in declaring that such defense is not available against the claim of the appellant; that his title to the office was not impaired by any conduct on his part, and that he is entitled to the salary affixed thereto by law.

The order is reversed.

CRAIG v. DOWIE.

1. Money Paid—Action to Recover—Complaint.

A complaint, alleging that between certain dates plaintiff, at defendant's special instance and request, furnished and paid out to and for the use and benefit of defendant the sum of $2,727.36, which defendant then and there agreed to repay to plaintiff on demand, with legal interest; that, though requested, defendant had not paid such sum, or any part thereof, except $962.46; and that there was owing to plaintiff $1,764.90, with legal interest, etc.—stated a sufficient cause of action.

3. Judgment—Remitting Excess.

Where, prior to the taking of an appeal, plaintiff served on defendant and filed in the trial court a document remitting from the judgment certain amounts erroneously included therein, and requesting the clerk to credit on the judgment as of the date of the entry an amount equal to such errors, the errors were cured.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; F. J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Hugh Craig against John Alexander Dowie. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Gray & Leet, for appellant. Craig & Craig, for respondent.

HALL, J. This is an appeal from a judgment against defendant for the sum of $1,764.90, together with interest thereon from the 11th day of December, 1888, and costs of suit. The appeal was taken within 60 days from the entry of the judgment.

The first point presented is as to the sufficiency of the complaint as against a general and special demurrer. The complaint alleges: "That between the 9th day of October and the 11th day of December, both inclusive, A. D. 1888, at the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, plaintiff, at the special instance and request of the defendant, furnished, paid, and laid out to and for the use and benefit of defendant the sum of two thousand seven hundred and twenty-seven and thirty-six hundredths ($2,727.36) dollars, which defendant then and there agreed to repay to plaintiff at said city and county of San Francisco on demand, together with legal interest. That, though requested thereto by plaintiff, defendant has not paid the same nor any part thereof, except the sum of nine hundred and sixty-two and forty-six hundredths ($962.46) dollars, and there is now due and owing to plaintiff from defendant therefor the sum of one thousand seven hundred and sixty-four and ninety hundredths ($1,764.90) dollars, with legal interest thereon from the 11th day of December, 1888." The complaint in this case does not differ in any material respect from the complaint in Pleasant v. Samuels, 114 Cal. 34, 45 Pac. 998, which was held to be good as against a general and special demurrer in all respects similar to the demurrer in this case. We therefore hold that no error was committed by the court in overruling the demurrer.

The court made findings following the language of the complaint, and the point principally urged for a reversal of the judgment is that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings. It appears that in 1888 the defendant Dowie was engaged in conducting "missions," teaching and expounding certain doctrines and beliefs held by himself. The expenditures sued for in this action were made by plaintiff in connection with a "mission" held at the Grand Opera House in the city and county of San Francisco in that year by defendant, and the vital matter in dispute between plaintiff and defendant is as to whether the expenditures were made by plaintiff as a voluntary offering on his part toward advancing the doctrines taught by Dowie, or were made by plaintiff at the request of Dowie on his promise to repay the same. The testimony given by plaintiff, which is corroborated by witnesses Cadman and Thomas, fully sustains his theory of the transaction. Plaintiff testified that the defendant urged him to advance the money for the expenses of the "mission" at the Opera House, and that "he undertook to make good any deficiency; that he would pay back to me any money that I advanced which did not come back from the collections which were taken at the mission. The collections that were taken at the mission were to be applied to pay back my advances." In regard to the same matter the witness Cadman said (referring to a conference between plaintiff, defendant, and the witness): "He [Dowie] said that he felt that he ought to have a bigger place to hold his meetings, and that if he could get a big mission started he could make a success of it, but that he had not the means to do it with, and he wanted to have the money advanced until the mission was started, and he felt confident that the mission would pay for itself. He said and always said that he would make good any deficiencies, but he felt sure there would be no deficiencies, and it was simply a matter of form to put this money up to pay these expenses until the mission could get on its feet, and that he would make the shortage good if there were any, but he felt sure there would not be any." The testimony of the witness Thomas was corroborative of the foregoing. As against this, appellant urges upon our attention expressions in letters, and conduct on the part of plaintiff, which he claims are inconsistent with the existence on his part of any claim to be reimbursed for his expenditures for the Grand Opera House mission. But all these matters concern the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses. The trial court having found the facts upon a conflict of evidence, we may not interfere.

Among the items going to make up the amount found by the court to have been expended by plaintiff for defendant are two items for interest paid to a bank for overdrafts, amounting to $30.08. When plaintiff agreed to make the necessary advances to carry on the mission he opened a special account at the bank for the expenditures in connection with the mission, and arranged for an overdraft, agreeing at the closing of the mission to give the bank a check for any deficiency there might be. Plaintiff testified that defendant understood perfectly the method adopted by plaintiff in opening the account with the bank and the matter of the overdraft, and though the testimony, perhaps, is not as clear as it might be that defendant consented to and approved of the payment of this interest on his account, we are not prepared to say that the court was not justified in so holding and charging him with it. The court allowed interest on the demand of plaintiff from December 11, 1888, while the evidence showed that demand was not made for payment of the deficiency before December 31, 1888. The interest for the period between December 11 and December 31, 1888, it is conceded amounts to $8.33, and respondent concedes should not have been allowed to plaintiff. Further, it appeared in the evidence of plaintiff that Cadman (who had agreed to advance one-half of the expenses of the mission until defendant should repay the same) had paid to plaintiff interest on the amount that he, Cadman, had agreed to advance to the amount of $80.48, and respondent concedes that defendant should have received a credit therefor. It was agreed and stipulated by the parties in this court, and the same matter is set forth in respondent's brief, that two weeks before the taking of the appeal in this matter plaintiff served on defendant and filed in the trial court a document, executed by plaintiff, reciting the facts of such errors, and remitting from the judgment, and requesting the clerk to credit upon the judgment as of the date of the entry thereof, the sum of $80.48 and the sum of $8.33. We think that justice will be subserved and the law not violated by recognizing this action of plaintiff as curing the error of the trial court.

The judgment is affirmed, with directions to the trial court to cause a partial satisfaction thereof to the amount of $88.81 to be entered thereon as of date of the 11th day of March, 1905, in accordance with the request of plaintiff filed in said court April 19, 1905.

SEFTON v. ROACH.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 6, 1906.)

TENANCY IN COMMON—AGREEMENTS BETWEEN CO-TENANTS—SHARES ON PARTITION.

A contract between two equal owners in common of land that, in case of its sale within a fixed time at a stated price, one of the parties shall first receive a certain sum from the proceeds, the remainder to be equally divided, does not entitle such party to more than an equal share of the land on its partition after the term of the contract has expired.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; N. H. Conklin, Judge.

Action by J. W. Sefton against Viola M. Roach as executrix and personally. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Puterbaugh & Puterbaugh, for appellant. Stearns & Sweet, for respondent.

SMITH, J. The suit is for partition of the land described in the complaint, and by an interlocutory decree there was awarded to plaintiff and to defendant, as successors in interest of Henry Roach, deceased, to each an undivided one-half of the land. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

It appears from the findings and the stipulation of facts appearing in the bill of exceptions that, August 8, 1891, the land in question was vested in the plaintiff, who on that day conveyed to Henry Roach an undivided one-half interest therein; and on the same day a contract in writing was executed between Sefton and Roach, wherein, after reciting that the parties "are the owners one-half each" of the property in controversy, occurs the following: "Now, therefore, for the purpose of managing and disposing of said property, it is hereby agreed between the parties hereto, that the said property shall not be sold for less than $30,000 prior to the 1st day of January, 1892, and that thereafter the price of said property is to be advanced $2,000 each and every six months until $40,000 is reached, and thereafter such advance shall be made as may be agreed upon between the parties hereto. It is further agreed, that whenever a sale is effected within the figures above mentioned, then both parties hereto are to execute to the purchaser a deed conveying all their interest in said land. That neither party is to sell or dispose of his interest in said property without the consent of the other, and to act and exercise the highest good faith the one towards the other in the management and control of said property. * * * It is further agreed, that upon the sale of said property there shall be paid to the said Henry Roach out of the first proceeds the sum of $2,000, and that thereafter all sums received from the sale of said lands shall be divided equally between the parties hereto, share and share alike."

It is claimed by the appellant that under, and by virtue of, this agreement Roach "acquired and became vested of a first and prior interest in and to [the land in controversy] to the extent of two thousand dollars over and above an undivided one-half interest therein, and that in equity and good conscience there should first be allotted and set apart to these defendants sufficient of said above described lands, at their present marketable cash value, to equal the full sum of said two thousand dollars." But we can see no grounds for this contention. The agreement, though of the same date, follows the conveyance, and the interests of the parties in the land are expressly stated to be respectively, "one-half." So far as the legal title is concerned, therefore, there can be no question. The claim of the defendant is, therefore, to an equitable title, and we can conceive of no principle upon which this can be based other than that of specific performance. But the agreement is not that Roach should be paid $2,000 out of the proceeds of sale absolutely, but that he should be paid that sum out of the proceeds if sold at the prices mentioned in the contract. Upon familiar principles, therefore, the contract was not susceptible of specific performance subsequent to the year following the date at which the price of the land, according to the terms of the contract, was to be $40,000, which would be June 1, 1894; nor prior to that date, except upon the event of a purchaser being found at the price specified. Thereafter there was no provision for a sale, except upon agreement of the parties as to price; and, indeed, until thus renewed, there was no longer a contract between the parties.

We are of the opinion that the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: GRAY, P. J.; ALLEN, J.

PEOPLE v. LOWRIE.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 19, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 17, 1906.)

1. Criminal Law—Trial—Reception of Motion to Strike Out—Testimony from Private Record—Evidence.

In prosecution for burglary a witness who was employed by a railroad company as ticket clerk examined certain tickets and testified that one of them was sold by him after 7 o'clock on the evening of April 27, 1905. On cross-examination he testified that he made the statement from the fact that the records of the office showed that a certain number of tickets were used on that evening and that he was the only person there to sell tickets. It appeared that the records were not kept by the witness, whereupon the testimony concerning the records was stricken. Held, that the balance of the testimony was admissible, there being nothing to show that the witness had testified as to that from a record not made by himself.

2. Same—Discretion of Court.

Where, in a prosecution for burglary, it was material to show certain sales of railroad tickets, it was not error for the court to admit what purported to be a record kept by the railroad company of the numbers of the daily sales of tickets, prior to its connection being proved, on the statement of the district attorney that he intended to establish that the record was a book of original entries by the testimony of the witness who made the entries.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 1611.]

3. Same—Opinion.

In a prosecution for burglary, a question whether there was any way that witness could tell or estimate the time that a certain railroad ticket was sold, from the ticket, of the witness' own knowledge, was not objectionable as calling for the witness' opinion.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 1035–1055.]

4. Burglary—Stolen Property—Evidence.

Where, in a prosecution for burglary, the state claimed that the works of two watches were part of the property stolen by the person who committed the burglary, evidence of the finding of the works of two watches in a suit case in defendant's room was admissible to prove guilt.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Burglary, § 91.]

5. Same—Exculpatory Circumstances.

In a prosecution for burglary, evidence that a witness examined defendant's room and that she did not find burglar's tools or implements, files, or keys therein was inadmissible to show innocence.

6. Witness' Refreshing Memory—Duplicate Entries.

Where, after a railroad ticket agent's report of daily sales of tickets was made out, a letter press copy thereof was taken from the original, such copy or duplicate might be properly used by the agent who made the original to refresh his memory, to enable him to testify as to ticket sales on a particular date.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, § 874.]

7. Criminal Law—Appeal—Record—Objections to Evidence—Review.

Where the record on appeal in a criminal case did not show the contents of a letter which was excluded, nor its substance, nor by whom it was written, it would be presumed that the ruling was correct.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 3029.]

8. Burglary—Degrees—Evidence.

Where, in a prosecution for burglary, it was shown that, when the family of F. awoke, at 5:30 a. m., they found that the house had been entered during the night and various articles stolen therefrom, the evidence was sufficient to justify a verdict that the entry constituted burglary in the first degree, which depended on the time it was committed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County.

C. D. Lowrie was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. T. Hume, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

COOPER, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of burglary in the first degree, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of 15 years. This appeal is from the judgment and an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial. We have carefully examined the evidence, and find it sufficient to support the verdict; and hence it is not necessary to discuss it in detail, nor the questions raised as to its sufficiency.

Defendant assigns as error the refusal of the court to strike out the direct testimony of the witness Bailey, who was employed on the 27th day of April, 1905, by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company at the local ferry office as ticket clerk. Bailey, while on the stand, examined a number of tickets shown to him, and testified that a ticket shown to him was sold by him after 7 o'clock on the evening of April 27, 1905, at the ferry ticket office in San Francisco, at the foot of Market street. On cross-examination he testified that he made the statement from the fact that the records of the office showed that certain numbers of tickets were used on that evening, and that he was the only person there to sell tickets. The defendant did not object to the testimony when offered, but moved to strike it out on the ground that the same was incompetent and not the best evidence, which motion was denied, and is the ruling complained of. Without passing upon the question as to whether or not the ruling was erroneous, it is sufficient to say that, after further examination, when it was discovered that the records in the office as to tickets sold were not kept by the witness Bailey, the court, on the defendant's motion, struck out the testimony of the witnesss concerning the record, on the ground that the same was hearsay, incompetent, and irrelevant. After the testimony of the witness as to the record was stricken out, his testimony as to other matters was then competent, for the reason that there was nothing to show that he had testified from a record not made by himself. In all cases where a motion is made to strike out testimony which was not objected to at the time, much discretion is necessarily vested in the trial court. It would require a plain abuse of such discretion in regard to a material matter to justify the reversal of a case for such reason.

There was no error in the ruling allowing in evidence the book of original entries, purporting to be a record kept by the railroad company of the numbers and daily sales of tickets. The court, in the first place, on the objection of the defendant, refused to admit such record, but the district attorney stated that he intended to connect it by the testimony of Kern, who made the original entries. After such statement no further objection was made by the defendant, and the record was received in evidence. The district attorney afterwards called Kern, and identified the record as he promised to do.

The district attorney asked of the witness Bailey the following question: "Is there any way that you can tell or estimate the time that that ticket was sold, from itself, of your own knowledge?" The court overruled the defendant's objection that the question called for the opinion of the witness, and was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and such ruling is urged as error. The question was not objectionable, and, more than this, the witness answered in effect that he had no way of telling when the ticket was sold except by the record as to the numbers of the tickets sold on that evening.

There is no merit in the contention that the court should not have allowed the witness Freel to testify to the fact of finding the works of two watches in a suit case in defendant's room. The district attorney introduced evidence tending to prove the works of the two watches so found were part of the property stolen by the party who committed the burglary. The burglary is alleged to have been with intent to commit larceny. The fact that stolen property is found in possession of defendant in cases of larceny is always a circumstance tending to prove his guilt. If unexplained, it is a most potent circumstance. The defendant here made no attempt to explain the circumstances as to why the works of the watches were in the suit case in his room. Nor was it error to sustain the objection of the district attorney to defendant's question, asked of the witness Rosenblatt, as to whether or not she examined the defendant's room, and whether or not she saw any burglar's tools or implements, files, or keys around the room. The fact that such tools were not found, if true, would not be competent to prove the defendant innocent.

The defendant seems to earnestly urge that the court erred in admitting the record of the railroad company as to the numbers and report of tickets sold each day, and the testimony of the witness Kern based upon such record. As to the first part of the objection, it appears that the record or report as to the numbers of tickets sold is made up by the agent, who is in charge and sells the tickets, at the end of the day. When the report is made up, copies are made by the use of blank sheets and a wet blotter from the ink on the original report; in other words, letterpress copies of the original are made. The copies are reproductions of the handwriting of the original report. It is but another way of making duplicates of the original entry. If the party who made the original entry had made at the same time several duplicates in his own handwriting they would all be regarded as original entries. Instead of doing this the writing is reproduced from the same characters and the same ink on the original. The duplicates are thus more exact than they could possibly have been by having been copied in the handwriting of the party who made the original. And while it appears that the record as to the closing numbers of the tickets sold on the 26th and 27th days of April, 1905, was offered in evidence by the district attorney, and the defendant's objection thereto overruled, it does not appear that the record was actually received or read in evidence. No copy of any such record is in the transcript. The witness evidently refreshed his memory by the use of the duplicate entries, which he had the right to do. He testified that the closing numbers on the 26th and 27th days of April were in his handwriting. He then testified that the closing number on the 26th was 376,194, and on the 27th 384,752. No objection was made to the witness using the letterpress copies for the purpose of refreshing his memory.

Defendant, in the cross-examination of the witness Conrad, appears to have offered a letter in evidence to which the district attorney objected on the ground that it was hearsay and a self-serving declaration. The court sustained the objection, and the ruling is assigned as error. As the record does not show the contents of the letter, nor its substance, nor by whom it was written, we must presume that the ruling of the court was correct.

There was no error in the instruction to the effect that the jury might, if the evidence warranted, find the defendant guilty of burglary in the first degree. The degree depended upon the time the burglary was committed. When the Fritschie family awoke at about 5:30 o'clock a. m. of the morning of April 28, 1905, they found that the house had been entered during the night and various articles stolen therefrom. The burglar had departed. As to when the entry was made and the property stolen was a question of fact for the jury, and might be arrived at from all the facts and circumstances. There was sufficient evidence to justify the implied finding of the jury that the entry was in the nighttime.

There are no other points sufficiently plausible to merit discussion.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

4 Cal. App. 109

BREE v. WHEELER.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 16, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court September 14, 1906.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION—WATER RIGHTS.

No title to water rights accrued by adverse possession, where plaintiff annually interrupted defendant's use.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 1, Cent. Dig. Adverse Possession, §§ 232-235.]

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—WATERS AND WATER COURSES—AGREEMENTS—PART PERFORMANCE.

Though Code Civ. Proc. § 1971, and Civ. Code, § 1624, classify water rights as realty, and require written agreements relating thereto, where an oral agreement, actually dividing the water, was acted on and gave to each of the parties possession of one-half the water, and nothing remained to be done, except the execution of a conveyance, a court of equity will protect the rights of the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Frauds, Statute of, §§ 334-341.]

3. SAME — AGREEMENTS FIXING WATER RIGHTS.

Where parties have entered into an oral agreement settling disputed water rights, which is carried into effect, and have acquiesced in it for a considerable time, such agreement is not within the statute of frauds.

4. CONTRACTS—REPUDIATIONS.

A party to an executed agreement cannot repudiate it without the other's consent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 11, Cent. Dig. Contracts, § 1143.]

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—AGREEMENT AS USE—ABANDONMENT.

Where plaintiff and defendant orally agreed concerning a division of water rights, and defendant placed in the stream a measuring box for the purpose of dividing the water and, after its use for some time, plaintiff took it out and defendant again, at his own expense, replaced such box, and it was again taken out by the plaintiff, whereupon defendant used all the water, such subsequent use did not destroy his right to the quantum fixed by the agreement.

6. SAME.

Where the parties mutually agreed on a division of water rights, defendant, having been forced to defend his rights, could rely not only on his original claim of right, but on the rights claimed under the agreement and could not be required to elect.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; F. T. Nyland, Judge.

Action by William Bree against Lewis Wheeler. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. W. Kitts and Thos. S. Ford, for appellant. J. M. Walling, for respondent.

McLAUGHLIN, J. This is the second appeal in this case—Bree v. Wheeler, 129 Cal. 146, 61 Pac. 782. Upon the second trial, had on amended pleadings, the facts found show that up to 1885 plaintiff was the owner of all the water in dispute and that defendant did not acquire title thereto by adverse possession, or otherwise, unless an agreement, affirmatively pleaded in the amended answer and found by the court, operated to give him the right to one-half of the water.

Plaintiff, who is appellant here, contends that, upon the findings the court should have adjudged him the owner of all of said water instead of decreeing that each of the parties owned one-half thereof. The finding relating to the agreement above mentioned is in substantial accord with the averment of the amended answer in that behalf, and in substance is as follows: In 1885, each of the parties hereto was claiming the water in question, and defendant was using it for irrigating his land, against the protest of plaintiff. They talked the matter over, and it was orally agreed to avoid litigation and in settlement of their respective rights to the use of the water, that they should divide it, the plaintiff taking it during the night, and the defendant during the daytime. This method of division continued for two seasons, whereupon, plaintiff being dissatisfied, the manner of division was changed by mutual consent, and a measuring box was put in the stream which equitably and fairly divided the water, each party taking one-half thereof both day and night. This method continued for two seasons, but in 1889 plaintiff again became dissatisfied, and wrongfully tore out the measuring box. Then a board was placed in the stream by defendant, at his own expense, at a level, with two holes of equal size, to divide the water equally, and plaintiff removed this appliance. The defendant then took all the water, leaving none for plaintiff. After the recital of the foregoing facts, the finding reads as follows: "Defendant continued to divide the water as long as plaintiff would permit him to do so. In order to divide the same it was necessary that a measuring box or other suitable appliance be maintained at the point of diversion. Unless such means of division was maintained, defendant could not divide the water. This condition of affairs continued from 1889 until the commencement of this action." As the plaintiff interrupted the defendant's use annually, no title by adverse possession could accrue, and hence the rights of the latter, and the validity of the judgment depend entirely upon the effect of the compromise agreement or settlement.

Water rights are classed as real property, and hence, under the general rule, any agreement relating thereto must be in writing. Code Civ. Proc. § 1971, Civ. Code, § 1624; Hayes v. Fine, 91 Cal. 498, 27 Pac. 772; Blankenship v. Whaley, 124 Cal. 304, 57 Pac. 79. But in the case at bar the agreement was acted upon by placing a measuring box in the stream, and actually dividing the water, and by mutual consent of the parties each was placed in possession of one-half thereof. To complete the transfer nothing remained to be done except the execution of a conveyance, conveying a proper proportion of the water to each. Each had a perfect equity, entitling him to a deed from the other. When such is the case, a court of equity, in accordance with its familiar rules, considering that as done which ought to be done, will protect the right obtained "as readily and as fully as a legal title." Flickinger v. Shaw, 87 Cal. 133, 25 Pac. 268, 11 L. R. A. 134, 22 Am. St. Rep. 234; Blankenship v. Whaley, supra, and 142 Cal. 566, 76 Pac. 235; Griseza v. Terwilliger, 144 Cal. 462, 77 Pac. 1034; Bates v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 486, 30 Pac. 605, 16 L. R. A. 745, 29 Am. St. Rep. 133; Bigelow on Fraud, vol. 2, p. 445. There is another principle of law under which the agreement must be held binding. It has been held repeatedly and with practical unanimity that an oral agreement fixing a dividing line between owners of land is not within the statute of frauds, and that when the line is in doubt or dispute a settlement between the owners determines the location of the existing estate of each, and when followed by possession and occupancy, binds them in equity and at law as well. "If the parties have carried the agreement into execution, and entered into possession in accordance with it, the courts will not disturb it, though both parties were mistaken as to the true location of the line." Jones on Real Property, §§ 354, 358; White v. Spreckels, 75 Cal. 610, 17 Pac. 715; Helm v. Wilson, 76 Cal. 485, 18 Pac. 604. "It is the policy of the law to give stability to such an agreement, because it is the most satisfactory way of determining the true boundary, and tends to prevent litigation." Cavanaugh v. Jackson, 91 Cal. 582, 27 Pac. 931; Dierssen v. Nelson, 138 Cal. 398, 71 Pac. 456. This doctrine is based on the common-sense proposition that when a dispute exists between two parties, they may adjust their differences by mutual agreement, which, when executed by them will be held binding as to each, and we can think of no reason in law or logic why the principle thus applied to land should not be applied to a case where the parties have deliberately entered into an agreement settling disputed water rights, which agreement was immediately carried into effect, and was acquiesced in for a considerable period of time. And if such an agreement relating to land cannot be disturbed by the parties after it has been carried into effect, a similar executed agreement relating to another class of real property must be held equally efficacious. Jones on Real Property, §§ 358, 359. It must, therefore, be held that plaintiff could not repudiate the agreement made, carried into effect, and acquiesced in by him and by defendant. True, both might, by mutual agreement, repudiate it, but neither alone could do so. The court expressly finds that defendant performed the agreement as long as he was permitted to do so by plaintiff, and his subsequent use of the water did not destroy his right to the quantum fixed upon by mutual consent. It is the fixed policy of the law to encourage the settlement of disputes and the prevention of litigation, and when such settlement has been made, acted upon and acquiesced in, parties will not be permitted to violate the compact unless circumstances of fraud or undue influence are shown. Downing v. Murray, 113 Cal. 462, 45 Pac. 869; Pomeroy, Eq. Jurisprudence, § 850. The agreement was sufficiently pleaded and proved. The defendant was not required to elect whether he would claim title to all or only part of the water. Having been forced into court to defend his rights, he was at liberty to rely not only on his original claim of right, but upon the rights claimed under the compromise agreement. Miles v. Woodward, 115 Cal. 314, 46 Pac. 1076; Banta v. Siller, 121 Cal. 418, 53 Pac. 935. It would be strange indeed if the plaintiff, relying on his original claim and free to assail any and all rights claimed by defendant, could confine the latter to rights obtained under an agreement, which by the very commencement of the action plaintiff was attempting to repudiate. The findings are not inconsistent. The court in effect finds that plaintiff had a right to the whole of the water which right was impaired only by his voluntary act in entering into and effectuating the agreement which vested in defendant the right to one-half thereof.

In re HAYDEN'S ESTATE. (Sac. 1,493.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 14, 1906. Rehearing Denied Oct. 11, 1906.)

1. Wills—Probate—Proceedings.

An heir of a decedent, in his petition for letters of administration, alleged the intestacy of decedent. Another person filed a petition in opposition to the granting of administration and alleged that decedent died testate and prayed for the probate of her will. Held, that the failure of the heir petitioning for administration to file a written opposition to the probate of the will, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1312, did not deprive him of a standing in the appellate court, on appeal from a judgment refusing the probate of the alleged will, where throughout the proceedings in the trial court the pleadings were recognized as sufficient to raise an issue on the matter.

2. Same—Burden of Proof.

It is incumbent on one petitioning for the probate of a will of a decedent to make satisfactory proof of the will, and, if he fails to do so, the trial court must, though there is no opposition to the probate, refuse probate.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, §§ 653-659.]

3. Appeal—Finding on Conflicting Evidence—Conclusiveness.

A finding of the trial court on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal, where the testimony depends on the credibility of the witnesses.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, § 3983.]

4. Wills — Probate — Findings of Trial Court—Sufficiency.

In a proceeding for the probate of a lost will, the petition alleged that decedent died leaving a will, and that W. and a servant, or some person acting with them and under their direction, concealed the will wherein W. was disinherited for the purpose of enabling him to obtain the property. The court found "that F. nor W., nor any other person, * * * carried away any will * * * belonging to * * * decedent, * * * that said F. nor W. ever at any time * * * had in their possession any will of" decedent, "nor are they, or either of them, in the possession of any will, * * * nor did they, or either of them, ever have in their possession * * * any will" of decedent. Held, that the omission of the word "neither" before the name of F. did not render the finding insufficient on which to base a decree refusing the probate of the will.

5. Same.

A finding of the court that the allegations of a party seeking the probate of a will of a decedent, "with respect to" decedent "leaving any will or any person having in their possession any will of" decedent, "are untrue," is sufficient to justify the refusal to admit the will to probate.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; W. B. Nutter, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Sarah C. Hayden, deceased. From a judgment refusing the probate of an alleged will of the decedent, Frederick H. Collins appeals. Affirmed.

See 81 Pac. 668.

A. H. Carpenter, for appellant. Nicol & Orr and E. P. Foltz, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Sarah C. Hayden died in the county of San Joaquin on the 6th day of June, 1904. After her death A. L. Westing, her grandson, and one of her heirs, applied for letters of administration upon her estate, alleging her intestacy. About nine months before her death Mrs. Hayden, who had become paralyzed in the latter part of the year 1902, and who had failed physically and mentally from that time, was declared incompetent, and Westing was appointed her guardian and continued to act as her guardian until the time of her death. Frederick H. Collins, a nephew by marriage of the deceased, filed a petition in opposition, alleging that Mrs. Hayden had died leaving a last will and testament, and that Westing and a hired servant, or some person acting with them and under their direction, had taken, carried away, and concealed the last will and testament wherein Westing was disinherited for the purpose of enabling him to obtain the property for himself. The petition set up what was alleged to be a copy of the will and a codicil thereto. The court refused probate of the alleged will and granted letters of administration to Westing, and from these decrees these appeals are taken.

It is first contended that as no written opposition to the probate of Mrs. Hayden's will had been filed, as required by the provisions of section 1312 of the Code of Civil Procedure, respondent has no standing before this court, but as Westing himself in his petition for letters of administration had alleged the intestacy of the deceased, and as throughout the proceedings in the trial court the pleadings were recognized as sufficient to raise issue upon this matter, appellant's position is not well taken, and even if respondent were not to be heard, as it was incumbent upon appellant to make satisfactory proof of the will, and he failed to do this to the satisfaction of the trial court, it was the duty of the trial court, even without opposition, to have refused probate to Mrs. Hayden's purported will. There was testimony to show that deceased had made a will and a codicil thereto. There was, however, no testimony that Westing, or anybody acting with or under him, had ever seen or had possession of the will, much less that they had feloniously taken, concealed, or destroyed it. There was also evidence that, if the will was made, it was revoked by the deceased in her lifetime; the testimony showing declarations of the deceased that she did not have a will, and that they, meaning Collins and those in interest with him, were endeavoring to induce her to make a will. The case is typical of the wisdom of the rule so long enunciated and adhered to by this court that it cannot and will not disturb a judgment given upon conflicting evidence. Much of the weight of the testimony in this case of necessity depends upon the standing and credibility of the witnesses upon either side, as to which the trial court, and not this, is alone capable of judging.

The appellant contends that the findings are enigmatical and uncertain. The finding to which this attack is addressed is as follows: "That Annie Fogacci nor A. L. Westing, nor any other person, took or carried away any will or codicil, or other document of value belonging to said Sarah C. Hayden, for the purpose of enabling A. L. Westing to fraudulently or at all get possession of the property of said Sarah C. Hayden, or for any other purpose whatever; that said Annie Fogacci nor A. L. Westing ever at any time found or had in their possession any will of said Sarah C. Hayden, deceased, nor are they, or either of them, in the possession of any will of Sarah C. Hayden, nor did they, or either of them, ever have in their possession or under their control any will whatever of said Sarah C. Hayden, deceased." While unquestionably the finding would have been made clearer by the insertion of the word "neither" before the name "Annie Fogacci," this omission does not nullify the finding, as the context makes perfectly plain what the court meant to declare.

The finding of the court that the allegations of the opposition of Frederick H. Collins "with respect to Sarah C. Hayden leaving any will, or any person having in their possession any will of Sarah C. Hayden, deceased, are untrue," is sufficient as a finding to justify the court's refusal to admit the alleged will to probate.

We have examined the alleged errors of the court in admitting and rejecting evidence. None of the points call for detailed consideration. It is sufficient to say that the rulings were proper.

The orders and decrees appealed from are affirmed.

RIPPERDAN et al. v. WELDY et al. (Sac. 1,448.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 4, 1906. Rehearing Denied Oct. 4, 1906.)

1. Appeal—Findings—Conclusiveness.

The finding of the trial court on conflicting evidence cannot be reviewed on appeal.

2. Cancellation of Instruments—Confidential Relations—Presumptions.

Where no confidential relation existed between a grantor and a grantee, no presumption against the validity of the deed on the ground of undue influence arose.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Cancellation of Instruments, § 100.]

3. Appeal—Findings—Conclusiveness.

Where, in a suit to set aside a deed on the ground of the incompetency of the grantor, the court on the testimony of the subscribing witnesses testifying in favor of the grantor's mental soundness, and intimate acquaintances testifying both in favor of and against the grantor's competency, found in favor of the grantor's competency, the court on appeal could not interfere with the finding, for the question related only to the weight of the evidence.

4. Interest of Witness—Evidence—Weight of Testimony.

Though, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1879, a witness interested in the event of the litigation is a competent witness, the fact of his interest is a proper matter for the trial court to consider in weighing his testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, § 2439.]

5. Trial—Findings—Finding of Ultimate Fact in Issue.

A finding, in a suit to set aside a deed on the ground of the grantor's incompetency, that on the day the deed was executed the grantor was "entirely competent, mentally and physically, to transact the business of executing and delivering * * * a deed," and that at that time the grantor "was in full possession of his mental faculties and fully understood the transaction," necessarily involves the inference that the grantor was not entirely without understanding, within Civ. Code, § 38, providing that a person entirely without understanding has no power to make a contract, and is a finding of the ultimate fact in issue.

6. Appeal — Review — Construction of Findings.

Findings must be construed so as to support the judgment, rather than defeat it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, § 3769.]

7. Deeds—Future Estates—Validity.

Under Civ. Code, § 767, providing that a future estate may be limited by the act of the party to commence in possession at a future day, either without the intervention of a precedent estate or on the termination of a precedent estate created at the same time, a conveyance to take effect at the grantor's death and reserving to him the use of the property during his life is valid.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Deeds, § 381.]

8. Cancellation of Instruments — Pleadings—Issues.

Where, in a suit to set aside a deed, the complaint set forth an ordinary deed, and alleged that the same was procured without the consideration and by the undue influence and fraud of the grantee, and that the grantor was incompetent, which allegations were denied, the court could not determine that the conveyance was void because creating a trust not authorized by Civ. Code, § 857, specifying for what purposes trusts may be created.

9. Deeds—Failure of Consideration—Effect.

A deed made freely, voluntarily, and without fraud, by one who is competent, passes title, though the consideration may fail in whole or in part.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Deeds, § 38.]

10. Same.

Civ. Code, § 1608, providing that, where any part of a single consideration for one or more objects or of several considerations for a single object is unlawful, the entire contract is void, applies only to contracts which are executory, at least in part, and does not permit a grantor who has received and retained the consideration for the conveyance to recover the property on the sole ground that the consideration was unlawful in part.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Deeds, §§ 200-205; vol. 11, Cent. Dig. Contracts, §§ 701-712.]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by A. K. Ripperdan and others against Nancy E. Weldy and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Robert L. Hargrove, for appellants. W. H. Hatton and L. J. Maddux, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. This action was brought by the plaintiffs, heirs, devisees, and legatees of Isaac Ripperdan, deceased, to set aside a deed of certain real estate and a bill of sale of personal property made by Ripperdan on the 4th day of May, 1901, to Nancy E. Weldy and Jennie W. Jones. The complaint sets forth, as grounds for the relief sought, unsoundness of mind of the deceased, as well as undue influence and fraud exercised by the grantees, and alleges that the defendant Nancy E. Weldy occupied a confidential relationship toward the grantor, and that there was no consideration for the transfers. It is alleged, further, that the grantees had, after delivery of the deed to them, conveyed portions of the land to other defendants, who, it is asserted, took with notice of the incompetency of Isaac, and of the undue influence and fraud practiced by the defendants Weldy and Jones. The prayer is for appropriate equitable relief. The defendants answered, denying all of the allegations of incompetency, undue influence and fraud, and denying, necessarily, any notice by the grantees of Weldy and Jones of any such defects in the original conveyance. The answer also denies the existence of any confidential relation and the want of consideration. After an extended trial the court made its findings, which were in favor of the defendants on every issue, and judgment for said defendants for their costs followed. The plaintiffs appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for new trial.

The main contention of the appellants is on their appeal from the order, and is based on the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. As has been said, the trial was protracted. The statement on motion for a new trial shows that some 50 witnesses were examined. It would be impracticable for us to analyze and discuss the testimony of each of these witnesses. Without undertaking such task, we have no hesitation in saying that, on the issues as to which the defendants' evidence was not preponderating or undisputed, there was, putting appellants' case in its strongest light, a distinct and substantial conflict of evidence, which imposed upon the trial court the duty of determining the disputed facts. Nothing is better settled in this court than the rule that, on appeal, the verdict of a jury or the finding of a trial court on conflicting testimony cannot be reviewed. The nature of the testimony and of the questions which were presented to the trial court may be indicated by a brief statement of facts which appeared substantially without dispute. Isaac Ripperdan was a farmer or "rancher," who had for many years been living on his property in Stanislaus county. He was a bachelor. In 1876, Nancy E. Weldy, his niece, with her husband and children, one of whom is the defendant Jennie W. Jones, came to live with him. Thereafter, until his death in 1904, Mrs. Weldy acted as his housekeeper. It is plain from the evidence that in that capacity she made herself very useful, and that a strong attachment existed between uncle and niece. On May 4, 1901, when the deed and bill of sale now in controversy were made, Isaac Ripperdan was 85 years of age. He was, physically at least, somewhat enfeebled by his advanced years, and suffered from impaired eyesight, due to an injury sustained some years before. On May 4, 1901, he conveyed all of his real and personal property, of the value, as found by the court, of about $50,000, over and above incumbrances, to Mrs. Weldy and Mrs. Jones. At the same time and as part of the same transaction they executed an agreement by which, in consideration of the deed and bill of sale, they agreed to provide him, during his life, with board, lodging, clothing, and, if needed, medical attention; to allow him the use of a room in the dwelling on the property conveyed, and free access to all the premises; to furnish him with a buggy and team, and to care for the same; and to pay him the sum of $2,000 a year in quarterly installments during his natural life. They further agreed not to sell or convey any part of the premises during his lifetime. Upon the execution of these documents, Nancy E. Weldy and Jennie W. Jones took possession and control of the premises and the personal property. They thereafter managed the farm, borrowed in their own names the money that was needed to carry on operations, and in all ways assumed and claimed ownership of the property. In June, 1902, an agreement was made modifying the restrictions upon sale contained in the agreement of May, 1901, by permitting the sale of portions of the premises to pay the indebtedness on the lands. Under this modification, the conveyances by Weldy and Jones to other defendants, set forth in the complaint, were made. Isaac continued to live upon the property, and the agreement with him seems to have been faithfully carried out. He enjoyed the care and privileges which Mrs. Weldy and her daughter had contracted to give, and there was evidence that the payments provided for were made to him. In 1888 he had made a will, in which, after giving Nancy Weldy a life interest in the "home place" (a portion of the property here in dispute), he divided the bulk of the residue of his estate between his brothers, sisters, nephews, and nieces, who are the plaintiffs here. Upon his death the will, in which Nancy was named as executrix, was offered for probate. This action was commenced after the will was filed, but before it was admitted to probate.

Most of the testimony at the trial was directed to the question of Isaac's mental condition, and it is to this point that the argument of appellants is principally directed. So far as the issues of fraud and undue influence are concerned, the evidence for the defendants was certainly ample to support the findings, if, indeed, it did not decidedly preponderate. The court was fully justified in finding, as it did, that no confidential relation existed, and, this being so, no presumptions against the validity of the transfer arose. On the issue of the grantor's competency, mentally, to transact business of this character, many witnesses testified on either side. Most of them qualified as "intimate acquaintances" of Isaac Ripperdan (Code Civ. Proc. § 1870), and as such gave opinions "respecting his mental sanity." Generally speaking, the plaintiffs' witnesses expressed the opinion that he was not, in May, 1901, mentally capable of transacting important business, while the contrary view was expressed by the witnesses called by the defendants. The subscribing witnesses to the deed and bill of sale of May 4, 1901, also testified to their opinion in favor of the grantor's soundness of mind. Code Civ. Proc. § 1870. The court, in determining the ultimate fact, evidently regarded the testimony of defendants' witnesses as better entitled to credit. This question relating, as it did, purely to the weight of evidence, was peculiarly for the trial court. With its conclusion we cannot interfere. As to several of the witnesses, appellants argue that they were "interested financially, and therefore disqualified from giving an opinion." But an interest in the litigation does not, of itself, work any such disqualification. By section 1879 of the Code of Civil Procedure it is provided that "neither parties nor other persons who have an interest in the event of an action or proceeding are excluded" as witnesses. "At common law interest disqualified any person from being a witness. That rule has been modified by statute. In this state interest is no longer a disqualification, and the disqualifications are only such as the law imposes." Merriman v. Wickersham, 141 Cal. 567, 75 Pac. 180. Probably counsel do not intend to claim that these witnesses were in a strict sense not competent to testify, but rather that their interest was such that no weight or credence should be given to their testimony. But that is not a question for this court. The interest of the witnesses on either side was undoubtedly a proper matter for the trial court to consider in weighing their testimony; but, whether a witness be interested or not, it still remains for that court to determine whether, under all the circumstances, his testimony is to be credited or not. The witnesses stated the reasons on which their opinions were based, and their conclusions were no doubt weighed in the light of their reasons. Apart from these opinions, there was a good deal of evidence regarding the relations of the parties and the circumstances surrounding the transactions in question. Much of it had a bearing, one way or the other, on the question of Isaac's mental condition. Without undertaking any more elaborate statement of the facts shown, we repeat that, after a careful examination of the record, we are satisfied that the evidence as to competency was ample to sustain the findings.

Appellants contend, further, that there was no sufficient finding on the issues as to Isaac's competency. The court found "that on said 4th day of May, 1901, said Isaac Ripperdan was entirely competent, mentally and physically, to transact the business of executing and delivering to Nancy E. Weldy and Jennie W. Jones, defendants, the deed of conveyance and bill of sale hereinbefore mentioned; that at the time of the execution and delivery of said deed of conveyance and bill of sale by said Ripperdan to said Nancy E. Weldy and Jennie W. Jones the said Isaac Ripperdan was in full possession of his mental faculties and fully understood the transaction." It is objected that the court has merely found that Isaac was "competent to transact business." Appellants claim that competency or incompetency is a conclusion of law, to be drawn from facts, and that there should have been a finding on the fact of soundness or unsoundness of mind. The cases cited do not sustain the proposition that competency or capacity to contract may not properly be found as an ultimate fact, but if we should concede the rule to be as claimed, the finding that Isaac Ripperdan "was in full possession of his mental faculties and fully understood the transaction" amply covers the issue. Civ. Code, § 38, provides that "a person entirely without understanding has no power to make a contract of any kind. * * *" Section 39 reads: "A conveyance or other contract of a person of unsound mind, but not entirely without understanding, made before his incapacity has been judicially determined, is subject to rescission, as provided in the chapter on rescission of this Code." In the one case the contract is void, in the other merely voidable. See More v. Calkins, 85 Cal. 177, 24 Pac. 729. In the case at bar no rescission has been or is attempted. Plaintiffs claim that the deed and bill of sale were absolutely void from the beginning. They attempted to establish a case within the purview of section 38. The phrase "entirely without understanding," as used in that section, means a want of capacity to understand transactions of the kind involved. Jacks v. Estee, 139 Cal. 507, 73 Pac. 247. It is impossible that a person without the capacity of understanding a particular transaction can in fact understand it. The finding, therefore, that at the time of the execution and delivery of the deed and bill of sale Isaac Ripperdan "fully understood the transaction," involves necessarily the inference that he was not "entirely without understanding," and is a finding of the ultimate fact in issue. Findings are to be construed so as to support the judgment, rather than defeat it (Warren v. Hopkins, 110 Cal. 506, 42 Pac. 986), and when, from the facts found by the court, other facts may be inferred which will support the judgment, such inference will be deemed to have been made by the trial court. Breeze v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 77, 31 Pac. 742, 22 L. R. A. 257; Krasky v. Wollpert, 134 Cal. 338, 66 Pac. 309.

The appellants base several contentions upon the fact, shown by the evidence, that the deed and bill of sale of May 4, 1901, were executed, together with the agreement above mentioned, whereby Mrs. Weldy and Mrs. Jones agreed that he should, to a certain extent, have the use of the property during his life, that they would give him certain care and attention, and that they would pay him $2,000 a year during his life. It is claimed that all the instruments must be read together, and that, so read, they constitute a conveyance to take effect at the grantor's death, reserving to the grantor the use and enjoyment of the property during his life. If this construction were adopted, it would not affect the validity of the deed as a conveyance. Any objection to which deeds creating estates to commence in future may have been subject at common law (Hawes v. Stebbins, 49 Cal. 369; Chandler v. Chandler, 55 Cal. 270) has been removed in this state by section 767 of the Civil Code (Blakeman v. Miller, 136 Cal. 139, 68 Pac. 587, 89 Am. St. Rep. 120). Again, the argument is made that the effect of the various instruments of May 4, 1901, was to transfer the property to Mrs. Weldy and Mrs. Jones in trust for the maintenance of the grantor during his life—a purpose which, it is claimed, is not authorized by Civ. Code, § 857—or that, if the trust be valid, it terminated at the grantor's death, and there is a resulting trust in favor of his estate. We need not consider whether any trust was created or sought to be created by the transaction of May 4, 1901, for the reason that the question is not within the issues made by the pleadings. The complaint sets forth an ordinary deed and bill of sale, which, it is alleged, were procured without consideration by the undue influence and fraud (false and specious promises) of the defendants Weldy and Jones, and which were signed by one incompetent to transact business. These allegations were denied. The complaint nowhere charged that there was a conveyance upon express trusts, whether for authorized or unauthorized purposes. No issue was presented which would have authorized the court to set aside the deed except for fraud, undue influence, or incompetency. A determination that the conveyance was void because made in trust for purposes not permitted by the Code, or that it conveyed no beneficial interest beyond the life of the grantor, would have been outside of the issues, and a finding of facts from which such determination followed would, if made, have been entitled to no consideration.

Finally, with reference to this agreement, it is argued that the provision against alienating the estate during the lifetime of Isaac is void, and that with it the consideration for the deed fails. If the deed transferred a title in fee simple, a covenant by the grantees that they would not transfer the property is void, as repugnant to the interest created by the deed. Section 711 of the Civil Code declares against repugnant conditions restraining alienation. "But the rule does not depend upon the mere form in which the restraint is imposed. It avoids, as well, covenants of the grantee against alienation as conditions of like nature imposed by the grantor. Such covenants, if not within the letter of section 711 of the Civil Code, are yet obnoxious to the policy of which that section is a partial expression." Prey v. Stanley, 110 Cal. 423, 42 Pac. 908. But the mere fact that a part of the consideration for the transfer consisted of a covenant which could not be legally enforced does not make the deed absolutely void. A deed made freely, voluntarily, and without fraud by one who is competent passes title, even though the consideration may fail in whole or in part. Whether the consideration failed or became void, so as to afford a basis for rescission, is another question, which does not arise here. If the invalidity of the promise not to convey the property during Isaac's life furnishes a ground for rescission under sections 1689, 3406, and 3407 of the Civil Code (which may well be doubted), such ground has not been alleged, nor such relief sought. Appellants contend that under section 1608 of the Civil Code the entire contract is void if any part of the consideration is unlawful. Whatever may be the effect of this section as to contracts which are executory in whole or in part, we are satisfied that it cannot be construed so as to permit the grantor of property, who has received and retained the consideration for his conveyance, to recover the property conveyed upon the sole ground that the consideration was unlawful in part. It is the general rule that where a contract, based on a consideration contrary to law, immoral, or opposed to public policy, has been fully and voluntarily executed, if the parties are in pari delicto, the courts will not interfere to disturb the acquired rights of either at the instance of the other. 9 Cyc. 549; Hill v. Freeman, 73 Ala. 200, 49 Am. Rep. 48; McGregor v. Donnelly, 67 Cal. 149, 7 Pac. 422; Patterson v. Doner, 48 Cal. 369; St. Louis, etc., R. R. Co. v. Mathers, 71 Ill. 592, 22 Am. Rep. 122; Myers v. Meinrath, 101 Mass. 366, 3 Am. Rep. 368; Brower v. Fass (Neb.) 83 N. W. 832. In view of this rule (in support of which many more cases might be cited), section 1608 must be held to have application only to contracts which are, in part at least, executory.

There are no other points which, in our opinion, require special notice.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

EGRESSY et al. v. STANSBURY et al. (L. A. 1,873.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 2, 1906.)

1. Appeal — Briefs — Filing — Time — Dismissal.

Where the time for filing appellant's points and authorities expired prior to April 18, 1906, and no points and authorities were filed up to May 7th, on which date a motion to dismiss the appeal was filed, the motion must be granted.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 3108–3110.]

2. Same — Holidays — Effect.

The act of the Governor in proclaiming legal holidays, beginning with April 19, 1906, was inapplicable to the right of an appellant to file his points and authorities on an appeal, the time for the filing of which had expired before any holidays were proclaimed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County.

Action by S. Egressy and another against Charles Stansbury and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. On motion to dismiss appeal. Granted.

Cole & Cole for appellants. L. M. Fail, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The motion of respondent to dismiss the appeal in the above-entitled cause is granted. The time for the filing of the appellant's points and authorities expired long before the 18th day of April, 1906. No points and authorities had been filed up to the 7th day of May last, and on that day the motion to dismiss the appeal was filed in this court. The act of the Governor in proclaiming legal holidays, beginning with the 19th of April last, could have no effect whatever upon the right of the appellant to file his points and authorities in a case such as this, where his time had expired before any holidays were proclaimed.

WEMPLE v. YOSEMITE GOLD MIN. CO. et al. (Civ. 180.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 9, 1906.)

1. Mines and Minerals—Mortgages—Mining Claims—Description.

When a mortgage on a mining claim was executed the mortgagor held a deed for an undivided interest in the "Slap Jack Mine," and also a deed of a mine known as the "Jim Blaine Mine," located by W., the boundaries of which coincided with the "Slap Jack Mine." The mortgage described the property as the "Jim Blaine Mining Claim," being the property located by W. on January 1, 1899, of record, etc., together with all mining property described in the deed of conveyance made by B. to the mortgagor, of record, etc. It was thereafter determined that the location of the "Jim Blaine Mine" by W. was ineffectual, and that B.'s deed to the mortgagor conveyed nothing. Held, that the description was sufficient to pass the interest acquired by the mortgagor in the "Slap Jack Mine."

2. Mortgages—Parties—Junior Lienors.

Code Civ. Proc. § 726, provides that no person holding a conveyance from or under the mortgagor of the property mortgaged or having a lien thereon, which conveyance or lien does not appear of record at the time of the commencement of the foreclosure proceedings need be made a party to the action, etc. Held that, where a junior mortgagee, whose mortgage appeared of record before the commencement of a suit to foreclose the senior mortgage, was not made a party to such suit, the rights of the junior mortgagee and his assignee were unaffected by the foreclosure decree.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 35, Cent. Dig. Mortgages, § 1692.]

3. Same—Redemption.

Where the holder of a junior mortgage was not made a party to a suit to foreclose a senior mortgage, the holder of such junior mortgage was only entitled to redeem as against the senior mortgage so foreclosed.

4. Same—Redemption—Effect.

Where the holder of a junior mortgage on certain mining property was not made a party to a suit to foreclose a senior mortgage, and the property was redeemed by the successors in interest of the mortgagors, such redemption operated as a payment of the senior mortgage debt, and the senior mortgage would not, therefore, be kept alive in equity for the benefit of the redemptioners as against the holders of the junior mortgage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by E. H. Wemple against Yosemite Gold Mining Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. A. Blanchard, for appellant Gold Min. Co. J. P. O'Brien and Crittenden Hampton, for appellant Britton. W. C. Kennedy, F. W. Street, and W. M. Beggs, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Foreclosure of mortgage. Plaintiff had judgment from which, and from the order denying their motion for a new trial, all the defendants, except the Yosemite Gold Mining Company, appeal. After the complaint was filed, the Yosemite Gold Mining & Milling Company was made a party defendant as the grantee of the Yosemite Gold Mining Company. The Yosemite Gold Mining Company (hereinafter referred to as defendant company) executed its mortgage to one Joseph Marsden, plaintiff's assignor, on October 25, 1899, which was, on October 27, 1899, duly recorded in the office of the county recorder of Tuolumne county. The land mortgaged embraced several mining claims, and among them a claim called the "Jim Blaine Mine," also called the "Slap Jack Mine." Defendants other than the defendant company, were alleged to have or to claim some interest in the premises. They disavowed any interest in any of the claims, except the "Slap Jack Mine," which they averred included the same ground as the "Jim Blaine Mine." As to this mine they averred that their title was superior and adverse to any title of the defendant company, the mortgagor, or of plaintiff; they also averred that plaintiff's said mortgage was without efficacy as a lien upon their said mine; also that a first and prior mortgage upon the "Slap Jack Mine" had been foreclosed and the property sold thereunder, and that whatever title the defendant company, or any person from whom it claimed, ever had, was "lost and merged in the foreclosure of the first and prior mortgage." The court found that a $^9/_{20}$ interest in the "Slap Jack Mine" was incumbered by the mortgage sued upon, and decreed foreclosure thereof accordingly. It is from this part of the judgment that defendants appeal. The so-called "Slap Jack Mine," the mortgaged premises, was located by one Walter J. Coyle on January 1, 1896. An attempt was made to relocate the same ground, as that embraced in the "Slap Jack Mine," under the name of "Jim Blaine Mine," by one McWhirter, on January 1, 1899, but it was found by the court to have been ineffectual, the ground not then being open to location by any one, and this finding is not challenged. By deed dated August 6, 1896, Coyle conveyed an undivided one-fourth of this mine, each, to Harry Argall, F. L. Argall, B. Griswold and F. L. Emerson. By deed, dated August 6, 1896, the Argalls conveyed to Jacob Miller an undivided $^1/_{20}$ interest in the mine. The title then stood $^9/_{40}$ in each of the Argalls, $^{10}/_{40}$ in defendant Griswold, $^{10}/_{40}$ in defendant F. L. Emerson and $^2/_{40}$ in defendant Miller. The court found that at the commencement of this action there was, and still is, pending a suit to quiet the title of the defendants, the Emersons, Britton, and Miller as plaintiffs against the Argalls, Yosemite Gold Mining Company and Yosemite Gold Mining & Milling Company, and that the action was at the time of the present trial on appeal to the Supreme Court, and undecided. On June 23, 1897, the Argalls, Griswold and said F. L. Emerson (Miller not joining) mortgaged their interest (being $^{19}/_{20}$) to secure a promissory note for $1,600 executed to said Joseph Marsden, who, on October 25, 1899, assigned the note and mortgage to one H. A. Blanchard. As certain rights are now claimed by appellants to have arisen out of this mortgage, by reason of its antedating the mortgage in suit, it becomes necessary to trace its history. Blanchard brought suit to foreclose on November 5, 1899, making the mortgagors parties defendant, and also E. L. Emerson, Jacob Miller, F. F. Britton, and A. L. Emerson, alleging that the last four named defendants claimed some interest in the mine. The Argalls, E. L. Emerson, and Miller, not answering, their default was duly entered. The other defendants answered. Neither Marsden, mortgagor of the mortgage in the present suit, nor his assignee, Wemple, was made a party defendant to the Blanchard foreclosure suit, although the mortgage now in suit was of record when the Blanchard foreclosure suit was commenced. In this latter action, decree of foreclosure was duly entered February 23, 1900, and sale by commissioner, H. A. Hardinge, of $^{19}/_{20}$ interest in the mine was ordered and afterwards made to Peter Berg on March 31, 1900, and certificate of sale was issued to him. Within 12 months, certain defendants in that action, namely E. L. Emerson, F. F. Britton, and A. L. Emerson, successor in interest of said judgment debtors, tendered to Peter Berg and also to Commissioner Hardinge the money necessary to redeem from the foreclosure sale, and demanded the assignment of the certificate of purchase, but were refused. Thereafter, to wit, on March 27, 1901, these same three defendants commenced an action to enforce redemption, claiming to own $^{19}/_{20}$ interest in said mine as successors of the Argalls, Griswold, and F. L. Emerson, as judgment debtors in the Blanchard foreclosure action. The defendants in the redemption suit answered, denying most of the allegations in the complaint set forth, and specifically denying that plaintiffs were, at the commencement of the suit, or ever were, the owners or interested in the property in question. Defendants subsequently filed an offer to allow said Britton, E. L. and A. L. Emerson to redeem said mine upon payment of a certain stated amount. E. L. was the husband of Mrs. A. L. Emerson. This offer was accepted and, by consent, judgment for the redemption was entered in favor of Britton, Emerson, and Emerson and they received the certificate of sale and on September 7, 1901, a judgment was entered adjudging that Britton, Emerson, and Emerson had redeemed said mine, from said foreclosure sale, within the time allowed by law, as successors in interest of the judgment debtors, the Argalls, Griswold, and F. L. Emerson, and that the judgment and decree has become final and has been fully satisfied; that on November 6, 1899, when said foreclosure action was commenced by Blanchard, the records of Tuolumne county did not show that the Yosemite Gold Mining Company had, or claimed to have, any interest in or to said mine, and that on that day there was no conveyance of record from the Argalls, Griswold, F. L. Emerson, or Jacob Miller to said last-named mining company. But the court found in the present case, and the evidence was, that the Argalls executed and delivered to the Yosemite Gold Mining Company, on October 2, 1899, a conveyance of $^9/_{20}$ interest in said mine and that the said deed was duly recorded January 12, 1900. This is the source of the interest of the Yosemite Gold Mining Company in the mortgaged premises. The court also found that neither the mortgagee, Marsden, nor his assignee, Wemple, the present plaintiff, of the mortgage made October 25, 1899, now sought to be foreclosed, was made a party to foreclose the Blanchard mortgage and neither of them appeared in that action, and neither of them was a party to, or appeared in the action to redeem from the judgment in the Blanchard foreclosure. The court found that neither E. L. Emerson nor F. L. Emerson had any interest in the premises at the commencement of this action. It appeared also that Peter Berg conveyed to defendant, Yosemite Gold Mining Company, the "Jim Blaine," or "Slap Jack Mine," on June 1, 1899, recorded October 13, 1899.

The court found as conclusions of law: That the undivided $^9/_{20}$ interest of the "Slap Jack" mining claim is subject to plaintiff's mortgage; that the claims of the Yosemite Gold Mining Company, and the Yosemite Gold Mining & Milling Company are, and each of them is, subsequent to the claim of plaintiff and his said mortgage; that the undivided $^{11}/_{20}$ interest of said mine is owned by defendants, Mrs. A. L. Emerson, F. F. Britton, and Jacob Miller, and is not subject to said mortgage.

Appellants contend that the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision that $^9/_{20}$ interest in the "Slap Jack Mine" was subject to the mortgage sued upon, because: First, the "Slap Jack Mine" was not described in the mortgage with sufficient definiteness; second, the title of appellants is superior to the mortgagor's title; third, whatever interest or equity of redemption the Yosemite Gold Mining Company, mortgagor of the mortgage sued upon, ever had in the mine in question, was foreclosed by the proceedings had in the foreclosure of the first, or Marsden mortgage, by Blanchard; fourth, there is a still further claim made by appellants: Considering that plaintiff's mortgage created a lien on the Argall interest, equity will keep alive the Blanchard mortgage as a protection to the redemptioners from the Blanchard foreclosure.

1. The description of the controverted premises stated in the mortgage of defendant company was as follows: "The Jim Blaine Mining Claim, being the same property located by R. S. McWhirter on January 1, 1899, of Record in Book 10, p. 271, Quartz Claims, Tuolumne County Records." Then follows the description of several other mining claims, at the close of which the mortgage continues: "All of said mines and mining property being the same described in that deed of conveyance made by Peter Berg to the Yosemite Gold Mining Company on June 1, 1899, of Record in Book A of deeds, vol. 41, p. 521, recorded on October 3, 1899, Tuolomne County Records." It is urged that because the location of the "Jim Blaine Mine" by McWhirter was ineffectual for any purpose, as found by the court, and because the deed of Peter Berg conveyed nothing, he having no interest to convey, the mortgage failed to describe or refer to the "Slap Jack Mine" and hence mortgaged no part of that mine. It is not disputed that the two designations referred to the same ground; it was so alleged by defendants and it so appeared from the testimony of defendants and was so understood by all parties. We do not think the mortgage was intended to embrace only such interest as the mortgagor acquired through the Berg deed or through the McWhirter location. When the mortgage was executed the defendant company held the deed of the Argalls to the "Slap Jack Mine" thus described. It seems to us that the description used in the mortgage was intended to identify the property mortgaged by reference to documents which referred to the same property as was referred to in the Argall deed. As the "Jim Blaine Mine" embraced precisely the same ground, we think there can be no mistaking the intention of the mortgage to include this ground. The purpose of the description of property mortgaged or deeded is to identify the property, and is not to indicate the source of the title. The property in a deed or mortgage may be sufficiently described by appropriate reference to any duly recorded document or public record containing the required description and proof of the description is complete by the introduction, in evidence of such document or record.

2. It is contended that the title of appellants is superior, paramount, and adverse to the title mortgaged, and hence cannot be litigated in this action. The point is grounded upon the alleged fact that appellants are the owners of the "Slap Jack Mine" through the locator Coyle, while the mortgagor, the defendant company, claims the "Jim Blaine Mine" through McWhirter. We do not so understand the evidence. The McWhirter location was void. Defendant company claims through the Argalls, whose source of title in the Coyle location is the same as that of appellants. The real controversy in the case is as to the relative rights of the parties arising out of the Blanchard mortgage foreclosure and the Wemple, or plaintiff's mortgage foreclosure. The court decreed that certain defendants, Britton, Mrs. A. L. Emerson, and Miller, were the owners of $^{11}/_{20}$ of the mine in question (about which there is no controversy); and that the remaining $^{9}/_{20}$ interest therein was subject to plaintiff's mortgage, being the interest of the Argalls which they had conveyed to the defendant company.

3. The vital question in the case is thus stated by appellants: That whatever interest or equity of redemption the defendant company, the mortgagor, or the respondent, ever had in the "Slap Jack Mine," was foreclosed and lost by the decree, sale and proceedings had in the foreclosure of the Blanchard, or first mortgage. The point made that the mortgage of defendant company did not sufficiently describe the mine, has been already disposed of. The second reason given by appellants in support of their contention raises the question, namely, that whatever title the defendant company had was foreclosed and lost by the foreclosure of the first or Blanchard mortgage. The evidence is undisputed that the Blanchard mortgage was prior in date and recordation to plaintiff's mortgage. But when the Blanchard foreclosure suit was commenced (November 6, 1899), the second or plaintiff's mortgage was of record (October 29, 1899), and defendant company, the mortgagor, held a deed from the Argalls, executed and delivered October 2, 1899, a month before the Blanchard foreclosure suit was commenced; it was, however, not recorded until January 12, 1900. Blanchard was charged with constructive notice of plaintiff's mortgage, but he failed to make either plaintiff or his assignor a party to his foreclosure. Section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure refers to persons having a lien on the mortgaged premises as well as a conveyance thereof. The result of this failure was to leave the junior mortgage and the rights of the junior mortgagee and his assignee unaffected. Carpentier v. Brenham, 40 Cal. 234; Henderson v. Grammar, 66 Cal. 332, 5 Pac. 488; Savings Bank v. Central Market, 132 Cal. 36, 54 Pac. 273; Hibernia Savings Bank v. London & L. Ins. Co., 138 Cal. 260, 71 Pac. 334; Frates v. Sears, 144 Cal. 246, 77 Pac. 905. Whatever interest the junior mortgagee had in the mortgaged premises, by virtue of his mortgage, as against the senior mortgage, his right was the right of redemption, and it could not be taken from him by foreclosure of the senior mortgage, except by making him a party to that action. Id. The senior mortgage originally impressed a lien on $^{19}/_{20}$ of the property—the entire interest except Miller's. The court found that of these $^{19}/_{20}$ the junior mortgage impressed a lien upon $^{9}/_{20}$ discharged from any lien of the senior mortgage, presumably because title thereto vested in the junior mortgagor, defendant company, by virtue of the deed from the Argalls to the defendant company, the deed inuring to the benefit of the mortgagee; or, in other words, the deed feeding the mortgage. In support of the view of the court, it is also contended by respondent that the turn which the foreclosure proceedings took in foreclosing the senior mortgage was such as to wipe out that mortgage, at least as to the Argall interest, and leave the property subject alone to plaintiff's lien. Indeed, unless by some means the lien of the Blanchard mortgage was lifted from the Argalls' $^{9}/_{20}$ interest, included in the senior mortgage, the Argalls could only convey their interest subject to the Blanchard mortgage. The argument of respondent upon the point that the Blanchard mortgage lien was discharged by the redemption, effected by the successors of the mortgagors' interest in the property, rests upon the following principles: That the exercise of the right of redemption confers no new rights and affects only the interest which the redemptioner was entitled to redeem; when redemption is made by the execution debtor, or his assigns, grantees, or successors in interest, the effect is merely to terminate the same and restore the property to its original condition. 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, pp. 639, 640. That the judgment and receipt of redemption in money discharges the judgment of foreclosure, sets aside all the proceedings thereunder and places the parties in the same position they were in before the suit was brought, except that the debt is paid. Citing Hocker v. Reas, 18 Cal. 650; Perkins v. Center, 35 Cal. 713; Eldridge v. Wright, 55 Cal. 531; also Stoddard v. Forbes, 13 Iowa, 296; Woodward v. Cowdery, 41 Vt. 496.

We do not understand that appellants controvert these principles, but they claim that appellants having redeemed the property from the Blanchard foreclosure, as successors in interest of the judgment debtors, they are in equity subrogated to all the rights and liens of the mortgagee in that action, and as between them and all prior lien holders, equity will preserve to them the lien of the prior mortgage. In Matzen v. Schaeffer, 65 Cal., at page 82, 3 Pac. 93, the principle is approved as laid down by Mr. Pomeroy in his Equity Jurisprudence, vol. 3, § 1212: "When any person having a subsequent interest in the premises, and who is therefore entitled to redeem, for the purpose of protecting his interest, and who is not the debtor primarily and absolutely liable for the mortgaged debt, pays off the mortgage, he thereby becomes an equitable assignee thereof, and may keep alive and enforce the lien so far as may be necessary in equity for his own benefit. He is subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee to the extent necessary for his own equitable protection." And the court held further that this equitable result follows, though a receipt was given speaking of the mortgaged debt as having been fully paid, and sometimes even though the mortgage itself was actually discharged and satisfied of record. In Schaeffer v. McClosky, 101 Cal. 576, 36 Pac. 196, it was held that one who is forced to pay the debt of another, in order to protect his own interest, and who is not a mere volunteer or intermeddler, is in equity to be subrogated to the debt. See Hines v. Ward, 121 Cal. 115, 53 Pac. 427. In Darrough v. Herbert Kraft Company Bank, 125 Cal. 272, 57 Pac. 983, the court held that where the owner of the mortgaged premises paid off a senior lien thereon without actual knowledge of the junior lien, the latter shall derive no advantage over the senior lien; and that it will be presumed that such owner made the payment for his own benefit, and not for the benefit of the junior lien holder, and for the protection of his interests, equity will treat such owner as the assignee of the original senior lien holder, and will revive and enforce such senior lien for his benefit.

Respondent does not seriously controvert these principles, but he contends, among other things, that appellants, for various reasons, have not, by their pleadings, shown that they are entitled to invoke these rules. Conceding the sufficiency of the pleadings, it seems to us that, in claiming to be the successors in interest of the Argalls, the only interest in controversy, appellants have failed to show a superior equity to the rights claimed by plaintiff. It appears that the Argalls conveyed their interest to defendant company May 31, 1899; that defendant company mortgaged the property October 25, 1899, and that the deed of the Argalls was recorded January 12, 1900. Appellants do not allege or show by evidence the date of their conveyance by which they became successors in interest of the Argalls and the other makers of the Blanchard mortgage. Claiming, as they did, that their right was superior to that of the plaintiff, the burden was on them to prove it. Plaintiff did not know, and could not know, the source of defendants' title or interest. The evidence is that Blanchard filed his complaint to foreclose on November 5, 1899; decree of foreclosure and sale was entered February 23, 1900; the commissioner made sale March 31, 1900; the complaint for redemption was filed June 24, 1901. There was an answer to the complaint denying most of its allegations. Findings of fact were waived and by consent a decree was entered adjudging that "plaintiffs herein redeemed the premises * * * as successors in interest of the judgment debtors in the action aforesaid." In their answer to plaintiff's complaint in the present action, appellants allege that "at the time of the commencement of this action, they were, ever since have been, and now are the owners of that certain quartz mine," etc. They, therefore, make no claim to ownership prior to the commencement of this action, which was July 24, 1902, and the earliest date any interest is shown in them is June 24, 1901. It would thus appear, and the trial court might well have inferred, that appellants in the present action—F. F. Britton and Mrs. A. L. Emerson, became successors of the interests conveyed to them, including the Argall interest, long after the Argalls had conveyed to the defendant company and long after their conveyance was recorded and had inured to the benefit of the mortgagee of defendant company. When, therefore, appellants assumed to redeem as the successor in interest of the Argalls, they had constructive notice that the Argalls had already conveyed their interest to defendant company and that defendant company had mortgaged that interest to plaintiff's assignor. So far as appears they may also have had actual notice of the deed, and Mrs. Emerson, so far as appears, may also have had actual notice of the mortgage. Appellant Britton testified that he "did not know anything about this particular mortgage in controversy," but he said nothing about the deed. There is no fraud or bad faith alleged or shown in the conveyance by the Argalls to defendant company; there is neither allegation nor proof of mistake by appellants or that they were misled in any way in becoming successors in interest of the judgment debtors in the Blanchard foreclosure. As to $^{11}/_{20}$ interest in the property, they secured title which the court by its decree recognized and protected by declaring it to be subject to the senior mortgage and by refusing to subject it to plaintiff's lien. As to $^{9}/_{20}$, the Argall interest, the court held it subject to plaintiff's mortgage lien, and in effect held that by redeeming from the senior mortgage sale, and paying off the judgment debt, appellants thereby discharged the lien of that mortgage upon the Argall interest. We are unable to discover any equitable principle upon which the senior mortgage should be kept alive for the benefit of appellants or which would enable them to enforce a lien upon the Argall interest under the facts disclosed. We are quite convinced that the equitable principles invoked by appellants cannot be made to serve such object. It is perhaps proper to add that the case of Frates v. Sears, 144 Cal. 246, 77 Pac. 905, relied upon by respondent, does not entirely meet the situation here, and it is not necessary to resort to the rule there established. In that case when the junior mortgagee, who had not been made a party to the foreclosure of the senior mortgage, brought his action to foreclose and made the senior mortgagee a party (who was the purchaser at his foreclosure sale), the latter failed in enforcing his prior lien because, when he answered, his mortgage debt had become barred by the statute of limitations. In the present case the senior mortgage was not barred when the answer was filed. The reasoning may go further, but the point decided in Frates v. Sears was that the lien of the senior mortgage is lost, if, when he asserts it against the foreclosure of the junior mortgage, his mortgage debt is barred.

Respondent also relies upon the point that as soon as the Argall deed was delivered to the defendant company it commenced to feed the mortgage of plaintiff, although not recorded until later, and that the neglect of defendant company to record this deed cannot affect the rights of plaintiff. Numerous authorities are cited in support of the proposition. We neither affirm nor deny its soundness, in this particular case, but prefer to rest the decision upon the ground above stated.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

LOGAN v. McMULLEN.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 23, 1906.)

1. Brokers—Employment—Memorandum.

A letter, written to a broker advising him that if he could purchase certain described real estate the signer thought he would be ready to purchase the same on the succeeding Monday, at a specified price, was not a sufficient note or memorandum of a contract to employ the broker to purchase the property required by Civil Code, § 1624.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Brokers, § 44.]

2. Same—Performance of Service.

Where a broker was employed to purchase certain real estate for his customer, his contract was not performed unless he procured an enforceable contract from the owners to make the sale or brought the parties together so that his employer would have an opportunity to secure such contract.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Brokers, § 65.]

3. Same.

A broker for the purchaser of real estate cannot call upon his employer to come to the place of business of the vendor, and there make the contract, or negotiate for its terms.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Brokers, §§ 69, 75–81.]

4. Trial—Offer of Evidence—Rejection.

An offer of evidence which, taken in its entirety, fails to show a cause of action, is properly rejected.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; S. P. Hall, Judge.

Action by Walter E. Logan against J. C. McMullen. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. S. Farquar, for appellant. Dudley Kinsell, for respondent.

HARRISON, P. J. Action to recover for services as broker for the purchase of certain real estate. A judgment of nonsuit was rendered against the plaintiff, and he has appealed therefrom. At the trial, after testifying that he was a real estate broker, and that he had had several interviews with the defendant regarding the property referred to in the complaint, the plaintiff offered in evidence the following instrument as a note or memorandum in writing requisite under section 1624, Civ. Code, for his recovery, viz.: "Oakland, Cal., July 31, '03. Walter E. Logan: Sir—If you can purchase N. W. corner of 13th and Franklin streets 75x100 for $42,000 I think we would be ready to purchase same by Monday next. J. C. McMullen;" and in connection therewith offered to prove that, acting under it, he went to San Francisco on Friday, July 31st, and had an interview with the owners of the property, and showed them this instrument, and got from them "an offer" that they would accept $42,000; that the proposition was made that it was to be "arranged" on Monday; that a few minutes before noon on the next day, Saturday, the defendant stated to him that he would go with him to San Francisco on the next outgoing narrow gauge train, to which he replied that he could not go on that train but would go on the next broad gauge train and would meet him at the owner's office; that he went over, and remained there for three hours, but the defendant did not make his appearance; that thereafter the defendant met him and stated that he recognized that he had rendered services in the matter, and that he would be compensated therefor. The defendant objected to the introduction of the instrument on the ground that it is incompetent and irrelevant; that it does not comply with the requirements of section 1624, Civ. Code; that it does not purport to employ or authorize the plaintiff to purchase the real estate for the defendant or to act as his broker. The court sustained the objections, to which ruling the plaintiff excepted; and the plaintiff, admitting that there was no other writing or authorization of employment, and offering no other evidence, the defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that the evidence did not sustain any of the allegations of the complaint. The court granted the motion, to which the plaintiff excepted.

The court properly sustained the objections of the defendant to the above instrument. It does not purport to be an employment of the plaintiff as a broker or agent for the purchase of the real estate, but is rather to be construed as merely a proposition to him to ascertain whether it could be purchased at the designated price; but whatever construction is to be given to its terms, inasmuch as the plaintiff did not purchase the property or obtain from the owners an agreement for its sale which could be enforced by the defendant, the latter did not become liable to him for any services as broker or agent in the matter. If the plaintiff would assume that, by virtue of the instrument, he was authorized to act as broker for the defendant for the purpose of effecting a purchase of the property for him, and would claim compensation for his services, it was his duty to procure from the owners and deliver to the defendant a valid contract for its sale which could be enforced by the defendant; or, if he should obtain from the owners a verbal agreement to make the sale, and bring the owners and the defendant together, so that the latter would have an opportunity to secure such contract. Zeimer v. Antisell, 75 Cal. 509, 17 Pac. 642; Waterman v. Boltinghouse, 82 Cal. 659, 23 Pac. 195; Gunn v. Bank of California, 99 Cal. 350, 33 Pac. 1105; Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 516, 39 Pac. 200, 45 Am. St. Rep. 87. The conditions under which a broker for the purchase or sale of real estate is entitled to commissions are stated in the case last cited as follows: "In order to entitle a broker under such a contract to recover commissions where no sale has actually been consummated, it is incumbent upon him to prove that he found a purchaser ready, willing, and able to buy the property on the terms fixed; and either that he procured from that person a valid contract binding him to purchase the property upon those terms, or that he brought the vendor and the proposed purchaser together so that the vendor might have secured such contract if he desired. On no other terms can he recover. The readiness and willingness of a person to purchase the property can be shown only by an offer on his part to purchase; and unless he has actually entered into a contract binding him to purchase, or has offered to the vendor and not simply to the broker to enter into such a contract, he cannot be considered a purchaser." The broker must perform all of the services thus required of him before he can claim compensation from his employer. His principal is under no obligation to assist him in their performance or to relieve him from a full compliance with his duty. The broker for the purchaser cannot call upon his principal to go to the place of business of the vendor, and there make the contract or negotiate for its terms. He is employed for the very purpose of relieving his principal from taking any trouble in the matter, and he must either bring to him a perfected contract, or the vendor in person, ready, able, and willing to make the contract. The defendant was under no obligation to hunt up the owners, or go to San Francisco for the purpose of securing a contract, and his failure to do so did not operate to relieve the plaintiff from the necessity of bringing the vendor to Oakland if he did not secure a valid agreement for a sale. The plaintiff did not offer to show the purpose for which the defendant was to go to San Francisco; and as by the terms of the above instrument the defendant was not to be ready for the purchase until the following Monday, and as the plaintiff's proposition to the owners was that the matter was to be "arranged" on Monday, there does not seem to have been any necessary connection between the trip to San Francisco and the purchase of the lot. By declining to accept the defendant's proposition to go by the first narrow guage train, and not receiving from him any acceptance of his own counter proposition to go by the broad gauge train, it does not appear that there was any meeting of their minds or any agreement between them to go to San Francisco. The facts which the plaintiff offered to show in connection with the instrument were insufficient to render the instrument admissible. Inasmuch as he was not entitled to compensation by virtue of the agreement unless he had obtained a contract from the vendors, or brought them and the defendant together, the whole of the evidence offered would be incompetent to establish any cause of action against the defendant. An offer of evidence which, taken in its entirety, fails to show a cause of action, is properly rejected by the court. "The offer must be complete in itself, and must not omit facts without which the facts offered are not relevant." Chamberlain v. Vance, 57 Cal. 75. As the instrument in writing was excluded there was no evidence before the court in support of the allegations of the complaint, and the court had no alternative but to grant the nonsuit.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEPPER v. NEIMAN.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 6, 1906. Rehearing Denied Aug. 30, 1906.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — STREET IMPROVEMENT — RESOLUTION OF INTENTION — CONSTRUCTION.

A resolution of intention to make a street improvement, which, in its title, declares the intention of the municipal authorities to improve a portion of a street, and which states in its body that it is the intention to construct a cement curb along each line of the roadway of the street between designated points, except along such portions of the line of the roadway on which a cement or granite curb has already been constructed, etc., does not provide for two distinct lines of work, one along each boundary of the roadway, but describes the improvement of the street between the points specified.

2. SAME—POSTING NOTICE — STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

St. 1891, p. 196, c. 147, § 3, providing that a notice of a contemplated street improvement shall be posted along the line thereof at not more than 100 feet in distance apart, requires notices not more than 100 feet apart longitudinally along the line of the improvement, and notices posted on either side of a street intended to be improved are notices posted on the line, so that if such notices are not more than 100 feet apart, measuring the distance along the center of the improvement, the statute is complied with, and diagonal measurements are not to be considered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Enoch Pepper against F. Neiman. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Bicknell, Gibson, Trask, Dunn & Crutcher, and S. M. Haskins, for appellant. Enoch Pepper, in pro. per. and H. S. Rollins, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a suit to quiet plaintiff's title to three lots in the city of Los Angeles fronting on Flower street. The defendant in his answer claims a lien upon each lot—upon two for the sum of $75.29 each, and upon the other for the sum of $80.61—under a street assessment for the cost of the improvement of a portion of Flower street. The answer sets up seriatim all the proceedings required by the street improvement act; and, in a cross-complaint repeating these allegations, the defendant seeks to foreclose his liens. It is stipulated and found by the court that all the proceedings for the improvement of the street and assessment of the lots were regular, except the posting of the notices of the contemplated work or improvement on the ground, as to which it is stipulated and found: That the length of the portion of the street improved is 4,583 feet, and the width of the street between curb lines 56 feet; that the number of notices posted was 52 in all; and, that they were posted alternately on the east and west sides of the street. It appears, therefore, from the stipulation and findings that the distance between the notices, measured diagonally across the street, is something over 100 feet, though less if measured longitudinally with the street, and on this ground the court held the assessment to be void.

The resolution of intention in the present case is entitled: "An ordinance of the mayor and council of the city of Los Angeles, declaring their intention to improve a portion of Flower street, and determining that bonds shall be issued to represent the cost thereof." In the first section it is provided: "That it is the intention of the city council of the city of Los Angeles to order the following work to be done, to wit: "(1) That a cement curb be constructed along each line of the roadway of said Flower street from the southerly curb line of Sixth street to the northerly curb line of Pico street (excepting along such portions of the line of said roadway upon which a cement or granite curb has already been constructed to the official line and grade)," etc. "(2) That a cement sidewalk six feet in width be constructed along each side of said Flower street," etc. "(3) That a cement gutter be constructed along each side of said Flower street," etc.

It is contended by the appellant that the work described in the ordinance of intention is the improvement of Flower street between the points specified, and by the respondent that there were two distinct lines of work provided for, one along each boundary of the roadway. Assuming the latter to be the case, it would follow that the distances between the notices along the line of each improvement would be much in excess of 100 feet. But we do not think that the ordinance can be so construed. As expressed in the title, the intention was to improve a part of Flower street, and in the first section of the ordinance "the line of said roadway" is referred to. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the case is the same in this respect as was the case in Dowling v. Hibernia Sav. & L. Society, 143 Cal. 425, 77 Pac. 141, where the roadway was included in the improvement proposed.

The fact remains, however, that the distance between the notices, measured diagonally across the road, was over 100 feet; and the question thus arises, whether this was a sufficient compliance with section 3 of the street improvement act, which provides that the notices shall be "posted along the line of said contemplated work or improvement at not more than one hundred feet in distance apart." St. 1891, p. 196, c. 147. The question is not without difficulty; but, on the whole, we are of the opinion that the section requires notices not more than 100 feet longitudinally along the line of the improvement; that the entire street is the line referred to; that notices posted on either side are notices posted on the line, and if such notices are not more than 100 feet apart, measuring the distance along the center of the improvement, the section is complied with, it matters not upon which side of such center line the notices are actually posted; and that the diagonal measurements are not to be considered.

It is ordered that the judgment be reversed.

DORRIS et al. v. McMANNUS et al. (Civ. 212.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 20, 1906.)

QUIETING TITLE—EVIDENCE.

Defendants in an action to quiet title, having pleaded such claim as they had, and introduced no evidence in support thereof, findings that it was without right and adverse to plaintiffs are authorized without any evidence by plaintiffs other than to show their title.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 41, Cent. Dig. Quieting Title, § 89.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; N. D. Arnot, Judge.

Action by P. S. Dorris and another against Laura J. McMannus and others. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants Laura J. McMannus and another appeal. Affirmed.

Chas. W. Slack and John W. Bourdette, for appellants. G. F. Harris, Gillis & Tapscott, and Jaimeson & Adams, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action to quiet title. Plaintiffs had judgment, from which and from the order denying their motion for a new trial defendants Laura McMannus and Martha S. McConnell appeal.

There are numerous defendants, none of whom appeal, except the defendants Laura McMannus, Martha McConnell, and Charles Bohnert; the latter of whom appealed on separate transcript (No. 207, Sac. No. 1,339). We affirmed the judgment and order in that appeal on May 15, 1906. (Cal. App.) 86 Pac. 909. The present appeal is presented by different counsel, who urge points not made in the Bohnert appeal, and, for this reason alone, we again examine the case. The complaint is unverified, and contains the usual averments that defendants claim an estate or interest in the lands adverse to plaintiffs, and that such claim is without right. Plaintiffs further aver "that by means of the false representations and pretenses aforesaid of the said defendants, and each and every of them, the plaintiffs, and each of them, are greatly embarrassed in the free enjoyment, use and disposition of their said described lands," and that plaintiffs' interest in said lands is "greatly depreciated by reason of the probability of title in the said defendants, or some of them, resulting from and growing out of said false and pretended claims of the said defendants." Defendant McMannus answered, denying generally the allegations of the complaint; also averring that, on December 14, 1900, this defendant commenced an action against Presley A. Dorris and Carlos J. Dorris, copartners as P. A. Dorris & Bro. (through whom plaintiffs deraign title), upon a promissory note executed by them, which action is now pending; that in the event defendant obtains judgment in said action, she intends to institute suit to set aside the conveyance of the lands described in the complaint, on the ground that when transferred to plaintiff said lands belonged to the said Presley A. and Carlos J. Dorris, and that the said transfers to plaintiffs were procured to be made for the purpose of hindering and delaying the creditors of the said Presley A. and Carlos J. Dorris. Defendant prayed that the action as to her be not tried until the said action upon the said promissory note is tried and determined, and that defendant recover her costs. Defendant McConnell in her answer denied the averments of the complaint specifically, except that she did not deny that she claimed some interest in the property adverse to plaintiffs. She alleged a similar defense to that set up by defendant McMannus, as a creditor of P. A. and C. J. Dorris; she denied that her claim or interest was without right, but neither she nor defendant McMannus specifically alleged or claimed any interest in the land, and neither of them set forth any title or claim otherwise than such as might arise, should they become judgment creditors of P. A. and C. J. Dorris, partners, as P. A. Dorris & Bro. The court found that since June 29, 1900, plaintiffs have been and now are the owners of the title in fee simple of the land in question; "that the said defendants and each of them, claim an estate therein, adverse to plaintiffs," but that such claim is without right. The court then finds the facts specifically negativing the allegations of fraud in the transfer to plaintiffs, and also, by way of deraignment of plaintiffs' title, tracing it through one Jerome Churchill, who for many years prior to June 29, 1900, had loaned the said firm of the Dorrises large sums of money, and had held deeds to the said land and other property belonging to the said Dorrises as security therefor; that the said firm was unable to pay this large indebtedness, and on the date last named the said Churchill and the members of said firm had a full settlement by which it was agreed that the title should remain in said Churchill to all said property in consideration of the said Churchill fully discharging all claims against said firm, and that thereupon on said date said members of said firm released and quitclaimed all their interest in said property to said Churchill; that the said Churchill paid full consideration "and more than said property was worth;" that the said transfer was not fraudulent, nor for the purpose of delaying creditors of said firm, but was made "in good faith for a good and valid and ample consideration." The court also found that on the date of the transfer of said lands to plaintiffs, to wit, on June 29, 1900, neither P. A. nor C. J. Dorris, nor the said copartnership, "had any right, title, interest, or estate, either legal or equitable, in said real estate, * * * but that * * * the whole thereof, both legal and equitable, belonged to and was vested in fee in the said Jerome Churchill;" that "by the false and pretended claims of defendants [naming all of them] * * * plaintiffs * * * are greatly embarrassed in the free enjoyment, use, and disposition of their said real estate," and are thereby rendered unable to sell or dispose of the same except at greatly depreciated values and at great loss to plaintiffs.

1. Appellants contend that the allegation of the complaint as to defendants' claim of interest in the land adverse to that of plaintiffs was essential in this form of action—citing Lawrence v. Getchel (Cal.) 4 Pac. 544, and cases from other jurisdictions; and that the allegation having been denied, it was incumbent on plaintiffs to prove it—citing Pennie v. Hildreth, 81 Cal. 127, 22 Pac. 389; Adams v. Crawford, 116 Cal. 495, 48 Pac. 488; United Land Ass'n v. P. I. Co., 139 Cal. 370, 69 Pac. 1064, 72 Pac. 988. Also the allegation that the claim of defendants is without right being denied, it also must be proved by plaintiffs—citing Tompkins v. Sprout, 55 Cal. 31. The findings in favor of plaintiffs upon these allegations are challenged as unsupported by any evidence, and that, therefore, the judgment and order should be reversed. Defendant McConnell, by her special denials, failed to deny that she claimed some interest in the land adverse to plaintiffs, but defendant McMannus, by her general denial, raises the question. If defendants' denials are to be treated as general to the unverified complaint, they merely put in issue the title to the land. Pennie v. Hildreth; Adams v. Crawford, supra. We think, however, that these defendants (appellants) have pleaded such claim as they had, shadowy though it in fact was (see Bohnert's Appeal), and on which they offered no proof whatever. They alleged fraud in the conveyance to plaintiffs, and set up a right to have the action suspended until they could have their claim against the Dorrises, through whom plaintiffs deraign title, ripen into judgment, to be followed by an action to set aside plaintiffs' conveyance. Without a judgment they were in no position to attack the deed for fraud (Aigeltinger v. Einstein, 143 Cal. 609, 77 Pac. 669); but they refused to disclaim any right or interest, and asserted all the title or right they had, as called upon by plaintiffs to do, and, though unavailing, conjectural, and uncertain, it was yet an assertion of a claim of right in the land. The failure of defendants to submit any evidence in support of their claim left the court free to find that it was without right, and also to find that such as it was it was adverse to plaintiffs, and this without aid from plaintiffs' evidence. But plaintiffs, unnecessarily we think, in view of defendants' failure to submit any evidence, did, however, submit evidence touching the issue of fraud tendered by defendants, and fully established the entire good faith of the transactions culminating in plaintiffs' title, free from any taint of fraud. In commenting upon sections 738 and 739 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it was held in Bulwer M. Co. v. Standard M. Co., 83 Cal. 589, 23 Pac. 1102, that the purpose of averring an adverse claim is to notify defendant of the nature of the action, and requiring him to set forth and litigate any adverse title he may claim to have or to disclaim having such title either expressly or by default; that "the only material issues tendered by a complaint in this class of cases relates to the title of the real property described in the complaint; therefore there was no necessity for a finding upon the formal but immaterial issue, as to whether the defendant had asserted an adverse title before the commencement of the action." It was said further: "The object of sections 738 and 739 is to enable the plaintiff, in such action, to dispel whatever may be regarded by third persons, as well as by defendant, as a cloud upon his title; for even though the defendant makes no adverse claim, third persons may regard plaintiffs' title as being subject to an adverse claim by the defendant, which would be a cloud upon plaintiffs' title, depreciating its value, and which he would be entitled to have removed by the decree of the court." Appellants contend that this is not the law, and that the expressions of the court were not necessary to the decision and were but dicta, and were used in a case where the defendant had disclaimed any estate or interest. It seems to us that the "material issues" in this class of cases "relate to the title of the real property described in the complaint" and nothing else. When the title is found to be in the plaintiff, and no title or interest is shown in defendant, it necessarily follows that the claim of the defendant is without right, whether adverse or not. If the defendant makes default the court may find the allegations of the complaint to be true; why not also when the defendant answers but fails to support it by evidence? How can plaintiff know the nature of defendant's claim unless it is pleaded, and would it not be unreasonable to hold to a rule requiring him to show that a claim of which he has no knowledge is without right, except by showing his own right? If defendant's claim be pleaded, the burden is then upon defendant to establish it, failing in which, the findings must be against defendant. Crook v. Forsyth, 30 Cal. 662; Stoddard v. Burge, 53 Cal. 394. This seems to us both reasonable and logical and in conformity with the object of the action, as stated in the case reported in Bulwer M. Co. v. Standard M. Co., supra. However this may be, defendants denied plaintiffs' title, and set up their adverse interest. The issues usual in such cases were thus formed, and each party was called upon to make good by evidence his affirmative averments, touching his own title to or interest in the property. Neither party was required to disprove his adversary's case, but could rest upon proof of his own title.

2. Appellants further contend that, because the court found the specific facts showing ownership, and also found generally that plaintiffs were the owners of the property, the general findings became mere conclusions of law, and the specific findings must support the conclusion of ownership, and necessarily the evidence must support the specific facts found, or a reversal must result. Citing Gruwell v. Seyboldt, 82 Cal. 7, 22 Pac. 938; Sav. & Loan Soc. v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514, 39 Pac. 922. Appellants designate eight separate findings, which, it is claimed, fall within the above objection. It would unnecessarily prolong this opinion to state these findings and the evidence found in the record to support them. These findings seem to have had for their main object to deraign the title, untainted by fraud, through Churchill to plaintiffs, and to show the circumstances under which he came into possession and control of the property, the relation to the Dorrises, the title by which he held the property, the equity retained by the Dorrises, and finally that, in consideration of discharging their indebtedness to Churchill, they deeded and released all their interest, legal and equitable, to him; it was found that he conveyed to plaintiffs and that the transactions set forth were free from fraud. The evidence, we think, supports these findings, and, when taken in connection with the complete findings, fully support the general findings of title in plaintiffs. Appellants in their brief say that the court obviously attempted to find that the transfer to plaintiffs was not a fraud upon the creditors of P. A. and C. J. Dorris. We think the court succeeded in its attempt. The alleged apparent contradiction between finding designated 8 in defendants' brief and finding 5 is not real. The agreement and transfer of the Dorrises to Churchill, and them to plaintiffs, occurred on the same day, and when Churchill conveyed to plaintiffs it is true that P. A. and C. J. Dorris no longer had any equitable interest in the property, and long before this date the legal title had vested in Churchill. It may be doubted whether the court was called upon to find the evidence going to prove ownership, having found such ownership in plaintiffs (Daly v. Sorocco, 80 Cal. 367, 22 Pac. 211); but conceding appellants' position that, having done so, the evidence must support the findings, we think this requirement is fully met. In point of fact a perfect and unbroken chain of title, free from fraud, from the government to plaintiffs is shown. Against it is urged purely technical rules of law which, though entitled to recognition, are without merit under the circumstances and facts disclosed.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

4 Cal. App. 50

McGEHEE v. SCHIFFMAN. (Civ. 247.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 5, 1906. Rehearing Denied Aug. 30, 1906.)

1. NEGLIGENCE—PLEADING—COMPLAINT.

In an action for injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence, it is sufficient for the complaint to charge that the act was negligently done, without stating the particular omission which rendered the act negligent, provided it also appears from the facts averred that the negligence caused or contributed to the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Negligence, §§ 174, 175, 182.]

2. SAME—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Plaintiff alleged that defendant extracted seven of her teeth and removed all of them from her mouth except one, which, by defendant's carelessness, negligence, and unskillfulness, was permitted to drop and pass into plaintiff's right lung, without any fault or negligence on plaintiff's part. Held, that the complaint was not demurrable for failure to show that defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, because it was necessary that plaintiff should have used the muscles of her throat in order that the tooth could have gotten into her trachea.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Negligence, § 183½.]

3. PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS — NEGLIGENCE OF DENTIST—EVIDENCE.

In an action against a dentist for injuries caused by a tooth dropping into plaintiff's trachea, and thence into her lung, evidence held to sustain findings that defendant carelessly and negligently permitted the tooth so to pass into plaintiff's trachea, without fault on her part, by reason of which she was damaged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Action by Alice C. McGehee against A. F. Schiffman. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

A. B. McCutchen, for appellant. E. Edgar Galbreth, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Action to recover damages on account of injuries sustained through negligence. Judgment for plaintiff, new trial denied, and defendant appeals from such judgment on the roll, and from an order denying a new trial.

The first contention of appellant is that the complaint, which alleges that "the defendant did then and there extract seven of said teeth and remove all of the same from her mouth excepting one of said teeth, which, by said defendant's carelessness, negligence, and unskillfulness, was permitted and allowed by him to drop and pass into plaintiff's right lung, without any fault or negligence on her part," was insufficient, in that the negligence averred was not the proximate cause, for the reason that it is manifest that plaintiff, having control over her own muscles and breathing apparatus, the tooth by any negligence or omission of defendant could only have been allowed to escape into the mouth, and that it should reach the lung comprehended action on plaintiff's part which would be the proximate cause of the injury; that, if there was an unbroken sequence of events through which the injury was chargeable to defendant, those continuous events should have been pleaded; that the complaint was uncertain, in that it cannot be ascertained "how or in what manner any carelessness on the part of the defendant occasioned the injury, nor how the defendant by any act or omission of his could permit or allow the plaintiff's tooth to drop or pass into her right lung. It is sufficient to allege the negligence in general terms, specifying, however, the particular act which is alleged to have been negligently done. "Negligence is the ultimate fact to be pleaded, and it forms part of the act from which an injury arises. * * * It is the absence of care in the performance of an act, and is not merely the result of such absence, but the absence itself." Stephenson v. Southern Pac. Co., 102 Cal. 148, 34 Pac. 620. When we consider that the demurrer admits that through want of care defendant allowed the tooth to drop into the lung, whereby the injury followed, it removes from consideration the possibility of any intervening facts or circumstances being the proximate cause of the injury. "It is sufficient to say it was negligently done, without stating the particular omission which rendered the act negligent. But it must appear from the facts averred that the negligence caused or contributed to the injury." Smith v. Buttner, 90 Cal. 100, 27 Pac. 29. In the complaint under consideration it is averred that he dropped the tooth into the lung, the fact which caused the injury. The dropping of such tooth is admitted to have been occasioned through want of care. Nor can a court say, as a matter of common knowledge, that the fact admitted was impossible without some other agency acting upon it. We regard the complaint as sufficient, and in no sense as ambiguous or uncertain.

Upon the appeal from the order, it is contended that there is no evidence in support of the finding of the court that defendant was negligent, or that such negligence caused the injury. There was evidence tending to show that defendant undertook for a consideration to extract certain teeth; that preliminary thereto he administered an anesthetic, from which plaintiff was rendered entirely unconscious, and that four teeth were extracted; that thereupon plaintiff was placed a second time under the influence of the anesthetic, and defendant undertook the extraction of three other teeth; that when plaintiff regained consciousness she was strangling and coughing as though she were choking, and she felt as if some foreign substance had gone through her windpipe; that she continued this coughing and became sick; that an abscess formed in the lower lobe of the lung, and quantities of yellow pus were expectorated; that her condition was such as might be expected to result from a foreign substance in the lung; that afterwards, during a fit of coughing, she expelled from her lung a tooth. It appears further that plaintiff was in perfect health before she entered defendant's office to have such teeth extracted; that from that day she began to be sick, and thereafter was continuously under the care of a physician; that after the tooth was expelled, though in a weak condition, she began to improve. It was further in evidence that by the use of ordinary care the extractor could keep the mouth of the patient clear of blood and, in case a tooth should escape from the forceps, as is frequently the case, he is able to remove it; that constant care is necessary to be exercised that teeth may not escape into the trachea; that a skillful operator keeps track of the teeth as extracted and knows when he has taken them all from the mouth, and examines the teeth actually extracted to see that no fragments are left in the mouth; that in the exercise of ordinary care the operator could discover whether any of the teeth or any fragments thereof had not been removed from the mouth. It further appears that a tooth slipping from the forceps may pass into the lungs; that the use of nitrous oxide as an anesthetic would increase the possibility of a tooth escaping from the mouth into the windpipe. There is no evidence in the record that defendant took any of the precautions before mentioned, or made any observations to see whether or not he had completed his task. In addition to all this, there was evidence tending to show that ordinarily a patient regaining consciousness will not cough; that, if coughing and strangling ensues after consciousness is regained it is recognized as an evidence of the fact that a foreign substance has escaped, and that unusual and great precautions are thereupon taken by the operator to cause its immediate removal; that, notwithstanding plaintiff's coughing and giving every evidence of having some foreign substance in her windpipe, no attention was paid to her by the defendant, and no effort made to ascertain the cause of her unusual condition. There was therefore competent evidence tending to establish the averments of the complaint, not only as to the negligence, but as to the proximate cause of the injury. Nor can we say that there was established any intervening act of plaintiff, voluntary or otherwise, which contributed to such injury. We think, therefore, that there is evidence in the record sustaining the findings of the court that defendant carelessly and negligently permitted and allowed a tooth to drop and pass into and down plaintiff's windpipe, and thence into plaintiff's right lung, without fault upon her part, by reason of which plaintiff was damaged.

There is no prejudicial error apparent in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

NEWPORT et al. v. TEMESCAL WATER CO. (L. A. 1,788.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 10, 1906. On Rehearing, Sept. 8, 1906.)

1. Waters and Water Courses—Subterranean Connection—Evidence.

Evidence in an action to enjoin the pumping and carrying off of waters of a valley held to sustain a finding that there was no subterranean connection between the waters thereof and those of another valley.

2. SAME—DIVERSION—INJURY TO LAND—EVIDENCE.

Evidence in an action to enjoin the pumping of water held to sustain a finding that the land from under which it was drawn was, in any case, arid and unprofitable.

3. SAME—INJUNCTION—DAMAGES.

Where it is to the interest of the public that water be pumped and diverted to supply the needs of a town, and the monetary injury to the land from under which it is taken can be determined, an absolute injunction will not be granted, but merely one conditioned on failure to make good the damage.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Action by William Newport and others against the Temescal Water Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

H. C. Rolfe and C. C. Haskell, for appellants. Joseph H. Call, Purington & Adair, and E. W. Freeman, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Perris Valley is a basin of 40 or 50 square miles in extent. The surface soil is of inferior character, arid and alkaline. At a depth varying from 8 to 40 feet below the surface the land consists of unstratified silt, detritus, and gravels. The voids in this soil carry water, and the water-bearing soils are from 100 to 400 feet in depth. Contiguous to Perris Valley is Menefee Valley, a somewhat similar, though smaller, tract of land. The surface soil of the Menefee Valley is of better quality than that of Perris Valley, and, like the latter, rests on water-bearing gravels. The Temescal Water Company, defendant herein, is a corporation engaged in the collection and distribution of waters for the use of its stockholders and others. It supplies the inhabitants of the town of Corona with water. The town of Corona, with a population of 2,700, has grown up dependent upon the water supply of defendant, and property to the value of $4,000,000 is subject to complete destruction should that supply fail. Of that supply all except an insignificant portion is taken by defendant from Perris Valley. In collecting and husbanding this water and delivering it to its consumers the defendant has expended nearly $1,000,000, and the value of its water rights and other properties is at least $2,000,000. In January, 1901, the defendant first purchased 160 acres of this water-bearing land in Perris Valley, and from wells then existing, and from additional wells which it bored, pumped water from the underlying saturated gravels and carried it through its flumes and conduits for about 40 miles to the lands of its stockholders at Corona. Subsequently, in March, 1903, the defendant purchased 3,340 additional acres of like lands. Thereafter it pumped and conveyed from its lands so acquired 600 or more inches during the irrigating season of each year. Upon March 1, 1904, some six landowners in Perris Valley, one of whom, the plaintiff Newport, is also a landowner in the Menefee Valley, brought this action for an absolute injunction to restrain the defendant from further pumping and carrying off the waters of Perris Valley. The essential allegations of their complaint, upon which were founded their demand for an injunction, are that the plane of saturation, when not illegally interfered with, stands from within 8 to 20 feet of the surface of the ground; that upon their lands were growing trees, vines, grasses, and shrubbery, sustained by the waters so standing at this level; that by capillarity, percolation, and like natural forces, these waters were drawn toward the surface, moistening and nourishing the roots of herbage and vegetation; that the effect of the pumping of defendant was to lower the plane of saturation so as to render it impossible for the water to reach the roots and thus to destroy these vegetable growths. It was further charged that each of the plaintiffs used, and had used, large quantities of the water for surface irrigation, for the growing of crops and for the nourishing of vines and trees; that this lowering of the water plane by defendant made pumping more difficult and expensive and would in time deprive plaintiffs of all water. Finally, it was alleged that Menefee Valley, with Perris Valley, formed a part of one and the same catchment basin, and that the effect of defendant's pumping in Perris Valley was to lower the plane of saturation under plaintiff Newport's land in Menefee Valley, and thus to work the same disastrous result. The defendant answered by denying the alleged acts and the resultant damage. It denied any subterranean connection between the water-bearing gravels of Perris Valley and Menefee Valley, and alleged that these valleys were disconnected and were in different water sheds. As to the lands in Perris Valley, it denied that in a state of nature the saturated gravels in any way contributed to the nourishment of the vegetation, and alleged that the lands were in great part alkaline and unfit for husbandry, and could not produce fair corps either from the subsurface waters, or from surface irrigation, or from both. Affirmatively it alleged that, underlying the surface of Perris Valley and but a few feet below the surface, was a stratum of hard-baked clay known as "hard pan," below which stratum lay the saturated gravels, and which stratum prevented the capillary drawing of the waters to any point so near the surface as to aid vegetation; that the effect of this hard pan was to turn the roots of trees, shrubs, and grasses, which could not penetrate through it, giving all vegetation but a shallow and worthless soil in which to endeavor to live; moreover, that when surface irrigation was attempted, by reason of this hard pan the waters were never returned, and never could return, to the underlying gravels from which they were taken, but were dissipated and wasted by evaporation. As affirmative defenses the defendant then pleaded its expenditures, the nature of its works, the use to which it had been putting the water, the knowledge and acquiescence of the plaintiffs, and other matters from which it asked the court to decree that plaintiffs' cause of action was barred by their laches and by estoppel. After a protracted trial the court found in favor of the defendant upon substantially all the disputed matters. The findings of the court are attacked, and some 96 specifications are set forth and argued. Plaintiffs' opening brief—366 pages in length—is largely devoted to an analysis of, and an argument upon, the evidence, in their endeavor to show that it does not support the findings of the court. The transcript contains about 1,000 pages of the evidence. To follow and answer plaintiffs' argument would amount to no more than a setting forth of the evidence which does sustain the findings, and to do this fairly would fill a volume of our Reports. It must suffice, therefore, to say that a critical examination satisfies us that the findings, one and all, are amply supported.

But briefly to illustrate the difficulty of discussing the findings within the broadest limits of a judicial opinion, the finding touching Menefee Valley may be instanced. The court found "that percolating waters in said Menefee tract do not connect with percolating waters in Perris Valley so that the water level in said Menefee Valley has been or can be affected by pumping water from lands in said Perris Valley." Upon this question a vast deal of evidence was introduced. Upon the part of the plaintiff, as has been said, it was contended that the subterranean connection between the two tracts of land was perfect, that the percolation and filtration was free, and that the direct effect of the pumping of defendant was to lower the water level in Perris Valley and to cause a corresponding lowering of the level in Menefee. Upon the part of the defendant it was shown that there was a decided ridge and elevation of ground between the two tracts so that certainly the surface drainage of the two were separate and distinct. Government topographical maps were introduced to show that the drainage of the basin of Perris Valley was down the San Jacinto river westerly to Lake Elsinore, while the drainage of the basin of Menefee Valley was distinctly separate and trended southwesterly through Salt creek. Expert witnesses were likewise called to testify to their belief that there was no subterranean connection between Menefee and Perris Valleys, and that their subterranean drainage outlets were likewise distinct. Certain of defendant's experts declared their belief in the existence of a more compact earth formation between Menefee and Perris Valleys which would effectually prevent and forbid anything like a free seepage or percolation of waters. Defendant, in support of this, urges the existence of dry wells upon this divide; that is to say, that wells dug upon either side of it in Perris or Menefee Valleys carried abundant water, while wells upon this divide yielded very little, and for practical purposes none at all. This, in turn, was disputed by plaintiffs, who showed that they had sunk wells along the pretended divide, and these wells went into free water-bearing gravels. Defendant again answered this by saying that, conceding this to be so, the wells merely tapped the gravels; that the quantity of water which the wells would produce was not established by this, and still less that it did not establish a water communication between the two valleys; that the nonexistence of this water communication was demonstrated by the fact that the water level in the wells of Menefee Valley was about 6½ feet higher than the water level of the wells in Perris Valley before any pumping had taken place; and, finally, that it was untenable to argue that Salt creek, into which Menefee Valley drained, with a grade of 48 feet and at a distance of 3 miles, would not lower the water level in the Menefee wells, which remained standing 48 feet above, while lowering the water level in Perris Valley 10 feet at a distance of five or six miles, would cause the water level in the Menefee tract to lower 10 feet. This naked statement of the conflicting evidence has been given to illustrate the technical nature of the testimony. When it is considered what astute arguments may be, and have been, raised upon either side in the analysis of it, it demonstrates the impossibility of attempting to discuss these arguments in all their varied phases.

As we have said, it must suffice to say that the findings of the court are well sustained. Those findings were, first, as has been said, that there was no subterranean connection between the waters of Perris and Menefee Valleys. This finding disposes of the alleged injury to plaintiff Newport's land in Menefee Valley. The court, in turn, found the existence of the layer of hard pan under Perris Valley, the alkaline nature of the soil, and the natural tendency of surface irrigation to draw this alkali to the top of the ground and thus destroy vegetation. Specifically it found "that about one-fourth of the lands of the plaintiff Newport in Perris Valley, nine-tenths of the land of the plaintiff Hoffman, and about one-third of the land of the plaintiff Pierce, are so impregnated with alkali, or mountainous, as to be rendered thereby practically unfit for agricultural purposes, and the remainder of the lands of said plaintiffs in Perris Valley are adapted to growing grain in seasons of abundant and seasonable rain, but, during average years, such land cannot be profitable farmed, and, on account of hard pan, subsoil, and climatic conditions, said lands are of little value for agricultural purposes, and, when irrigated, do not produce profitable crops with reasonable regularity and abundance." This finding is attacked as being unsupported by the evidence. It is further said that it is too indefinite in its declaration that the lands have "little value for agricultural purposes," and that when irrigated do not produce profitable crops with "reasonable regularity and abundance." The evidence showed that, of all the lands in Perris Valley owned by the plaintiffs, which lands aggregate some 5,590 acres, and which lands for the most part had been owned for 20, 15, or 10 years, less than 58 acres were being irrigated by these plaintiffs. The plaintiff Elisha H. Pierce so irrigated "35 acres, more or less," of alfalfa and 1 acre of trees and vines and vegetables, which could not be grown without artificial irrigation. The plaintiff William Hoffman, in 1902, irrigated less than one-eighth of an acre, upon which were growing a few vegetables and fruit trees. The plaintiff Waters for more than 5 years had been irrigating about 2 acres planted to trees, vines, and shrubbery. Plaintiffs Paggi, who purchased their land after the defendant's pumping plant was in operation, irrigated one-eighth of an acre of alfalfa and "20 acres more or less" of grape vines, while the plaintiff Newport never used any of the water in Perris Valley at all. We do not set forth the small quantity of the land so irrigated out of the tract of 40 or 50 square miles with any idea that, because the use was little, and the value small, the defendant and the inhabitants of Corona which it supplied should in any way receive any preference, or should for such reason be thought to have any superior right. Such an argument has no standing in a court of law and is distinctly repudiated. But it does serve to support the finding of the court that the land is arid and unprofitable. For it is not to be supposed that, with an abundance of water under the soil, if the soil itself was fit for cultivation, those waters would not long since have been used to transform the desert of Perris Valley into a fruitful garden. The court further found that, in the 3 years during which the defendant had pumped water from the valley, the plane of saturation had lowered some 10 feet. But it distinctly declared against the post hoc propter hoc argument that this lowering was caused by the pumping, and found that for several years prior to 1901, when the defendant commenced pumping, the long period of drouth that had existed for the previous 10 years, with the pumping of others than the defendant, had resulted in lowering the plane of saturation; that defendant's pumping has only contributed, with these other causes, to the lowering, and that there was no reason to believe that its continued pumping would in time exhaust the saturation or the water, but "with normal rainfalls and such as has been usual in the past 40 years in Perris Valley and surrounding country, said water plane will return to its former level, such as it was before any water was pumped therefrom, and will continue to furnish sufficient water for the reasonable use of plaintiffs and defendant without being greatly or permanently lowered." Since the time when defendant commenced to pump in 1901, the finding is that the water plane has been temporarily reduced an average of about 10 feet—"part of which reduction has been caused by defendant, the remainder by plaintiffs, by third parties and by natural causes."

These findings so completely dispose of this controversy upon its merits that little is left to be said. It becomes wholly unnecessary to consider the court's finding of laches. Important as the consideration of this question must prove to be, where an absolute injunction is sought against work of public or quasi public benefit, such discussion must be postponed until the time when it necessarily arises. It is to be observed, however, in this case, that the plaintiffs do not ask for damages and an ancillary injunction until such damages are paid, but ask for an injunction absolute, without seeking monetary compensation. But, on the question of monetary loss, the showing is that the additional cost of pumping caused by the lowering of the water plane 10 feet would be, for alfalfa, the crop requiring the most water, not more than $1 per acre. So that $58 per year would fairly represent the monetary loss of these plaintiffs for all the land which they irrigated, even if the lowering of the plane were wholly attributable to defendant. But, as has been said, the finding of the court establishes that the lowering was due to the use of water by plaintiffs themselves, and by others, as well as to the natural cause of drouth, quite as much as to the operations of defendant. And, finally, upon this proposition it may be said that, where the interests of the public are involved and the court can arrive in terms of money at the loss which plaintiff has sustained, an absolute injunction should not be granted, but an injunction conditional merely upon the failure of the defendant to make good the damage which results from its work. Such an action, if successful, should be regarded in its nature as the reverse of an action in condemnation. The defendant in effect would be held to be damaging private property without just compensation first made to the owner, and, failing to make such compensation, should be enjoined from further damage. For, as was said by this court in Montecito Valley v. Santa Barbara, 144 Cal. 578, 77 Pac. 1113, in a case similar to this, "a prohibitory injunction should only be granted if any and all other forms of relief should be found inadequate." In this case, however, the plaintiffs sought an absolute injunction. This they conceived to be their right under Katz v. Walkinshaw, 141 Cal. 116, 70 Pac. 663, 74 Pac. 766, 64 L. R. A. 236, 99 Am. St. Rep. 35, which had been decided but two months before the commencement of their action. The decision of Katz v. Walkinshaw is adhered to, but as plaintiffs, on the facts, failed to establish any ground for relief under the principles there laid down, no amplification of those principles becomes necessary.

The objections and exceptions to the admission and rejection of evidence taken at the trial do not call for detailed consideration. No one of the rulings adverse to appellants had any bearing upon the findings which we have considered so as in any way to have affected the result, and, for the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. (dissenting). In their petition for a rehearing counsel for appellants make a point which I think should have received further consideration before any final disposition of the case. They contend that, if they are denied the injunction for which they prayed only because their injury may be fully compensated by money damages, such damages should have been allowed in this suit under their prayer for general relief, and that it was error, in view of the admitted fact that their lands are permanently damaged by the same unlawful acts which were enjoined in Katz v. Walkinshaw, 141 Cal. 116, 70 Pac. 663, 74 Pac. 766, 64 L. R. A. 236, 99 Am. St. Rep. 35, to turn them out of a court of equity without any relief and with a judgment against them for all the costs of a protracted litigation. The argument advanced in support of this proposition seems to me very cogent, and deserving of the further and serious consideration of the court; and for this reason I dissent from the order denying a rehearing.

SNEED v. MARYSVILLE GAS & ELECTRIC CO. (Sac. 1,221.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 20, 1906.)

1. EVIDENCE—OPINION EVIDENCE.

In an action for the negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate by touching or coming in close proximity to an electric wire there was evidence that decedent had knowledge at least of the danger of touching a charged electric wire. Held, that the admission of testimony of decedent's mother that he did not know the dangers of electricity was prejudicial error.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, § 2242.]

2. WITNESSES—COMPETENCY—KNOWLEDGE OF FACTS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1845, requiring a witness to have knowledge of facts testified to, except in express cases, the testimony of a mother that her son had no knowledge of the danger of electricity is inadmissible, particularly where it is shown that her statement was based solely on the fact that he had always lived with her and had never told her of such knowledge.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, §§ 80-85.]

3. TRIAL—OBJECTION TO EVIDENCE.

Where the court rules on the merits of an objection to the competency of evidence, made immediately after the answer, and directs the objector to ascertain the competency on cross-examination, and no point is made at the time as to the timeliness of the objection, such point is barred.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, §§ 183-190.]

4. SAME — OBJECTIONS — STATEMENT OF GROUNDS.

An objection to a question as to whether the witness' son had a knowledge of the dangers of electricity, on the ground that it had not been shown that the witness knew anything about such knowledge, sufficiently presents the question as to the competency of such evidence.

5. DEATH—DAMAGES—AMOUNT.

Under the statute the damages to be recovered by an administrator for an injury causing the death are limited to the pecuniary loss suffered by the heirs of decedent by reason of his death, including both the deprivation of that to which the heirs would have been legally entitled had the decedent lived, and that which it might be reasonably expected they would have received from him, although only a moral obligation rested on him in relation thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Death, § 112.]

McLaughlin, J., dissenting in part.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth M. Sneed, administratrix of James L. Sneed, deceased, against the Marysville Gas & Electric Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Garret W. McEnerney, William B. Besley, Forbes & Dinsmore, and F. P. Deering, for appellant. W. H. Carlin, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action to recover damages for the death of the deceased, James L. Sneed, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. Plaintiff recovered judgment, defendant moved for a new trial, and its motion was denied. The defendant appealed from the judgment, and also from the order denying its motion for a new trial. The action was begun by James A. Sneed, the father of the deceased, as the administrator of the estate. After judgment, James A. Sneed died and the present plaintiff was substituted in his place, as administratrix and as plaintiff. The deceased, at the time of his death, was in the service of the defendant in the capacity of a plumber or plumber's assistant, and was engaged in the work of joining two pieces of pipe at the top of a water tank house owned by defendant. At an elevation about five feet higher than the platform on which he was at work there were eight wires stretched, each carrying a high potential electric current of 16,000 volts, the wires and electric current being owned, controlled, and managed by the defendant. The nearest of these wires was about five inches away from a vertical line extended upward from the edge of the tank house platform, so that, if the deceased attempted to stand erect with his head projecting over the edge of the platform, he would inevitably come in contact with or near to this wire. His death was caused by the electric current from this wire entering his head as he made the attempt to stand erect, while at the same time having his head bent over forward looking down at a fellow workman on the ground below.

The particular charge of negligence against the defendant was that the place, as above described, where deceased was at work was, by reason of the proximity of the wires and the powerful electric current carried by them, a place of danger; that the deceased did not know the nature or properties of electricity, nor the dangers incident to coming in close proximity to the said wires carrying said electric current; that defendant, with full knowledge of the dangers arising from the proximity of said wires and electric current to said platform, and of the ignorance of the deceased concerning the same, put him to work thereon without instructing him, or warning him of the said dangers. Under the issues it became material and important to ascertain on the trial whether or not the deceased, prior to his death, had any knowledge of electricity and the dangers arising from its use on the said wires. Evidence was given on this issue by both parties, and the jury specially found that the deceased did not have such knowledge. It is earnestly claimed by the defendant that the competent evidence is not sufficient to sustain this finding. There was evidence tending to show, and defendant insists that it was sufficient to prove, that he did possess that knowledge. It is necessary to mention this only for the purpose of demonstrating the importance of excluding from the jury any incompetent evidence on the subject, and to show that injury was likely to be caused by the admission of improper evidence tending to prove such lack of knowledge. The present plaintiff, the mother of the deceased, was a witness for the plaintiff. She testified that at the time of his death the deceased was 22 years of age and had lived with her all his life, that he had been working out for himself ever since he was 19, and was working for defendant in its gas department on September 17, 1901, the day of his death. Thereupon the following question and answer was asked and given in her examination in chief: "Q. Did he, up to that time, have any knowledge of electricity or its dangers? A. He had no knowledge." Objection was made to this on the ground that it had not been shown that the witness knew anything about the knowledge of the deceased regarding electricity or its dangers. The court overruled the objection, remarking to defendant's counsel, "You can find out on cross-examination." On cross-examination on the subject she testified that he had for three or four months before his death, worked for defendant as a plumber, and had previously worked in the same occupation at the woolen mills; that she had been at the woolen mills and had seen him working there six or seven times, about half an hour each time; that she did not think they had any electric motors or wires at the woolen mills; that she did not know that he had run a motor there, and did not think he did; that he did not learn of electricity or its dangers either in his work at the woolen mills or in his work for the defendant; that she knew he knew nothing about it; and that the only reason she had for saying this was that he always told her everything he was doing anywhere, and that if he had learned of electricity and its dangers he would have told her something of it, and that he had not told her anything about it. Thereupon the defendant moved the court to strike out the testimony of the witness as to the lack of knowledge of deceased, on the ground that it was hearsay, and the motion was denied.

In these rulings we think the court erred. There was evidence on behalf of the defendant to the effect that electric motors were installed and used in the woolen mills while Mr. Sneed was working there; that he was there instructed how to run the motor and informed of the danger from contact with wires carrying electricity. While it may be that there is no evidence that he was ever informed that one might receive what is called a "brush discharge" from coming in close proximity to highly charged wires, without actual contact therewith, there clearly is evidence that he knew the danger arising from such contact. The evidence leaves it doubtful whether the death was caused by a "brush discharge" or by a discharge from actual contact with the wire. In view of this condition of the evidence, the action of the court in practically informing the jury that they could consider, as evidence on the question, the positive declaration of the mother that he had no knowledge of any such danger, would probably be taken by the jury as highly significant, and, if this declaration was incompetent, its admission must be presumed to have been injurious to the defendant. That it was incompetent, under the circumstances shown, is clear. Ordinarily one person cannot know what is in the mind of another, and direct testimony by a witness that another knows or does not know a particular fact is, for that reason, in most cases improper. Such knowledge can only be shown by his declarations, or inferred from circumstances, and proof of it can only be made by proof of his declarations or of circumstances from which it can be inferred, as that he was, or was not informed, or that he was in a position from which he could, or could not, see, and such like conditions. "A witness can testify of these facts only which he knows of his own knowledge; that is, which are derived from his own perceptions, except in those few express cases in which his opinions or inferences, or the declarations of others are admissible." Code Civ. Proc. § 1845. This section is inaccurate, so far as it refers to the admission of the declarations of others as an exception. In such case the witness testifies merely to the making of the declaration, which he must have heard in order to be a competent witness to testify to it, and hence, the fact to which he testifies is a fact within his own knowledge, derived from his own perceptions. With respect to opinions and inferences, the only exceptions to this general rule at all similar to the case at bar are the opinions of subscribing witnesses to a writing, and of intimate acquaintances of a person as to the sanity of such signer or person (Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 10), and those cases where, from the nature of the case and the difficulty of accurately describing in words the facts on which the inference or opinion is based, a witness is allowed to testify directly to the conclusion or inference that another person was, on a particular occasion, angry, calm, agitated, excited, intoxicated, rational, or irrational, and the like. Holland v. Zollner, 102 Cal. 638, 36 Pac. 930, 37 Pac. 231; People v. Manoogian, 141 Cal. 592, 595, 75 Pac. 177; People v. Lavelle, 71 Cal. 351, 12 Pac. 226; People v. Sanford, 43 Cal. 29. We, of course, are not speaking here of expert opinions in matters of science or special knowledge. None of the cases go so far as to hold it competent for a witness to testify directly that another person was, or was not, possessed of knowledge or learning of, or concerning, a particular fact. We can see no reason for extending the exceptions to the general rule so far as would be necessary to sustain the admission of the testimony in question. And this is especially true of the denial of the motion to strike out the testimony after the cross-examination, which the court suggested, had disclosed that the witness had no means of knowing the knowledge possessed by her son, other than his silence on a subject as to which there was no especial reason for him to speak to her.

The respondent makes some technical objections to the consideration in this court of the question of the competency of this evidence. The first one is that the objection to the question came too late, being apparently made after the question was answered. In the bill of exceptions the objection seems to have been made immediately after the answer, and there is nothing to indicate that there was not time to make it sooner, except the fact that the answer is very brief. We think, however, that the conduct of the court in apparently making the ruling on the merits of the objection, instead of on the point that the objection was not timely, and in directing defendant's attorney to ascertain the facts bearing upon the objection on the cross-examination, should be considered as a bar, to the point that the objection came too late. The attorney might well have inferred therefrom that the court was ruling on the objection on its merits, waiving the point that it was untimely, and consequently may have been led to refrain from claiming that the answer was given before he had time to object. There is nothing to indicate that the court did not so consider the matter, or that counsel for plaintiff was then relying on the point that the objection was too late, or was in any respect misled or injured by the lateness of the objection. The ground of the objection substantially presented to the court the question of the competency of the evidence sought to be elicited. The testimony of a witness as to the knowledge possessed by another is incompetent evidence, because the witness can have no knowledge of the fact to which he is asked to testify. Hence the objection that it had not been shown that the witness knew of the knowledge possessed by the deceased was, in substance, an objection that the evidence proposed is incompetent. It was merely a specific statement of the particulars which rendered the evidence incompetent. We do not think it necessary to consider the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the allegations that the deceased was uninformed of the dangers arising from the use of electricity and its transmission through wires, that the defendant was aware of his ignorance in these particulars, and that it failed to instruct him concerning the same, or inform him of the danger incident to the place of his employment and the proximity thereto of a high potential electric current. The evidence upon another trial may be different, as also may be the verdict.

It is further contended by the appellant that the damages allowed by the jury were excessive, and a considerable part of the argument on both sides is devoted to this subject. Inasmuch as a new trial will be necessary because of the error in the admission of evidence, as heretofore stated, we do not consider it proper to discuss the question of excessive damages. With regard to the measure of damages, in view of the argument made, and of the probability of another trial, it is proper to that say that it is definitely settled that, under our statute, the damages to be recovered for an injury causing death are always limited to the pecuniary loss suffered by the heirs of the person killed, by reason of his death. Munro v. Dredging Co., 84 Cal. 515, 24 Pac. 303, 18 Am. St. Rep. 248; Morgan v. S. P. Co., 95 Cal. 516, 30 Pac. 603, 17 L. R. A. 71, 29 Am. St. Rep. 143; Pepper v. S. P. Co., 105 Cal. 401, 38 Pac. 974; Green v. S. P. Co., 122 Cal. 566, 55 Pac. 577; Wales v. Pacific E. M. Co., 130 Cal. 523, 62 Pac. 932, 1120; Keast v. Santa Ysabel, etc., Co., 136 Cal. 260, 68 Pac. 771; Dyas v. S. P. Co., 140 Cal. 308, 73 Pac. 972; Hillebrand v. Standard B. Co., 139 Cal. 236, 73

Pac. 163. We think it may be further said that this pecuniary loss may be either a loss arising from the deprivation of something to which such heirs would have been legally entitled if the person had lived, or a loss arising from a deprivation of benefits which, from all the circumstances of the particular case it could be reasonably expected such heirs would have received from the deceased had his life not been taken, although the obligation resting on him to bestow such benefits on them may have a moral obligation only. 8 Am. & Eng. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; McFARLAND, J.; HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

McLAUGHLIN, J. I dissent. "All intendments of the law are in favor of the regularity of the judgment and proceedings in the court below, and it is incumbent upon the appellants to show error affirmatively." People v. Gibson, 106 Cal. 458, 39 Pac. 864; McLennan v. Wilcox, 126 Cal. 53, 58 Pac. 305; People v. Allen, 144 Cal. 300, 77 Pac. 948. The objection to the question asked Mrs. Sneed was interposed after she had answered, and there is nothing in the record to show that the court was requested to, or did, consider the objection as having been made at the proper time. True, this may have been the case, but it might with equal plausibility be assumed that the objection was overruled because it was tardily made. Under the rule above quoted the latter view should be accepted as correct, and this done it certainly cannot be said that the ruling was erroneous. A motion to strike evidence from the record must be based on a timely and sufficient objection to its introduction, and hence there was no error in refusing to eliminate the testimony of Mrs. Sneed. If, however, it be conceded that the evidence was objectionable and the ruling improper, still I cannot persuade myself the error was prejudicial. A mother may, perhaps, know that her son had no knowledge of electricity or its dangers, because he has never had an opportunity to acquire such knowledge either by personal observation, reading, or intercourse with persons who could give him information on the subject. If his life has been spent at a place so isolated that she must know of his every act, she would be in a position to say that he had no knowledge of something he had never seen, and could not have heard or read about. The answer of Mrs. Sneed was of a very general character, and upon cross-examination it was demonstrated beyond question that she could not have known, and did not know, anything about her son's knowledge touching this or any other subject. Crediting jurors with the usual measure of intelligence they certainly could not have been misled by a general statement absolutely unsupported by the reasons she gave for having made it.

In re DILLON'S ESTATE. (Sac. 1,478.)

DILLON v. CROSS.

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 17, 1906.)

EXECUTORS — MANAGEMENT OF ESTATE — EXPENSE ACCOUNTS—REVOCATION OF PROBATE —COSTS.

After the probate of a will and the appointment of an executor, a petition was filed for the revocation thereof. While the issues were still unsettled, the court allowed, instead of retaining for future determination, items of expense in an account of the executor for the services of experts in handwriting to determine the validity of a second will. Held, erroneous, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1332, providing that, where the probate of a will is revoked, the costs must be paid by the party resisting the revocation, or out of the estate, as the court directs.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; F. T. Nilon, Judge.

Objections by P. F. Dillon to an account of C. W. Cross, executor of Patrick Dillon, deceased. From an order allowing the account, objector appeals. Reversed with directions.

James G. Maguire and Thomas S. Ford, for appellant. P. F. Simonds, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. A document dated March 8, 1904, purporting to be the last will and testament of Patrick Dillon, deceased, was duly admitted to probate in the superior court of Nevada county and letters testamentary issued to the respondent, C. W. Cross, named in the will as executor. Within a year thereafter another document, dated October 24, 1904, which was claimed to be in fact the last will of said deceased—olographic in character—was filed by appellant, P. F. Dillon, together with a petition by him praying for its admission to probate and that the probate of the prior will be revoked and the letters testamentary which were issued thereon to said C. W. Cross be canceled and set aside. In his answer to this petition said C. W. Cross, as executor, set up that the alleged document filed by the appellant, Dillon, was a false, fictitious, and forged instrument. Thereafter by amendment to his petition for revocation of the original probate, and the admission to probate of what he claimed to be the later will, the appellant, Dillon, filed a contest against the validity of the prior will, urging as ground therefor that its execution had been procured through the undue influence of C. W. Cross, the executor named therein. The respondent, Cross, demurred to this amended petition, and his demurrer was undisposed of, and hence the issues on the contest were not settled, when the point now presented on this appeal—the validity of the order of the lower court settling the second account of the executor, Cross—arose in the lower court. This account was filed on October 20, 1905, while the petition for revocation of the prior will, and the contest of the same, were pending. The appellant, Dillon, filed his objections to four items of the account, aggregating $714.90, consisting of expenditures by the executor with reference to the olographic will presented by said Dillon for probate. These items consisted of $150 paid D. T. Ames for examination and opinion as handwriting expert on the said olographic will; a sum of $150 paid C. Eisenschimel for opinion as handwriting expert on the same matter; the further sum of $100, retaining fee, paid to said D. T. Ames as handwriting expert; and $314.90 paid for photographing and enlarging the will. The court allowed all of these items in said account to the executor, Cross, and this appeal is taken from the order making such allowance.

We think the court erred in making such allowance on the settling of this account. It should have retired all these items objected to from it, to be considered and disposed of at a later date, and when the contest concerning which the executor claimed to have incurred these expenses had been determined. While it is the duty of an executor after a will has been admitted to probate to defend the will against attack (Estate of Whetton, 98 Cal. 203, 32 Pac. 970), this does not confer upon him an unqualified right to incur and charge against the estate all items of expenditure, in resisting the attack, which he may see fit. His duty in this regard is qualified to the extent that he can only be allowed for such expenditures as are necessary and are made in defending the attack upon the original probate in good faith. This is obvious from the section of the Code (Code Civ. Proc. § 1332) providing for the allowance of costs on the contest of a will after probate which declares that "* * * if the probate is revoked, the costs must be paid by the party who resisted the revocation, or, out of the property of the deceased, as the court directs." It will be observed from the reading of this section that, where the executor is unsuccessful in resisting the revocation of the probate, he is not as a matter of right entitled to his costs incurred in that contest, but the court is vested with discretion to determine whether he shall be charged with them, or whether the estate shall bear them. This section contemplates that, before the estate shall be charged with the costs of the contest, the court should be in a position to know whether or not the contest was waged by the executor in good faith, with a reasonable belief that the attack on the original probate was unjustified. Certainly the court upon the settlement of an account, which involves an application to compel the estate to bear extraordinary costs, cannot in advance, before even the settlement of the issues involved in the contest, say that such expenditures were necessary, or incurred in good faith by the executor. In settling an account before the determination of the contest the court has no power to enter into a consideration of these questions. It could not determine on the settlement whether there was any merit in the contest or not, whether there was any validity in the claim that the will subsequently offered for probate was a forgery, or whether the will originally probated was obtained by undue influence or not. And yet these are all matters which must necessarily be determined in order that under section 1332, Code Civ. Proc., supra, the reasonable discretion vested in the court to charge the executor, or the estate, with the payment of the costs of the contest can be exercised. The section above referred to evidently contemplates a trial of the contest before an allowance for costs of the extraordinary character here involved can be made. It contemplates that the court shall be in possession of the facts and circumstances surrounding the contest as a basis upon which its discretion can be properly and fully exercised, and as upon a settlement of the account the court could not be placed in possession of them, and could not determine whether the costs claimed were necessarily incurred, or whether the executor acted in good faith in incurring them, the items should have been retired from the account for subsequent consideration when the court could be placed in full knowledge of all the facts from which to determine whether, if found to be proper costs, they should be charged against the executor or borne by the estate. This is what the lower court should have done with reference to the items in the account presented which were objected to by appellant.

The order settling the account is reversed, with directions to the lower court to settle the account by charging the executor with $714.90 in addition to the balance charged against him in the account as settled by the court.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; HENSHAW, J.

NORRIS v. HAY et ux. (L. A. 1,701.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 17, 1906.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER—CONTRACTS—RESCISSION BY VENDOR—NONPAYMENT OF PURCHASE MONEY.

A contract for the sale of real estate required the purchaser to make a deposit to assume a mortgage, and to pay the balance before a specified date. There was no provision for forfeiture on default. The purchaser made the deposit, but failed to pay the balance on the date specified. Held, that such delay did not terminate the contract, in the absence of measures by the vendor to terminate it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 48, Cent. Dig. Vendor and Purchaser, §§ 369–372.]

2. SAME — RESCISSION BY PURCHASER — GROUNDS—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action by a purchaser to rescind the contract for the vendor's fraudulent representations, it appeared that the vendor represented that he had not made any prior contract to sell, that he had contracted to sell to a third person, that the third person had not paid the price on the date specified therefor, that his contract provided for no forfeiture for noncompliance, that time was not made the essence thereof, that the vendor took no measures to terminate it, and that the third person was endeavoring to perform, and claimed rights as against the purchaser. Held to warrant a finding that the representations were fraudulent authorizing the purchaser to rescind since the contract with the third person was in force.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 48, Cent. Dig. Vendor and Purchaser, §§ 45–48.]

3. SAME—FAILURE TO PAY PURCHASE PRICE—RIGHT OF VENDOR.

A contract for the sale of real estate required the purchaser to make a deposit with a third person, to assume a mortgage, and to pay the balance before a specified date. The purchaser made the deposit, but failed to pay the balance on the date specified. Held, that the vendor in suing for the deposit, stood on the contract as if in force, for if he had elected to rescind he could only have sued for damages for breach of contract.

4. SAME—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—NOTICE.

A person, contracting for the purchase of real estate, who has no knowledge of an unrecorded prior contract, binding the vendor to sell the premises to another, may rely on the representations of the vendor that no prior contract has been made.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 48, Cent. Dig. Vendor and Purchaser, §§ 45–48.]

5. SAME—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS BY VENDOR—RIGHT TO AVOID.

A vendor, contracting for the sale of real estate, who represents to the purchaser that no prior contract relative to the premises exists, will not be permitted to avoid the false representations by claiming that though a prior contract to sell to a third person was made, yet, by reason of circumstances unknown to the purchaser, it might be inferred that the prior contract had been abandoned.

6. SAME—RIGHT OF PURCHASER TO RESCIND.

A vendor, in a contract of sale, agreed to convey a good title and represented that he had made no other contract for the sale of the premises. The vendor had made a prior contract, and there was a doubt as to its validity. Held, that the purchaser in the second contract, was entitled to rescind.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 48, Cent. Dig. Vendor and Purchaser, §§ 45–48, 188–193, 200.]

7. JUDGMENT—RES JUDICATA—PERSONS CONCLUDED — ACTION TO RESCIND PURCHASE — EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action to rescind a contract for the purchase of real estate, on the ground of the vendor's false representations that he had not previously contracted to sell the premises, it appeared that the vendor had previously contracted to sell the premises to one who had deposited a part of the purchase price with a third person, the judgment roll in the action by the vendor to recover the deposit, was inadmissible, the purchaser not being a party thereto, nor bound by any adjudication therein.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 30, Cent. Dig. Judgment, §§ 1230–1233.]

Department 2. Appeal from Supreme Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by Henry C. Norris against Andrew Hay and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jones & Weller, for appellants. Robt. E. Ross and Hunsaker & Britt, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This action was brought to rescind a contract for the sale and purchase of land in Los Angeles county, and to recover certain amounts of money paid by plaintiff to defendant under the contract, and for other relief, on the ground that at the time said contract was made, and, as an inducement to its execution, the defendants Hays made false and fraudulent representations to plaintiff with regard to the condition of the title to the land agreed to be purchased. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The court found that plaintiff and other persons associated themselves together in a joint venture to purchase a tract of land from the defendants Andrew Hay and his wife Lizzie T. Hay. That about December 22, 1902, an agreement was entered into between Norris, representing the syndicate, and the Hays, whereby Norris was to purchase the said land for the sum of $104,000, the contract providing for certain payments to be made in cash and the balance of the purchase price to be secured by mortgage upon the property purchased; that at the time said contract was entered into, the Hays, for the purpose of inducing plaintiff and his associates to contract for the purchase of the land on the terms agreed upon, represented to plaintiff that they had not entered into any contract or obligation whatever for the sale of said land to any person, and repeatedly stated to plaintiff and his associates that they particularly never had any transaction with one West affecting the title to said land; that not a "scratch of a pen" had been made between themselves and West concerning the title to the property or with reference to any agreement to convey the same; that believing such representations and statements to be true, and in reliance thereon and induced thereby plaintiff made the contract of purchase with them above referred to; that plaintiff paid to defendants as the contract required $15,000 in coin, and executed promissory notes to the defendant Lizzie T. Hay for $37,000 secured by mortgage; that plaintiff would not have executed said contract nor made such payments or delivered said notes and mortgage, save that he believed the statements and representations of said Hays to be true; that, after such payment and delivery of said notes, and before final payment, plaintiff and his associates for the first time discovered that said representation made by the Hays, that they had entered into no prior contract whatever affecting the title to said land was false and untrue, the lower court finding in that regard, that, on September 4, 1902, several months prior to the contract with plaintiff, the Hays had entered into a contract with one W. F. West for the sale of said land to him for $80,000, upon which he had deposited $10,000 with the Title Insurance & Trust Company of Los Angeles, the common agent of all parties to the contract; that plaintiff and his associates, when such representations were made, were ignorant of the existence of the contract between Hays and West; that such contract between the Hays and West continued to be in force and effect from its date till the commencement of this action by plaintiff, and had not been abrogated by the parties thereto. The court, on these findings, entered judgment, rescinding and setting aside the contract between plaintiff and the Hays, and awarded other relief prayed for, which, as no attack is made on the judgment, it is unnecessary to state.

The principal point made upon this appeal is that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the finding that, at the time the Hays entered into the contract with plaintiff, their agreement with West as to the same land was in force and effect, and the further finding that their representations to the plaintiff that no such contract existed were false and untrue. There can be no question but what the evidence abundantly shows that the Hays emphatically represented to plaintiff and his associates when negotiating for the sale to them of this land that they had not made any prior contract affecting the title to it with West or any other person, and we are satisfied that it appears satisfactorily from the evidence that, when the contract for the sale of this land with Norris was entered into, the West contract which it is not questioned but that the Hays had executed, was a valid and subsisting contract.

The claim of appellants (while admitting the execution of the contract with West) is that the evidence shows, that, long prior to the subsequent contract with Norris, the Hays and West had abandoned and abrogated their contract. We think, however, that the contrary is apparent. There is nothing in the evidence to show any express abandonment or abrogation. The West contract called for a deposit of $10,000, which was made, the assumption of a $13,000 mortgage by West and payment by him, on or before October 25, 1902, of the balance of $57,000. There was no provision in the contract for forfeiture of rights under it for noncompliance with the condition of final payment nor any provision making time the essence of the contract. The final payment to be made by West was overdue less than two months when the contract with plaintiff was made. Up to that time no successful effort had been made by the Hays or West to terminate the contract. Mere delay on the part of West did not forfeit his right under it as the Hays had not taken any effective measure to terminate them. North Stockton, etc., Co. v. Fischer, 138 Cal. 101, 70 Pac. 1082, 71 Pac. 438. As far as the record discloses, there was no action taken by either of these parties which, when the contract with Norris was made, or subsequent thereto, precluded West from tendering full payment on his part under his contract, notwithstanding final payment had been delayed, or from enforcing specific performance under its provisions. Aside from this, however, the evidence shows that West was always insisting that he had subsisting rights under the contract, and subsequent to October 25th and up to the time this present suit was commenced, was actively endeavoring to obtain the money with which to make final payment and was insisting that he had a right to do so. He was making such endeavor, and asserting that the contract was a subsisting one up to and after the payment by plaintiff of the $15,000 to the Hays. In fact, it was he who first brought notices of the existence of his contract to plaintiff and his associates. He sent a party to open negotiations with them for the purchase from him of his rights under it, declaring that they could not get a title except through him; that the Hays could not deliver the property to plaintiff and his associates unless they would see him and get the title through him.

Taking, then, these facts into consideration—that the contract between the Hays and West in itself provided for no forfeiture; that time was not made the essence of the contract; that mere lapse of time of itself did not terminate West's rights; that no agreement had been entered into by the parties rescinding, abandoning, or abrogating it; that West was at all times endeavoring to perform its conditions and claiming rights under it, even as against plaintiff—and we think the court was right in finding that when the Norris contract was entered into the West contract was in full force and effect, and that the representations to the contrary embraced in the statements of the Hays that they had entered into no contract whatever with West or any other person were fraudulent and untrue. It is true that there was evidence of some conduct on the part of both the Hays and West relative to the contract between them from which it is claimed a rescission or abandonment of it followed. But we do not think any such result was effected. The contract between them was in the hands of the Title Insurance & Trust Company as the common agent to whom West had paid the $10,000. After default by West in the final payment to be made October 25, 1902, the Hays had granted him further time, and then notified the Title

Insurance Company not to accept any further payment if West tendered it, and demanded from the company payment to themselves of the $10,000 deposited by West, but which, however, West notified the trust company not to pay. Upon such notice by West the Hays might have acted and terminated the contract, but they did not see fit to do so. They commenced a suit (which was not at issue when the present action was brought) against the trust company to recover the $10,000 deposited by West as money held by it for them under the contract. In so doing they were standing upon the contract as still in force, and claiming the money by virtue of its terms. If the contract had been rescinded or abandoned by the parties, the Hays would not have been entitled to maintain an action for this $10,000 under the contract, but only to recover such damages as might have resulted to them from West's breach of it, and, unless such damages, West would have been entitled to the $10,000. Shively v. Semi-Tropic L. & W. Co., 99 Cal. 259, 260, 33 Pac. 848. So that as the Hays, by their suit, were asserting rights under the contract as still in force, and West was claiming under the contract and endeavoring to dispose of the land of the plaintiff and his associates, asserting that title to it could only come through him, these facts, instead of supporting the theory of the Hays that the contract was abandoned, would tend to support the finding of the court that it was not.

And while we are satisfied that the evidence shows that at all the times in question the West contract was unrescinded and in force, it is to be remarked that the contract between the Hays and West was not recorded, and that plaintiff had no knowledge of its terms, nor of the transactions between Hays and West, above referred to, nor of the commencement of the action against the Title Insurance & Trust Company. Plaintiff was not required to make inquiry as to any of these matters. He had a right to rely absolutely upon the representations of the Hays that no contract of any kind affecting the title had been made, either with West or any other person. And giving the facts immediately referred to, upon which the Hays rely to show an abandonment of the contract, their greatest force, they simply tend to render the matter of abandonment uncertain, and it is hardly necessary to say that, after having expressly represented that no contract whatever existed relative to the title to these lands with West or any other person, the Hays will not be permitted to avoid their false representations in that respect by claiming that, although a prior contract was made with West, still, by reason of certain facts and circumstances unknown to plaintiff and resting exclusively in pais, it might be inferred that the contract was abandoned. As we say, these facts at best simply render the matter of abandonment equivocal. Under this situation, Norris was not required to determine at his peril whether the claim of West under his contract was valid or not. There was at least a reasonable doubt whether it had been abandoned or rescinded, and Norris was not required in this condition of doubt to complete his payment and subsequently litigate with West the validity of his prior contract, but was entitled upon discovery of the existence of the West contract to institute a suit for the rescission of his subsequent contract with Hays. This is but the application of the general rule that a vendee is entitled to rescind where it is apparent that there is a reasonable doubt as to the validity of the title to the land which the vendor contracts to convey to him. Under his contract, West acquired an equitable interest in the land. When the Hays contracted with Norris it was for a good title, but at that very time, and even up to the time this action was commenced, it was at least reasonably doubtful whether the prior contract with West was or was not subsisting. Under such circumstances Norris was not required to proceed with his purchase and take title the validity of which as against the asserted claim of West might involve him in litigation, and the sufficiency of which it would require parol evidence to sustain. Sheehy v. Miles, 93 Cal. 288, 28 Pac. 1046; Gwin v. Calegaris, 139 Cal. 384, 73 Pac. 851.

It is claimed by appellant that the court erred in its rulings as to the exclusion and admission of evidence. We do not think any of the rulings, if erroneous, were of such materiality as to require a reversal.

It was not error to refuse to admit in evidence the judgment roll offered by appellants in the case of Hay v. The Title Insurance & Trust Company, above referred to. That action was brought to recover the $10,000 deposited by West. The complaint was filed November 25, 1902. The title Insurance Company subsequently paid the money into the court and West was by order of interpleader substituted as defendant in the action. He did not answer until January 26, 1903, three weeks after the complaint in the present action was filed—January 5, 1903. As the right of plaintiff to recover was fixed at least as early as the filing of this complaint no proceedings in the case of Hay v. Title Insurance Company could affect those rights. The court admitted the complaint in that case in evidence. Conceding that this was proper, nothing further in the judgment roll was admissible. Norris was not a party to that action, and was not bound by anything appearing in the pleadings, or by any matters adjudicated, and the excluded portion of the judgment roll applied to matters occurring subsequent to the commencement of the action by plaintiff.

The order and judgment appealed from are affirmed.

In re NIGRO'S ESTATE. (S. F. 4,602.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 19, 1906.)

COURTS—STARE DECISIS—RULES OF PROPERTY.

The decision that, under Civ. Code, § 1386, subds. 2 and 5, as existing prior to the amendment of 1905 by providing that where a decedent leaves a surviving husband or wife and neither issue, father, mother, brother, nor sister, the whole estate goes to the surviving husband or wife, etc., nieces and nephews of a decedent dying intestate, leaving surviving a widow, but neither father, mother, brother nor sister, do not succeed to any part of his estate is a rule of property, and will be followed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 13, Cent. Dig. Courts, §§ 336–339.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of one Nigro, deceased. From a decree of partial distribution, nieces and nephews of the decedent appeal. On motion to dismiss appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Samuel M. Shortridge and Walter H. Linforth, for appellants. Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal from a decree of partial distribution. The deceased died intestate leaving surviving him a widow, no father, no mother, no brother, no sister, but nieces and nephews. The nieces and nephews appeal, and the motion to dismiss is based upon the ground that, having no interest in the estate, they are not parties in interest so as to be entitled to appeal. It is conceded by the attorneys for the appellant that, if this court adheres to its decisions in Estate of Ingram, 78 Cal. 586, 21 Pac. 435, 12 Am. St. Rep. 80, and Estate of Carmody, 88 Cal. 616, 26 Pac. 373, the appellants in this case have no standing, and the appeal should be dismissed. The conclusion that, under section 1386, subdivisions 2 and 5, Civil Code, as they stood before the amendment of 1905, nephews and nieces, where there was no surviving brother or sister, did not succeed to any portion of the estate of the deceased, was reached first in department in the Ingram Case, and afterward the decision in the Ingram Case was advisedly adopted by this court in bank. Such interpretation of the law has, therefore, become a rule of property which should be and is hereby adhered to.

The appeal is therefore dismissed.

4 Cal. App. 63

PEOPLE v. CHADWICK. (Crim. 28.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 9, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 31, 1906.)

1. PERJURY—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution for perjury, the jury were charged that in order to convict they must determine whether defendant gave the testimony "which the indictment charges he did give"; that it was for the jury to determine whether defendant swore to the testimony alleged in the indictment to be false, whether such testimony was false, whether defendant at the time he swore to such testimony knew it to be false, and whether the testimony so alleged to be false was material to the issue then before the court. Held, that such instruction was not objectionable, as misleading the jury to consider any testimony given by defendant on a previous hearing other than that laid in the indictment, and to convict him if they found that any portion of such testimony was false.

2. SAME—MATERIALITY—QUESTION FOR COURT.

In a prosecution for perjury, the materiality of the testimony to the issue is a question of law for the court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Perjury, § 133.]

3. SAME—PROOF OF PERJURY—DIRECT EVIDENCE.

Where perjury was assigned on defendant's testimony that he had written certain telegrams while in a cell in Ogden, Utah, and immediately gave them to S., evidence of two police officers that before reaching the police station, after defendant was arrested at Ogden, S. took one of the telegrams from her hat, and handed it to one of the officers, and that the other was found in defendant's grip, which the officer took charge of when defendant was arrested, and searched immediately after reaching the police station, and before defendant was taken to his cell, constituted "direct" evidence of the falsity of defendant's testimony, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, defining "direct evidence" as that which proves the fact in dispute without inference or presumption, and which, in itself, if true, conclusively establishes the fact.

4. SAME—INFORMATION—SUFFICIENCY.

Where defendant was informed against for sending a forged telegram, and the court held such information sufficient, defendant could not again object that the information was insufficient in a subsequent prosecution for perjury committed on the trial for sending such telegram.

5. SAME—MATERIALITY OF TESTIMONY—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where defendant was charged with perjury committed in a prosecution against him for sending a forged telegram, an instruction that, as it was shown on the trial of the former prosecution for sending such telegram that defendant did not in fact actually send the telegraphic message, but merely furnished the message to the operator to be sent by telegraph, it was not material when and where the telegrams with reference to which the forgery was assigned were written, was properly denied.

6. INDICTMENT — PLURALITY OF OFFENSES—REMEDY—DEMURRER.

An objection that an indictment for perjury charged two offenses, which appeared on the face of the indictment, must be raised by demurrer, as provided by Pen. Code, § 1004, subd. 3.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Indictment and Information, § 468.]

7. SAME—WAIVER.

Where an objection that an indictment for perjury charged two offenses was not taken by demurrer, it was waived, as provided by Pen. Code, § 1012.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Indictment and Information, § 501.]

8. WITNESSES—HUSBAND AND WIFE—DECLARATIONS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 1, and Pen. Code, § 1322, prohibiting a husband or wife from being examined as a witness for or against the other except with the consent of both, does not preclude the people, in a criminal proceeding against either of the spouses, from proving the statements or declarations of the other, if otherwise admissible, by the testimony of a witness who heard them.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, §§ 740, 741.]

9. CRIMINAL LAW—PRIOR CONVICTION—EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for perjury, evidence held insufficient to establish that defendant had been previously convicted of a felony.

10. SAME—ADMISSIONS.

Evidence of accused, in a prior prosecution for sending a forged telegram, that he had been previously convicted of a felony was a mere extrajudicial statement, and insufficient, of itself, to establish an allegation of prior conviction in a subsequent prosecution for perjury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 1867.]

11. CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—PRESUMPTIONS—REVERSAL.

In a prosecution for perjury, accused was also charged with having been previously convicted of a felony, and was convicted on both charges. He was sentenced to imprisonment for the shortest term for which he could be imprisoned if the charge of prior conviction had been established. Held, that it would not be presumed on appeal that the court would have imposed the same sentence if accused had been merely convicted of perjury, and, the evidence being insufficient to establish the charge of prior conviction, the judgment should be reversed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 3035.]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Francisco County; Carroll Cook, Judge.

Ernest Moore Chadwick was convicted of perjury, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

E. M. Chadwick, in pro. per. Attorney General U. S. Webb, for the People.

HARRISON, P. J. Upon an indictment charging the appellant with the crime of perjury, in having willfully and falsely testified at a trial of himself under the charge of forgery that two certain telegrams, purporting to have been signed by Marie Schneider, which were introduced in evidence at that trial, were written by him on or about the 1st day of March, 1901, in a cell or room of the police station in the city of Ogden, in the state of Utah, after he had been arrested at the said city of Ogden, and while he was detained and imprisoned in said cell or room under said arrest, and that the said telegrams were at said time and place delivered by him to one Norine Schneider, he was tried and convicted before a jury in the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and has appealed from the judgment rendered thereon and from an order denying him a new trial.

1. The court gave the jury the following instruction, viz.: "You have heard the testimony in this case, and it is for you to determine: * * * Fourth. That the defendant swore to the testimony alleged in the indictment to be false. That is a question of fact for you to determine, whether he gave the testimony which the indictment charges he did give, or whether he gave any portion of it. Fifth. That such testimony was false; that is, whatever testimony he gave in that action, if he gave it, and if you find there was such an action, and if he gave any of such testimony, that the testimony that he did give, or some portion of it, was false. Sixth. That the defendant, at the time he swore to such testimony, knew it to be false. That is a question of fact for you to determine, bearing in mind the rule of law that an unqualified statement of that which one does not know to be true is equivalent to a statement of that which one knows to be false. Seventh. That the testimony so alleged to be false was material to the issue then before the court."

It is urged by the appellant that, as evidence of any false testimony for which the defendant could be convicted is limited to that laid in the indictment, it was error for the court to thus permit the jury to consider any testimony given by him at the previous trial other than that laid in the indictment, and to convict him if they should find that any portion thereof was false. We are of the opinion, however, that the above language of the court will not admit of this construction, and that from the whole instruction given them the jury could not have understood that they could convict the defendant for any false testimony other than that which is charged in the indictment. They were told that in order to convict the defendant they must determine whether he gave the testimony "which the indictment charges he did give"; and, by being told in direct connection with this that they must find "that such testimony was false," they were expressly limited to the testimony laid in the indictment. The clause "whatever testimony he did give in that action," which is relied upon by the appellant, is by its connective "that is" placed in direct apposition with the clause "that such testimony was false," and is to be construed as an explanation thereof, and with the same limitation. The further direction to determine whether "any of such testimony" which he gave in the prior action was false limited their consideration to "such" of the testimony laid in the indictment as they should find had been given by him, and is to be read as a continuation of, and in connection with, the prior portion of the instruction. The frequent limitation of their consideration to "such testimony" must have been understood by the jury as referring simply to whatever testimony of that charged in the indictment they should find was given by him.

2. In direct connection with the last sentence of the above-quoted portion of the instruction, the court told the jury that "whether the testimony alleged to be false was or was not material is a question of law which it is for the court to determine, and not for the jury; the question of the materiality of evidence, no matter when and how it may arise, is always one of law for the court, and not of fact for the jury"; that in rendering a verdict in criminal cases the jury "only has the right to find the facts, and apply to them the law as given by the court, and on a trial for perjury it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury as to what facts would show the testimony to be material"; and said to the jury that if they found certain facts to be as alleged, the testimony, charged in the indictment herein to have been given by the defendant, was material to the issues in the former action.

There was no error in thus instructing the jury. Whether testimony given upon the trial of a cause is material to the issues then before the court is a question of law to be determined by the court; but, as is sometimes the case, especially upon a trial for perjury, the materiality of testimony will depend upon the existence of certain other facts, and if these facts are controverted their existence must be determined by the jury. The instruction to them that the existence of these facts would, as a matter of law, render the testimony material, and that they must so find, is in entire harmony with the instruction that, for the purpose of reaching a verdict, they must determine whether it is material. In being permitted to determine the existence of these facts, the determination of the materiality of the testimony was left with the jury. A jury is at all times required in rendering their verdict to apply the facts shown in evidence in accordance with the rules of law given them by the court; but in so doing the verdict is none the less rendered by the jury. See People v. Lem You, 97 Cal. 224, 32 Pac. 11; Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 228, 28 Pac. 937, 27 Am. St. Rep. 174; Pen. Code, § 1126.

3. The court also instructed the jury as follows: "Before the defendant can be convicted of the offense charged in the indictment, his guilt must be shown by the positive and direct testimony of two witnesses, or by the positive and direct testimony of one witness and corroborating circumstances; in other words, the law prescribes a different rule of evidence in perjury cases than prevails in ordinary cases, both as to the kind and amount of testimony required to convict. The rule is different as to the kind of evidence, for positive testimony is absolutely necessary in a perjury case, and circumstantial evidence, standing alone, is never sufficient. Again, for nearly all violations of the law the evidence of one credible witness is sufficient to support a conviction, but in prosecutions for perjury, the rule is clearly the contrary, and is as I have stated. In perjury cases, in order that the evidence may be deemed sufficient, there must be positive testimony to a contrary state of facts to that sworn to by the defendant at the previous trial; that testimony must either be by two witnesses, or by one witness and corroborating circumstances."

Section 1968 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares: "Perjury and treason must be proved by testimony of more than one witness; treason by the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act; and perjury by the testimony of two witnesses, or one witness and corroborating circumstances."

The above instruction, it will be seen, in addition to stating the provisions of section 1968 of the Code of Civil Procedure, told the jury that the guilt of the defendant must also be shown by the "positive and direct" testimony of two witnesses, or the "positive and direct" testimony of one witness and corroborating circumstances. As the instruction in this respect was favorable to the appellant, he does not claim that it was erroneous, but contends that there was no "direct" testimony of the guilt of the defendant; that "there was no witness who was present at said cell, and swore that the defendant did not there write said telegrams, and did not deliver them to Norine Schneider"; his counsel saying, also, in the brief filed in his behalf, that "if it were sought to prove the defendant guilty of the crime charged in the indictment by direct testimony, the prosecution would have to produce at least one witness who was in the cell with the defendant all the time during his incarceration at Ogden, and such witness would have to testify that the defendant did not during such incarceration write said telegram, and did not then and there deliver the same to Norine Schneider. Such direct evidence was not produced, and the jury did not follow the instruction of the court in finding the defendant guilty." It was clearly shown at the trial herein that at the trial of the former action the defendant did give the testimony charged in the indictment to have been then given by him; that at that time he testified that he was arrested at Ogden in the nighttime, and on the same night was taken to the police station in that city, and confined in a cell or room upstairs in the building; that at some time during the morning of the next day after his arrest, and while he was still confined in that room, he wrote the two telegrams in question, and in the afternoon of that day, while still confined in the room, delivered them to Norine Schneider. For the purpose of showing the falsity of this testimony the prosecution called as a witness James F. Pender, who testified that he was the officer who, in company with the chief of police, arrested the defendant at Ogden, and took him from the hotel where he was arrested to the police station; that Norine Schneider was with the defendant when he was arrested, and accompanied them from the hotel to the police station; that while they were on the way from the hotel to the police station, and before they reached it, Miss Schneider took one of the telegrams from her hat, and handed it to the witness; that at the time the defendant was arrested he had a grip, which the witness took along with them, and searched after they reached the police station and before the defendant was taken upstairs to the cell or room in which he was confined; that upon so searching the grip they found and took from it the other telegram. Similar testimony was given by the chief of police. The perjury with which the defendant is charged is that, upon the trial in the former action, he falsely testified that the telegrams set forth in the indictment herein were written and delivered by him to Norine Schneider in his cell at Ogden, and after his arrest in that city. That he gave such testimony fully appears, as above shown, and in fact is not disputed. The fact in dispute at the trial herein, and upon which the falsity or truth of his testimony depended, was whether the telegrams had been written and delivered to her before his arrest, or whether he had written and delivered them in his cell after his arrest. If they were written before he was arrested, his testimony that he wrote them after his arrest, and while confined in his cell under such arrest, was false. Any evidence, therefore, sufficient to establish as a fact that the telegrams had been written before his arrest would establish the physical impossibility of their having been written by him in his cell after his arrest, and thus demonstrate the falsity of his testimony.

"Direct evidence" is declared in section 1831 of the Code of Civil Procedure to be "that which proves the fact in dispute directly without an inference or presumption, and which in itself, if true, conclusively establishes that fact." Upon a trial for perjury, direct evidence is not limited to a denial in ipsissimis verbis of the testimony given by the defendant, but includes any positive testimony of a contrary state of facts from that sworn to by him at the former trial, or which is absolutely incompatible with his evidence, or physically inconsistent with the facts so testified to by him. People v. Green, 54 Cal. 592; People v. Barry, 63 Cal. 62; People v. Wells, 103 Cal. 631, 37 Pac. 529; People v. Porter, 104 Cal. 415, 38 Pac. 88. The testimony of the witness Pender was direct and positive that he had the telegrams in his possession before the defendant was placed in his cell; that one was given to him by Miss Schneider before he was taken to the police station, and that he found the other in the defendant's grip, which the witness took possession of at the time he arrested the defendant. These facts do not depend upon inference or presumption, but were directly testified to by Pender and the other witness, and such testimony, if true, directly established the physical fact that the telegrams were written before the arrest of the defendant. In the language of the instruction, it was "positive testimony to a contrary state of facts from that sworn to by the defendant at the previous trial." See People v. Wells, supra. The verdict of the jury shows that they accepted the testimony of these two witnesses as true, and that the testimony of the defendant to the contrary was false.

4. The court properly refused the instruction asked by the defendant to the effect that the information in the prior action was defective, and did not charge a crime, for that reason that it fails to state that the message was sent "by telegraph," and that the testimony of the defendant was therefore not material. Whether that information was defective or not was a question to be determined by the court in which that trial was had. That court held it to be sufficient, and its action in this respect was sustained by the Supreme Court. People v. Chadwick, 143 Cal. 116, 76 Pac. 884.

Upon the same grounds, the court properly refused to give the instruction asked by the defendant to the effect that, inasmuch as it was shown at the trial of the former action that the defendant did not in fact actually send the telegraphic message, but merely furnished the message to the operator to be sent by telegraph, it was not material to know when and where the telegrams herein considered were written.

The further objection that the indictment charges two offenses—a perjury committed in swearing falsely that the telegrams were written in Ogden, and another perjury committed by swearing that they were delivered to Norine Schneider at the same place—arises upon the face of the indictment, and whether well taken or not should have been presented by demurrer. Pen. Code, § 1004 (3). It is unnecessary to determine whether such objection is well taken or not, but, as it appears upon the face of the indictment, it was waived by failing to make the objection by demurrer. Pen. Code, § 1012.

5. It is urged by the appellant that, inasmuch as Norine Schneider was the wife of the defendant, the court erred in permitting her to testify in behalf of the people without first obtaining the consent of the defendant. This objection, as well as the facts upon which the objection is urged, is not sustained by the record. It is recited in the minutes of the trial under the date of July 28, 1902, "Thereupon Norine Schneider was duly sworn and examined for the people and excused." The bill of exceptions does not show the character or extent of the examination, or that she gave any testimony in the case; and it is perfectly consistent with this recital that she was "excused" from testifying upon the ground that it appeared that she was the wife of the defendant. His testimony, which is set forth in the bill of exceptions, was not given by her as a witness at the trial herein, but is merely the testimony of the witness

Elderkin, the official stenographer, that upon the trial of the former action she gave such testimony. The provisions of the Code (Code Civ. Proc. § 1881 [1]; Pen. Code, § 1322) prohibiting a husband or a wife from being examined as a witness for or against the other, except with the consent of both, does not preclude the people, in a criminal proceeding against either of the spouses, from proving the statements or declarations of the other, if otherwise admissible, by the testimony of a witness who heard them. The Code merely makes either spouse incompetent as a witness in an action or proceeding against the other, but does not render their statements elsewhere given privileged against being shown by competent testimony.

6. The indictment against the defendant also charges him with a previous conviction of a felony, and the jury so found. The appellant contends that there was no evidence in support of this portion of the verdict, and we are of the opinion that this contention must be sustained.

In support of the issue upon this portion of the indictment, the bill of exceptions states that the prosecution offered in evidence "the judgment roll in case No. 11,906, in the Matter of the People of the State of California vs. Harry Westwood Cooper, Department No. 12 of the Superior Court; judgment roll filed Jan. 14, 1898," together with testimony that "the party mentioned therein is the defendant at the bar, Ernest Moore Chadwick." The judgment roll thus offered is not set forth in the bill of exceptions, nor is there any recital therein of the character of the proceeding; whether the judgment was rendered in a civil or in a criminal proceeding, or, if the latter, whether the defendant was convicted of a felony or of a misdemeanor. In the absence of any showing of the character of the judgment, the jury were not authorized to find therefrom that the defendant had suffered a prior conviction of a felony.

The only other evidence bearing upon this issue is the following: At the trial herein the prosecution called as a witness the official reporter of the trial of the defendant upon the charge of forgery, who read in evidence the testimony given by him at that trial. Upon his cross-examination therein the defendant was asked by the district attorney the following question, viz., "Were you on the 14th day of June of the year 1898 convicted of a felony"? to which he answered, "I was; yes, sir." This evidence merely showed that the defendant, upon a certain occasion prior to the indictment herein, had admitted that at the designated date (June 14, 1898) he had been convicted of a felony. It will be observed that this inquiry and statement were directed to a different date from that laid in the indictment, that being by a judgment which bears date on the 14th day of January, A. D. 1898.

The fact that the defendant had been previously convicted of a felony was a distinct element of the charge made against him in the indictment, and the defendant has the right to insist that the prosecution shall establish the existence of that element by competent evidence before he can be convicted thereof. While the testimony of the witness that such admission was made during the former trial was corroborated by his testimony that he entered it in his stenographic notes of the trial at the time it was made, and afterwards made a transcript in longhand of those notes, from which he read the statement at the trial herein, it was in legal effect only the parol statement of the witness that he had heard the defendant make such admission. The rule is clearly established in this state that the extrajudicial statements or admissions of a defendant, in the absence of other evidence of the commission of the crime charged against him, are insufficient to establish his guilt (People v. Jones, 31 Cal. 565; People v. Simonsen, 107 Cal. 345, 40 Pac. 440); and they are equally insufficient to establish the existence of any substantive or essential element of a crime charged against the defendant. The admission of the defendant to which the witness testified was none the less extrajudicial for having been given under oath during the trial of the charge of forgery against him. It was not an admission of any fact connected with the transaction for which he was then prosecuted, or for which he is prosecuted herein, or made with any reference to the charge contained in the present indictment. As there was no evidence of any fact showing that a felony had been committed, or connecting him with any facts constituting a felony, his naked admission that he had been convicted of a felony was insufficient to establish that element of the present indictment.

7. Although this portion of the verdict was unauthorized, it does not follow that a new trial must be granted. The verdict that the defendant had suffered a prior conviction is severable from that portion finding him guilty of perjury, and, as we have seen that the latter portion of the verdict is sustained by the evidence, the verdict of a prior conviction may be disregarded, and judgment entered against the defendant upon that portion of the verdict which was sustained by the evidence. In the judgment rendered by the court the defendant was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of 10 years. This is the shortest term for which he could be imprisoned if the charge of prior conviction had been established; and, although the court might have sentenced him to imprisonment for the same term upon a verdict merely finding him guilty of perjury, it cannot be assumed that the court disregarded any portion of the verdict in fixing the term of imprisonment, and its judgment in that respect cannot, therefore, be sustained. See People v. Eppinger, 109 Cal. 294, 41 Pac. 1037.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded to the superior court, with direction to that court that if, within 20 days after the filing therein of the remittitur from this court, the district attorney shall apply for an order dismissing that portion of the indictment which charges the defendant with having been convicted of a felony prior to the commission of the offense of perjury charged therein, and said application shall be granted, the court, in the exercise of its discretion upon the facts and circumstances of the case, shall pronounce judgment and sentence upon the defendant, as provided in section 126 of the Penal Code, and thereupon its order denying a new trial shall stand affirmed. If the district attorney shall not within said period of 20 days make said application, the superior court is directed to grant a new trial.

PEOPLE v. CHADWICK. (Cr. 1,360.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1906.)

WITNESSES—HUSBAND AND WIFE—EVIDENCE OF WIFE.

Testimony given by defendant's wife on a prosecution of defendant for forgery, and not objected to by him, was admissible against him on the trial of a charge of perjury committed by him in the forgery case, so far as it tended to show the materiality of his testimony given on the trial for forgery, and made the basis of the charge for perjury.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge.

Ernest Moore Chadwick was convicted of perjury, and he appeals. On petition to transfer the case from the District Court of Appeal to the Supreme Court. Petition denied.

For opinion in Court of Appeal, see 87 Pac. 384.

Ernest Moore Chadwick, in pro. per. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The petition of the defendant to transfer this cause from the District Court of Appeal of the First District to the Supreme Court, to be heard and determined therein, is denied.

If the decision of the District Court of Appeal was intended to declare, as the defendant insists that it does, that when, upon the trial of a case, the wife of the defendant has testified against him without objection by him, her testimony then given may in all cases be read against him, over his objection, upon another trial of that or any other charge against him, we do not approve of that portion of it. No such question was necessarily involved in the case. The affirmance of the judgment, so far as the reading of such testimony is concerned, was justified by the fact that upon the trial of the forgery charge the defendant made no objection to the testimony of Norine Schneider against him, and that upon the trial of the perjury case, resulting in the judgment appealed from, he did not object to the reading of the testimony given by her upon the other trial. Furthermore, the testimony given upon the forgery trial by the wife of the defendant, not objected to by him, was admissible against him upon the trial of a charge of perjury committed by him in the forgery case, so far as it would tend to show the materiality of the testimony given by him upon the trial for forgery, and made the basis of the charge of perjury.

KOHLER et al. v. ARNDT et al. (Civ. 231.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District. California. July 23, 1906. On Rehearing, Aug. 22, 1906.)

1. APPEAL—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where the court reserved its ruling on testimony objected to, and the record is silent as to what the ruling was, it must be presumed that the court excluded it, and it cannot be considered on appeal.

2. WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—DEVISEES.

Testator gave his property to his sister and his nephew, S., and "his sister, my niece," and on the death of his sister added a codicil giving the share of his sister to "the other two residuary legatees therein named, S., and to his sister, my niece, whose name is Marie K., and whose residence is Salzwedel, Germany, share and share alike," and confirming his will save as it was inconsistent with his codicil. The evidence showed that S. had a sister living, but that her name was not Marie K., and that Marie K. was not his niece. Held, that the words referring to Marie K. were used to express the name and residence of testator's niece, and not having accomplished that were to be disregarded as surplusage.

3. SAME—COMPROMISE OF CONTEST—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A person not a party to a will contest, nor to a compromise resulting therefrom, is not bound by it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by Marie Kohler and others against Christiane Arndt and others to determine the construction of the will of Joseph Dominici, deceased. From a judgment for defendant and an order denying their motion for a new trial, complainants and others appeal. Reversed.

BUCKLES, J. This is an action to determine the proper construction of the last will and testament of Joseph Dominici. *Opinion vacated and rehearing granted by Supreme Court September 21, 1906.

After making some specific devises, and appointing George W. Bates executor, the will provides: "Lastly, I give, bequeath and devise all the rest, residue and remainder of my property, real and personal, of whatsoever kind or character or wheresoever situated, share and share alike, unto my sister, Louise Jahnke, and unto my nephew Heinrich Schluther and his sister, my niece, all residing in Luckow, Hanover, Germany." This was dated November 22, 1897. On May 3, 1898, the following codicil was added, after recital of having made the will: "Now therefore I do make, publish and declare this to be a codicil to the same. I hereby ratify and confirm said will in every respect, save so far as any part thereof is inconsistent with this codicil. Whereas it has come to my knowledge that my sister, Louise Jahnke, one of the residuary legatees therein named, is dead, I hereby give, bequeath and devise the share of my said estate in said will given, bequeathed and devised to my said sister to the other two residuary legatees therein named, Heinrich Schluther and to his sister, my niece, whose name is Marie Kohler, and whose residence is Salzwedel, Altmark, Germany, share and share alike."

A contest of said will was filed by Sophia C. Ward, a daughter of Sophia Miller, a deceased sister of testator, and, as a result of said contest, the following stipulation in writing was entered into: "It is hereby stipulated by and between the parties hereto that the contest of the probate of will heretofore filed herein shall be dismissed, and that letters testamentary shall be issued to George W. Bates, the executor named in said will, and that the property of the said estate shall be distributed as follows, to wit: "(1) The expenses of administration shall be paid. (2) There shall be distributed to Marie Kohler, the surviving legatee and devisee named in said will, one-half of the residue, less one hundred ($100.00) dollars. The remaining portion of said estate shall be distributed as follows: (a) The specific legacies of one hundred dollars each shall be paid to the daughter of Milton F. Dominici, and to the female children of E. B. Learch. (b) That part of said remaining portion of the said estate which, by the will, or the intestate law of California would have been distributed to Marie Kohler, which is by this stipulation waived by her, shall be divided among the heirs represented by the contestants of said will. (c) The remaining portion of the said estate shall be distributed according to the intestate laws of the state of California, save and except that no portion thereof shall be distributed to Marie Kohler, except the portion of said estate hereinbefore, by stipulation, agreed to be distributed to Marie Kohler, to wit, one-half, less one hundred dollars. W. H. Hatton, Attorney for Marie Kohler. L. J. Maddux and L. W. Fulkerth, Attorneys for Contestants. L. L. Dennett, Attorney for Petitioning Executor."

There were filed three petitions for distribution. One by George W. Bates, the executor, and asks that the estate be distributed according to said stipulation. A petition for distribution by Christiane Arndt (formerly Christiane Schluther), the sister of Heinrich Schluther. This petition alleges the death of Heinrich Schluther. That petitioner is the only sister of Heinrich Schluther, and is the party named in said codicil as the sister of said Heinrich Schluther, and niece of deceased, and who, by mistake, deceased called "Marie Kohler," and by mistake stated to reside in Salzwedel, Altmark, Germany. That it was the intention of deceased to name Christiane Arndt in the codicil as the name of the sister of Heinrich Schluther, and his intention to bequeath to her, and not to Marie Kohler, the bequest mentioned in said codicil as made to the sister of Heinrich Schluther. That by the last bequest in said will the testator intended to devise and bequeath the residue of his estate to said Louise Jahnke, Heinrich Schluther, and his sister, as a class, to wit: to his, testator's, sister, Louise Jahnke, and the two children of his sister, Marie Schluther (formerly Marie Dominici), now deceased. That it was the intention of testator in making the bequest in said codicil to devise and bequeath the share of his estate formerly devised and bequeathed to Louise Jahnke, to said Heinrich Schluther and to his sister, Christiane Arndt as a class, and that it was not the intention of the testator, either in the will or codicil, to give Marie Kohler anything, and that her name and place of residence, to wit, Salzwedel, Altmark, Germany, were inserted in said codicil by mistake and inadvertence. That this petitioner was not a party to the alleged compromise and settlement of contest. The third petition, that of Marie Kohler, after setting forth the jurisdictional facts, alleges that she is one of the residuary legatees mentioned in said will and codicil. That by mistake she is described as the sister of Heinrich Schluther, and that it was the intention of the testator to name the petitioner in said will and codicil as one of the residuary legatees, and that he so expressed his intention by expressly naming her and her residence. Acknowledges the compromise and claims the distributive share therein stated she should have.

The court found that the word "and" was inadvertently and unintentionally omitted before the words "my niece, whose name is Marie Kohler," etc., in said codicil at the time of the execution thereof. Inserting the word "and" the devise in the codicil is made to read as follows, "to the other two residuary legatees, named, Heinrich Schluther and to his sister 'and' to my niece whose name is Marie Kohler." When the codicil was made, Heinrich Schluther was living. The codicil itself recites that there were but two residuary legatees after the death of the testator's sister, Louise Jahnke, and the purpose of the codicil seems to have been to dispose of the devise in the will to her. The inserting by the court of the word "and" there would still appear to be three residuary legatees. But in order to determine the true meaning, in this instance, of the testator, the will and the codicil must be read in the light of each other. The gentleman, Mr. Dennett, who drew the will, testified that Dominici did not remember the name of the niece, but was to return with it at a later date and then the name was to be inserted. The testator did return and gave the name "Marie Kohler," and whose residence is "Salzwedel, Altmark, Germany," and this Mr. Dennett supposed to be the name and address of Heinrich Schluther's sister. It did not occur to him that the testator had named in his will four residuary legatees, nor that he was adding another when the codicil was drawn. It seems to me the will provides but three residuary legatees, to wit: Louise Jahnke, Heinrich Schluther, and Heinrich Schluther's sister; "my niece" is but descriptive of "his sister," whose name was not then remembered by testator. When he did remember the name of this sister of Heinrich Schluther, as he doubtless supposed he did, he returned and made the codicil. He had then learned of the death of his sister, Louise Jahnke, and, in addition to having the name of Heinrich Schluther's sister inserted, he desired also to dispose of the devise made to his dead sister, and the scrivener, Mr. Dennett, proceeded to write the codicil, and, in disposing of the dead sister's devise, used the words "the other two residuary legatees," which of itself shows that there were but three residuary legatees in the will, and, as Dennett understood the testator, there would be but two residuary legatees in the codicil; and this is borne out by the phraseology "to the other two residuary legatees therein named, Heinrich Schluther and to his sister, my niece, whose name is," meaning thereby the sister of Heinrich Schluther. Now let us see the probability of this having been the true intention of the testator. The testimony shows that he had been in correspondence with the Schluther family for years. He was a carpenter, and, before leaving Germany, had helped to construct the house the Schluthers lived in, which had also been occupied by his parents. His son Solon had visited Germany and the Schluthers, and put in the most of his time with them, and they were his and his father's favorites. This son Solon had died after returning to this country, about November 13, 1897, a month before this will was made.

The testator had been heard to speak of this sister, Christiane Schluther, several times and had written her a letter, but was never heard to speak of Marie Kohler; and, when speaking of the Schluthers, it was always in terms of affection. To one witness, J. F. Beausang, in speaking of Christiane, he always spoke of her, not by name, but as Heinrich Schluther's sister. Maria Schluther was the mother of Christiane Arndt (Heinrich Schluther's sister), and during her lifetime the testator wrote to her once or twice a year. She died June 18, 1890, and after that he wrote one letter to Christiane, and had not written at all for the last few years. She had written one later to testator announcing the death of her mother, and probably another after the will was made announcing the death of his sister, Louise Jahnke. It appears also that the testator and his brother William, residing in La Grange, Cal., were not on good terms, and while the Schluthers were on friendly terms with Joseph, the testator, Marie Kohler was on friendly terms with William. The wife of the testator was the godmother of Christiane Arndt. On November 17, 1897, the testator wrote his sister, Louise Jahnke, and which was received after her death by Christiane Arndt, and is as follows: "Dear Sister: Have not heard from you for a long time, sad news from me, Solon my last joy isn't any more. He died the 13th of this month. Requested me to send you all his last greeting. Write soon, also would like to hear from Henry Schluther and his sister." The will was made November 22, 1897—five days later. There is no testimony indicating any further correspondence was received by testator from the Schluthers, though there was testimony showing that soon after Heinrich Schluther was married in November, 1898, he wrote to testator. The testimony of Mr. Dennett, though not clear upon the subject, would indicate that the testator brought to him a letter from Marie Kohler when he came to have the codicil drawn. This is what Mr. Dennett said: "When Mr. Dominici came down he gave me instructions for the will, and I asked for the names and explained to him that the personal data would be sufficient if it was perfectly clear, but that the names would be better. Subsequently he came down and at that time he told me that he had received a letter from Germany giving them, and had ascertained that Louise Jahnke was dead. And he then gave me, in accordance with our previous understanding, the name which he wished to go in the will or in the codicil, and I understood that to be the name of Henry Schluther's sister. He never suggested to me that he wanted to change from Henry Schluther's sister to any one else. The idea and desire was simply to make clear the provision of the will. * * * I don't remember particularly what part the letter played in what took place, with the exception of the fact that my attention was called to the fact that he had such a letter."

These, then, are the facts relied upon to support the claim the testator intended to and did make Christiane Arndt his third residuary legatee in his will, and did not intend by his codicil to make Marie Kohler a residuary legatee. There was some evidence that the testator had declared his intention of making the Schluther people his legatees, but this testimony was objected to and ruling reserved, and although the record is silent as to what the ruling was, it must be presumed the court excluded it when it came to consider the matter and render its decision, and, therefore, such evidence is not considered here. Civ. Code, §§ 1318, 1340. The evidence shows the intimacy of the testator with the Schluthers; that they were in his mind all the time, and that there was an absence of friendliness between himself and Marie Kohler and her parents; that just before making the codicil he had received a letter from Germany, whether from Christiane Arndt notifying him of the death of his sister Louise or from Marie Kohler, but probably from both. If from Marie, then, that is the only letter which appears to have been written by her to the testator. That there is a mistake in the codicil is patent on the face of it. The words in the will "to my sister Louise Jahnke and unto my nephew Heinrich Schluther and his sister, my niece," indicate without any doubt or confusion that Louise Jahnke, Heinrich Schluther and Heinrich's sister, who was testator's niece, were the three persons and none others who were intended to be the residuary legatees. Now when his sister dies or when he learns of her death he desires to dispose of the share she was to take and also to have the name of Heinrich's sister stated, and for these purposes, and for no other, makes the codicil. This view is borne out by the statement in the codicil—"to the other two residuary legatees therein named, Heinrich Schluther and to his sister," etc. Since it very clearly appears that the only intention of the testator in making the codicil, outside of disposing of his dead sister's share, was to have the name of Heinrich's sister, who was his niece, expressed, to show the names of all the persons who were his residuary legatees. Marie Kohler does not pretend to be Heinrich's sister, but there is no contention but what Christiane Arndt is his sister and the only sister living, the only other sister having died November 30, 1889, and of whose death the testator knew, as shown by his letter to Christiane written October 26, 1890. The sister of Heinrich was one of the residuary legatees in the will. The codicil says: "I hereby ratify and confirm said will in every respect, save so far as any part thereof is inconsistent with this codicil," and the codicil still making her a residuary legatee, it seems to me there can be no question that in the connection in which they are used the words "whose name is Marie Kohler and whose residence is Salzwedel, Altmark, Germany," were used to express the name and residence of Christiane Arndt, and as they do not accomplish that are mere surplusage, which in the interpretation of the will and codicil are to be given no meaning at all. The testimony in the case and the wording of the will and of the codicil all show clearly that the inserting of the word "and" after "my niece" in the court's interpretation of the codicil, was unwarranted. Christiane Arndt was neither a party to the contest of the will nor to the compromise which resulted therefrom, and could not be bound by it. Marie Kohler, not being a legatee, cannot claim as such under the said compromise.

The order and decree of distribution and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; McLAUGHLIN, J.

On Rehearing.

BUCKLES, J. This is a petition on the part of Marie Kohler for a rehearing. The petition contains nothing new. The case was fully gone into at the hearing and thoroughly considered in writing the opinion. We are therefore unable to see any reason for granting a rehearing.

The petition is denied.

NULL v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SHASTA COUNTY et al. (Civ. 272.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District. California. Aug. 6, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court, Oct. 4, 1906.)

1. Justices of the Peace—Appeal—Trial.

Where a justice of the peace determined on a question of venue that he was without jurisdiction and dismissed the action, and plaintiff appealed to the superior court, the appeal being on a question of law, it was the duty of the superior court to affirm or reverse the decision, and, if reversed, to remand the case for trial, and, objection having been made to the jurisdiction of the superior court, it had no authority to proceed to a trial and to render judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 31, Cent. Dig. Justices of the Peace, §§ 472, 655-657.]

2. Certiorari — Judgments — Payment of Judgment.

Where a judgment has been voluntarily paid, it will not be reviewed on certiorari.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Certiorari, § 45.]

3. Same—Burden of Proof.

Where, on application for certiorari to review a judgment, respondent set up the payment of the judgment to defeat the issuance of the writ, the burden was on him to show that the payment was voluntary.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Certiorari, § 106.]

Petition by E. M. Null for certiorari to review the action of the superior court of Shasta county in rendering a judgment against petitioner in an action brought against him by the J. F. Bedford company. Writ issued.

Reid & Dozier and J. H. Creighton, for petitioner. Braynard & Kimball, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The following facts appear from the petition and the return: Petitioner is a resident of Shingletown township, Shasta county, and executed his promissory note, of which the following is a copy: "$30.40. Shingletown, Cal., Aug. 6, 1902. One day after date I promise to pay to the J. F. Bedford Co. or order, thirty & 40-100 dollars, interest at ten per cent. per annum. E. M. Null." The payee commenced an action on said note against the maker (petitioner here) in the justice's court of Anderson township, said county, at which time the maker was a resident of Shingletown township. Summons was issued in said action and was served in Redding township, said county, and was returned and filed with the justice of the peace in Anderson township. The defendant in that action filed a demurrer to the complaint for insufficiency of facts, and that the court "has no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant or the subject of the action," which was overruled, and the defendant answered, alleging part payment and tendering the amount still alleged to be due plaintiff; subsequently, defendant (petitioner here) moved, on affidavit, for a change of the place of trial on the ground of bias of the justice of the peace. The motion was granted and the cause transferred to Redding township. It appears that, upon the filing of the papers with the justice of the peace of Redding township, plaintiff filed and amended complaint to which defendant answered, and on June 16, 1905, the cause came on for trial. Defendant objected to the trial on the ground that "neither the justice's court of Anderson township nor the justice's court of Redding township had jurisdiction of the person of defendant or of the cause of action." The said justice of the peace of Redding township rendered the following decision: "After due consideration of the law as well as the facts in the case, the court finds that it is without jurisdiction in the matter; that the cause should be properly tried in Shingletown township," and judgment passed for defendant for costs. It further appears that plaintiff in that action perfected its appeal to the superior court, giving notice that the appeal was "taken on questions of both law and fact," and on July 14, 1905, all the papers in the action were certified to the superior court and on October 27, 1905, the cause came on for trial in said court, the plaintiff, by leave of court, having amended its complaint so as to allege that defendant, since the execution of said note promised and agreed in writing to pay said promissory note and all sums due and to become due thereon, at Anderson, in Anderson township. Before proceeding with the trial, defendant (petitioner herein) "objected to the trial of said cause and to the hearing in said superior court on the ground that neither the superior court nor the justice's court of Anderson township, in which the action was instituted, had any jurisdiction of the person of the defendant or of the cause of action." The court overruled the objection, and proceeded with the trial and "entered judgment for plaintiff as prayed for in the complaint." The return to the writ consists of the certified papers and various steps taken in the case to final judgment in the superior court.

There is an answer to the petition for the writ, verified by one of the attorneys of defendant herein. It sets forth facts relating to the proceedings had in the two justices' courts, where the case was pending on its way to the superior court, some of which we do not deem material in the view of the matter we have taken. It is alleged, among other things, that the trial, or hearing, such as it was, in the justice's court of Redding township was by consent of both parties; that a trial was duly had before said justice, a jury having been waived, witnesses sworn and examined on the part of both parties, and the cause submitted to the court for its decision and judgment; that the matter was taken under advisement, and the "said justice duly made, rendered, and entered his judgment in said matter after consideration of the law as well as the facts, which said judgment was against the plaintiff therein and in favor of petitioner herein for his costs." It is also alleged that at the trial in the superior court "petitioner did not make any special appearance or objection to the jurisdiction of said superior court, nor did he object to the hearing therein, but consented to the setting of said cause for trial and caused subpœnas to issue for witnesses in his behalf," and that witnesses were sworn and examined by both parties, but it does not appear to what issue or for what purpose they were sworn. It is further alleged that, "long prior to the filing of petitioner's petition herein, petitioner freely paid the full amount of said judgment and costs, and duly received a full written receipt and satisfaction of the same," as follows: "[Title of Court and Cause.] To W. O. Blodgett, Esq., County Clerk of Shasta County. You are hereby authorized and instructed to satisfy of record the judgment heretofore rendered in the above entitled action, the same having this day been fully paid and discharged. Dated Feby. 28th, 1906. Charles H. Braynard, Attorney for Plaintiff." It is well settled by our Supreme Court that an action commenced in the justice's court cannot be tried anew in the superior court until the issues of fact have been tried in the justice's court. S. P. R. R. Co. v. Superior Court, 59 Cal. 471; Rickey v. Superior Court, 59 Cal. 661; Myrick v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 98, 8 Pac. 648; Fabrette v. Superior Court, 77 Cal. 306, 19 Pac. 481; Maxson v. Superior Court, 124 Cal. 468, 57 Pac. 379; Smith v. Superior Court (Cal.) 84 Pac. 54. When the justice of the peace of Redding township determined that his court was without jurisdiction, the only appeal to the superior court, available to the plaintiff, was upon a question of law, and it became the duty of that court to affirm or reverse the decision of the justice's court, and, if reversed, to remand the case for trial upon the issues of fact. Myrick v. Superior Court, supra.

It is urged that there was a trial upon the issues of fact in the justice's court of Redding township. It appears that a day was agreed upon for a trial of the case, and witnesses were called and examined. But it also appears that the defendant in the action objected to the jurisdiction of the court, and, so far as appears, the evidence may have been, or at least some of it, directed to the question of jurisdiction. The justice seems to have regarded the question of jurisdiction as properly before him and it was the only issue decided by him. There was no trial of the merits of the action or the issues of fact, and no judgment or decision on the merits or on any issue of fact unless it be on the single issue of jurisdiction, which may have involved a question of fact. In effect, the justice dismissed the case at the cost of the plaintiff. De Jarnatt v. Marquez, 132 Cal. 701, 64 Pac. 1090, is cited by respondent. There, although the justice's court had no jurisdiction, the case was tried in the superior court on an appeal from questions of both law and fact, without objection being made to the jurisdiction of the latter court, while here, as we have seen, there was objection to the jurisdiction of the superior court. Personally, I venture to doubt the soundness of the decision in De Jarnatt v. Marquez, supra.

Respondent makes a point that where a judgment has been fully paid and satisfied it will not be reviewed on certiorari, citing Morton v. Superior Court, 65 Cal. 496, 4 Pac. 489; Kenney v. Parks, 120 Cal. 24, 52 Pac. 40; Warner Bros. Co. v. Freud, 131 Cal. 646, 63 Pac. 1017, 83 Am. St. Rep. 400. Where the judgment has been voluntarily paid, it will not be reviewed on certiorari, and this was the case in Morton v. Superior Court, cited by respondent. But, if made under what would be regarded as legal compulsion, the judgment may be thus reviewed. Kenney v. Parks, 120 Cal. 22, 52 Pac. 40; Vermont Marble Co. v. Black, 123 Cal. 21, 55 Pac. 559; Warner Bros. Co. v. Freud, 131 Cal. 639, 63 Pac. 1017, 83 Am. St. Rep. 400. A compulsory payment is one made to prevent seizure by a party armed with apparent authority to seize property. Brumagin v. Tillinghast, 18 Cal. 265, 79 Am. Dec. 176; Bucknall v. Story, 46 Cal. 599, 13 Am. Rep. 220.

The question, then, here is, upon whom rested the burden to show whether or not the payment of the judgment was voluntary? As respondent sets up this payment to defeat the issuing of the writ, and as all we know of the payment comes from the respondent, we think the burden was on respondent to show that payment was voluntary. The plaintiff company had a judgment on which it could have execution, and there is no evidence that execution was stayed; it was in its power, through execution, to seize the property of defendant in the action.

The petitioner asks to have it adjudged that neither the justice's court of Redding township nor that of Anderson township ever acquired jurisdiction of the person of petitioner or of the cause of action on said promissory note, also that the said superior court was without jurisdiction to determine the merits of the said action. The question as to the jurisdiction of the superior court to determine the merits of the action depends entirely, in the view we take of the case, upon the failure of the justice's court to try the issues of fact, and we hold that the superior court was without such jurisdiction. Its power over the case was limited to the question of the jurisdiction of the justice's court, which it should have decided and remanded the case, with directions either to proceed with the trial of the issues of fact, or to dismiss the case, according as the court found on that single question. We cannot anticipate the decision of the superior court, or direct what it should be. It has jurisdiction to determine the question of law brought before it by the appeal. Furthermore, we cannot know what the respective parties may do when the cause is remanded. The pleadings and issues may be materially modified or changed should the superior court direct a trial of the case. In determining the question of jurisdiction of the justice's court whence came the appeal, the superior court will take into consideration all the facts that may have been, or may hereafter be, submitted to it touching the institution of the action and its history thereafter and the steps taken by the respective parties.

Let the writ issue with directions to respondent to vacate the judgment in the action of J. F. Bedford Company v. E. M. Null, petitioner herein, and to proceed thereafter to hear and determine the jurisdiction of the justice's court and to remand the cause with directions to the last-named court to either try the issues of fact or to dismiss the action, according as the said superior court shall determine the question of jurisdiction of said justice's court.

PLYLER v. PACIFIC PORTLAND CEMENT CO. (Civ. 182.)*

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 16, 1906. On Rehearing, Aug. 15, 1906.)

1. TRIAL — SPECIAL ISSUES — DISCRETION OF COURT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 625, as amended by Act March 6, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 56, c. 62), requiring that the court, on request in writing, must direct the jury to find a special verdict on all or any of the issues, the court must submit the special issues formulated in writing by either party only when they are within the issues, and where, in an action for injuries, the plaintiff alleged that his fall from an elevated walk was caused by smoke and the absence of guards, special issues, limiting, respectively, the cause of the injury to the absence of the guards and to the smoke and not referring to the combination of the two dangers, were properly refused.

2. SAME—ISSUES NOT INVOLVED.

Where special issues were requested as a whole and some submitted issues not in the case, the court was not bound, without a special request, to direct the jury to find on any of them.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; L. G. Harrier, Judge.

Action by James Plyler against the Pacific Portland Cement Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Paul C. Harlan and C. H. Wilson, for appellant. Frank R. Devlin, for respondent.

BUCKLES, J. This is an action for personal injuries suffered by plaintiff while in defendant's employ. The case was tried with a jury, and a verdict rendered for plaintiff for the sum of $2,500. Judgment was rendered accordingly, and the appeal is from the judgment.

The appellant states at the beginning of his closing brief that "the only question presented on this appeal is: Does section 625, Code Civ. Proc., as amended March 6, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 56, c. 62), and which requires a jury to give proper reasons for its verdict, impose a mandatory duty upon the trial judge to submit issues and questions of fact to the jury, whenever requested to do so by either party?" There are other errors alleged as having taken place at the trial, but as appellant relies only on the one that is the refusal of the court to direct the jury to find on certain special issues, we will consider no other.

The defendant owns and operates a large plant in Solano county for the manufacture of cement, and the plaintiff was a laborer employed in the buildings and about the said plant. On June 22, 1904, plaintiff was directed, as a part of his duty, to go to a certain elevated platform in the upper part of one of the buildings to perform certain work, the character of which he did not know until his arrival at said platform. "The only means of ascending to, and descending from, said platform was to pass over and across a plank walk about 15 feet long and 3 feet wide, and extending and suspended over a cement floor 19 feet below said walk, thence up a ladder standing perpendicularly, about 10 feet long, to said platform; that said walk had no rails, guard, or protection of any kind on either side thereof." The complaint then alleges the unsafeness of said platform, walk, and means of ascending and descending, etc., and then continues: "And immediately after plaintiff had arrived at said platform, and before being informed of the exact character of the work he was to perform, and while plaintiff was in the exercise of all due care and skill, and without any negligence on his part, defendant carelessly and negligently caused and suffered a great quantity of dense smoke to arise and envelop the space in and about said plank walk and said ladder and platform and the space in and about which plaintiff was standing, the said smoke rendering said space * * * dark and impenetrable to sight, and making it impossible for plaintiff to see, and causing partial suffocation of plaintiff and rendering it dangerous to his life to remain on said platform; that plaintiff by reason of said darkness and danger occasioned by said smoke, endeavored to descend from said platform, and did descend said ladder and was in the act of stepping on said plank walk to escape said danger from said smoke, when, by reason of said darkness and partial suffocation * * * and by reason of the absence of rails, guards, or other protection on said walk, plaintiff fell * * * to the said cement floor beneath said walk, a distance of 19 feet," and received the injury, to recover for which this suit was brought.

Before the defendant offered any evidence, he handed to the judge of the court the following: "The court is hereby respectfully requested to direct the jury to find a special verdict in writing upon the following issues in this case, to wit: First. Was the accident and injury complained of caused by the failure of defendant to provide rails or guards on the plank walk described in the pleadings and evidence? Second. Was the accident and injury complained of caused by a great volume and quantity of dense smoke arising and enveloping the space in and about the plank walk and ladder described in the pleadings and evidence? Third. If you answer the last interrogatory in the affirmative, was the smoke alone of such a character as to threaten plaintiff with great bodily injury, or justify him in really believing that he was threatened with such great bodily injury as to require prompt action on his part to escape such injury? Fourth. Did plaintiff see and know, when he first went upon the plank walk described in the pleadings and evidence, that there were no rails or guards on said plank walk?" The record shows that, before making the request of the judge, the defendant did not show said special findings to the attorney for plaintiff, Mr. Devlin; that five minutes before the argument of the case to the jury, the judge did show Mr. Devlin these special issues and he thereupon objected to them being presented to the jury because of their uncertainty and ambiguity, and because contradictory in form, and further because the jury could not render a verdict on the general issues and find on the special issues offered. Mr. Wilson, counsel for defendant, then rose and stated: "We take exception to the action of the court in submitting to counsel the special issues presented to the court on behalf of defendant, and we assert that, under the law, it is the duty of the court to submit to the jury all special issues that may be presented, and we also object to the action of counsel in presenting before the jury any objections to the special interrogatories that have been presented to the court." The cause was then argued and the court instructed the jury, but refused to direct the jury to find special verdicts as requested by defendant.

*Opinion vacated and rehearing granted by Supreme Court September 13, 1906.

Defendant made the request for these special findings under the provisions of section 625, Code Civ. Proc., as amended in 1905. Prior to said amendment, the court might, or might not, direct the jury to find special verdicts, for the words "may direct" were used. By the amendment of 1905, the word "may" was changed to "must," and reads: "In all cases the court must, upon the request in writing of any of the parties, direct the jury to find a special verdict in writing upon all or any of the issues." It is contended by appellant that, as amended, the court has no discretion, but must direct the jury to find specially. The court is not bound to prepare such special issues, but "when requested in writing" must be taken to mean interrogatories prepared and set forth in such writing. But, even then, I apprehend the other side would have a right to offer amendments to such special interrogatories or special issues, and it would be the duty of the court then to settle the same and make them conform in an intelligent way to the real issues in the case. Unless the question the party desires the jury to answer as special verdict are questions and issues pertinent to the real issue in the case, he has no right to have the jury directed to answer them, and, as in all other questions submitted to the jury, it becomes the duty of the court to first determine whether it is pertinent to the issue the jury is called to try. Were it otherwise, and had the Legislature intended to have taken away all discretion of the court of saying whether matters parties may ask to have submitted to the jury are legitimate and pertinent, then a defendant in a damage suit with no legitimate defense could have such matters submitted to the jury as would so befog the minds of the jurors as to make it impossible to have a verdict that would stand. The Legislature never intended to take away such discretion. Under the section as it now stands, the court must submit the special issues formulated in writing by either party when the same are within the issues and subservient of the general issue in the case.

Now as to the special issues asked in this case. The complaint alleges that the fall which caused the plaintiff's injury was caused by said smoke and by reason of the absence of rails, guards or other protection on said walk. The injury was caused by both the smoke and the fact that there were no guards on the walk. Just how much each contributed to the fall is beyond the power of man to tell. In the first place, having such a walk 19 feet above the ground is an element of danger, but probably when the vision is in no wise blinded one might not fall. The smoke was only dangerous simply causing partial suffocation, but when it darkened the vision, the fact that defendant was standing on a plank walk 19 feet high and only 3 feet wide, and with no guards and no protection from the danger of falling, it, in conjunction with the smoke and the smoke in conjunction with the said walk, made the danger so great that the plaintiff was precipitated to the floor and seriously injured.

The first question the jury was called upon to answer as a special verdict would seem to limit the cause of the injury to but one thing—that of the absence of guards on the plank walk, while, in fact, that was but a contributory cause. The same may be said of the second special issue. The case was brought, and the trial was had, upon the theory that both these things combined to cause the injury, and not either the one or the other solely. If to the first special verdict the jury should answer "Yes," the effect would be to say the smoke was no factor in causing the injury. Should the jury answer the first with "No," and the second with "Yes," the result would be to eliminate the condition of the plank walk entirely. Special finding No. 3, being based upon the answer the jury might give to No. 2, which is not responsible to any issue, becomes immaterial. Special verdict No. 4 is responsive to an issue made by the pleadings. But, as these special issues were asked as a whole and not all being issues in the case, the court was not bound to direct the jury to find on any of them, without being specially requested so to do. The special issues could have been easily framed so that they would have correctly stated the issues and not been misleading or confusing had the plaintiff been given an opportunity to offer amendments thereto.

We think the refusal of the court to direct the jury as requested was within its power and the power was properly exercised. Therefore, in answer to the issue before us, we are of the opinion the requirements of section 625 of the Code of Civil Procedure, commanding the court to submit special issues to the jury are mandatory, and such special issues, when embodying the real issues in the case and not subject to other legal objections, must be submitted to the jury. But the court must pass upon their pertinency, their materiality and legality, as it is the court's duty to pass upon all other matters submitted to the jury. If such issues are in every way proper, the court has no discretion to refuse them.

The judgment is affirmed.

McLAUGHLIN, J. I concur in the order affirming the judgment. There can be no doubt that section 625 of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended in 1905 makes it the absolute duty of the court to direct the jury "to find a special verdict in writing upon all or any of the issues," and to instruct them, "if they render a general verdict, to find upon particular questions of fact" whenever a written request for such direction or instruction is made. But this is far from saying that the court in the case at bar was bound to direct the jury to fix upon some particular fact as the sole cause of the injury, or to find upon each evidentiary fact addressed to any of the several issues or questions of fact raised by the pleadings. The general issue, which might have been answered by a general verdict, involved the liability of defendant and the extent of such liability. And the several issues or particular questions of fact involved in this main inquiry, concerning which the court was bound to direct the jury to find specially, must be gleaned from an analysis of the pleadings, and not from a survey of the numerous incidental questions arising from conflicting evidence touching some auxiliary fact. Eliminating questions of law which are not properly a matter of pleading, the issues or questions of fact raised by the pleadings are: (1) Was the platform an unsafe, unsuitable, or dangerous place for plaintiff to work? (2) Should the defendant, in the exercise of ordinary care, have known that it was an unsafe and dangerous place for an employé to work? (3) Was the means of ascending or descending from said platform unsafe and dangerous, and should defendant, in the exercise of ordinary care, have known of its dangerous and unsafe character? (4) Did the defendant, immediately after plaintiff went upon the platform, cause or suffer a dense volume of smoke to envelop the same, rendering the space in and about the plaintiff and the platform dark and impenetrable to sight? (5) Did plaintiff, by reason of such darkness, in endeavoring to escape from impending danger of suffocation, through the absence of guard rails on said platform, fall and receive the injuries complained of? (6) Was the plaintiff damaged thereby in the sum of $10,000 or any other sum? (7) Were these injuries caused in whole or in part by the negligence of plaintiff himself? (8) Did the injuries suffered by plaintiff grow out of the risks assumed by plaintiff in his contract of employment? Wherever these questions include two or more propositions of fact they might properly be subdivided, and each question be made to include only one averment of fact disputed in the answer. Aside from such subdivision, however, the eight questions above enumerated include all of the questions of fact or issues which it was the duty of the court to consider in determining the propriety of directions or instructions requested.

Instead of submitting a request for a special verdict or finding on any one or all of these issues or particular questions of fact, the defendant submitted requests which it was no part of the duty of the court to grant. The requests numbered 1 and 2 are palpable attempts to compel the jury to fix upon one particular fact as the cause of the plaintiff's injuries, and are confusing and misleading. The complaint clearly and specifically charges that the accident was due to a combination of both causes, and the court was not bound to split an issue which the parties had made single, and which could not be divided without danger of confusion leading to incongruous and untoward results. For instance, the jury might answer both of these questions in the negative and still find that the injuries were caused by defendant's negligence in causing a smoke to envelop a platform, safe under ordinary conditions, but dangerous under the circumstances narrated in the complaint. The third request is based on an affirmative answer to the second, and as the latter was improper, the request was properly refused. The fourth request is an attempt to compel the jury to find on an auxiliary evidentiary fact pertinent to one of the several issues or questions of fact and was, for that reason, improper. Every law must receive a reasonable construction, and it certainly was never intended by the framers of this law that either party could by simple request compel a jury, through a direction of the court, to answer each collateral fact going to make up a single issue, or give a finding touching each disputed item of evidence. Such a practice would lead to intolerable confusion, not only in the minds of jurors, but in the trial of causes. The request must come within, and be confined to, the issues or questions of fact presented by the pleadings, and cannot be made to include a separate finding on every minor detail of an issue, and on every one of a series of facts going to establish or controvert averments from which these issues arise.

On Rehearing.

BUCKLES, J. This is a petition for rehearing. We see no reason for granting it, and it is therefore denied.

I concur: McLAUGHLIN, J.

CHIPMAN, P. J. I concur in the order denying a rehearing. Upon a comparison of section 625 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as enacted in 1872 with the section as amended in 1905 (St. 1905, p. 56, c. 62), I see no substantial difference except that "upon the request in writing of any of the parties," if a general verdict is rendered, it is made mandatory upon the court to direct the jury "to find upon particular questions of fact"; whereas, the section formerly left it discretionary with the court. I cannot, therefore, see that the amendment has introduced any new practice aside from making it the duty of the court to do what it formerly had the discretion to decline to do. The scope and purpose of the section appear to be unchanged so far as they relate to the "particular questions of fact" upon which the jury must be directed to make written findings. I think it is the right of either party to submit any one single question material to the issue or any of the issues, whether or not he desires to submit other such questions of fact. He is not obliged, in other words, by his proposed questions of fact, to address questions to all the material issues of the case.

Counsel in their petition for rehearing claim that it is their right, under said section 625, "to interrogate the jury as to matters material to the issues, yet not necessarily covering any of the issues." If counsel mean by the phrase italicized that the jury may be interrogated as to facts not related or pertinent to the issues or any of them, I cannot agree with them, and I agree with Justice McLAUGHLIN in what I understand to be his view of the meaning of the section, that it is not the right of a party to submit questions for the jury upon every evidentiary fact, though material to the issue. A wise discretion must be exercised by the trial court in determining to what extent questions of fact pertinent to the issues should, for their elucidation, be submitted to the jury. It is not easy to draw the precise line of demarcation between questions of fact which it would be the duty of the court to submit to the jury, and such as the court may properly refuse to so submit. An examination of the cases will show a somewhat wide latitude allowed under this section. See Los Angeles C. Assn. v. Los Angeles, 103 Cal. 461, 37 Pac. 375; McAulay v. Moody, 128 Cal. 202, 60 Pac. 778.

I agree with counsel for defendant that it is their right to submit questions of fact to the court for the jury without first having submitted them to opposing counsel, and the responsibility is then put upon the court to determine whether or not to place them before the jury. I see no controlling analogy between the practice under this section and the practice as to instructions. The discretion rests with the court either to submit or refuse the questions as requested, for, if it be held that the court may change or modify the questions as propounded, it would cease to be a request of the party asking it, and the statute would be no longer mandatory. This discretion, of course, is subject to review by the appellate court as is the exercise of discretion generally.

Upon further consideration of the case I agree with my associate, Justice BUCKLES, that the fourth question was responsive to an issue, and was a proper question of fact to be submitted to the jury. It was alleged in the complaint that the absence of rails guarding the walk in question was one of the causes leading to the injury, but the defendant submitted the series of questions and asked that they be submitted in their entirety, and, when the request, as made, was refused, it was the duty of defendant, if it desired any one of the questions to be submitted separately, to so request the court. It would certainly be of advantage to the profession if a comprehensive statement could authoritatively be given as to the complete rights of the parties to an action as matter of practice under this section 625. When such an exposition is made, however, it would be perhaps better that it should come from the Supreme Court. Here the case does not seem to call for such statement.

COPRIVIZA v. RILOVICH et al. (Civ. 90.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 25, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 23, 1906.)

1. TRIAL—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where different conclusions may be reasonably drawn by different minds from the same evidence as to whether an account is a mutual account, the question is one for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, §§ 336–343.]

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—TIME OF ACCRUAL OF RIGHT OF ACTION—MUTUAL ACCOUNT—ADVANCING MONEY TO THIRD PERSONS.

Moneys which are advanced by a debtor to third parties at the request of a creditor, upon which demands arise by the debtor against the creditor, and which are charged on an account between them, render the account a mutual, open, current account, an action on which is not barred until the expiration of the period of limitation from the time of the last term thereof proved.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Limitation of Actions, §§ 295–298.]

3. SAME—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

A bookkeeper to whom his employers were indebted testified, in an action based on a mutual account, that he requested his employers to buy and pay for certain goods for his sister, and notify him of the amount, that he might charge himself therewith. This was done, the credit appearing on the company's books as cash items, but, on a personal account kept by plaintiff, the goods purchased were specified. Held sufficient to justify a verdict based on the theory that the account was a mutual account, and therefore the action was not barred, having been brought within the period of limitation after the last item of the account proved.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by George Copriviza against Martin

Rilovich and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Dickerman & Torchiana and Lindsay & Netherton, for appellants. H. C. Wyckoff, for respondent.

HALL, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff sued for a balance alleged to be owing him from defendants upon a mutual, open, and current account. Defendants, among other matters, pleaded the bar of the statute of limitations, and the only questions involved in this appeal concern the correctness of an instruction given by the court upon the subject of what constitutes a mutual, open, and current account, and the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the finding that the account was mutual, open, and current, necessarily involved in the verdict of the jury. The only testimony given on the trial was that of the plaintiff, from which it appears that the defendants were engaged in the business of packing and shipping fruit, and that he was employed by them as bookkeeper. He loaned the defendants two sums of money ($500 and $1,000), paid for stationery supplies various sums of money, and was allowed a salary of $60 a month; the whole aggregating over $3,000. Against this were various cash payments made to plaintiff by defendants at different periods, and three items of credit relied on by respondent as making a case of mutual account, and which we will particularly notice further on in this discussion. Plaintiff, as the bookkeeper for defendants, kept an account with himself, in which he was credited with the money loaned and paid out for defendants, and was charged with cash paid him. Among the items in this account charged against plaintiff are the three items above referred to, and in the account as kept in defendants' ledger by plaintiff they do not appear to be anything but cash payments. Plaintiff also kept a private or personal account of his own of his transactions with defendants in all respects similar to the account kept in defendants' books, except that the three items relied on to sustain the finding of a mutual account are entered as follows:

1900.	Aug. 4, $46.35 sister's clothes, cash $5.00..................	$51 35
	Oct. 12, hat, dress made........	13 00
	Nov. 15, sister's waist..........	3 00

In regard to the item for $13, plaintiff testified: "My sister came out here, and I told Mrs. Martin Rilovich to go with my sister to the dressmaker's to fit her with a dress. She bought her something else that day. It was the hat. The Rilovich Bros. paid $13 to the dressmaker and for my sister's hat. They paid for the hat, and I charged myself with it. Martin Rilovich told me they bought $13 worth for my sister for the dress and hat. I requested Martin Rilovich to pay it, and told him to tell me how much it is so I will charge it to myself." As to the item "Sister's waist $3.00," he said: "My sister went to the store, and Rilovich Bros. paid for it, and told me to charge myself with it, and so I did." He also said that the item of "$46.35 sister's clothes" was a similar transaction. On cross-examination he testified that he told them (Rilovich Bros.) to buy all the clothes his sister needed, and whenever they spent anything to tell him, and he would put it down and charge it to his account. That at his request they paid $13 for a hat and dress for his sister. "The $46.35 item was a similar transaction. * * * All the other items in the account credited to me or charged against Rilovich Bros. are for cash which they paid me from time to time on account." Under this state of the evidence the court, after giving certain instructions requested by defendants, charged the jury as follows: "But if you believe from the evidence that there are credits on the account which are not payments to plaintiff, but are moneys advanced by defendants to third parties at the request of plaintiff, and upon which demands arose in favor of defendants and against plaintiff, and these moneys so advanced were credited on the account, then I charge you that the account between plaintiff and defendants is a mutual, open, and current account, and the plaintiff's demand would not be barred by the statute of limitations until two years after the time of the last item proved in the account on either side." The jury found a verdict for plaintiff in the amount prayed for, and thus must have found that the account was a mutual, open, and current account, for otherwise a large portion of the account would have been barred.

The real question in controversy was as to whether the three items of credits above referred to constituted payments, or were matters of set-off or counter demands upon which an action would lie against plaintiff in favor of defendants. Charges upon one side and mere payments upon the other do not make an account a mutual account. And payments need not be made in money only, but may be made in merchandise where by agreement the same is taken at a fixed value as payment. Mutual accounts are made up of matters of set-off where each party has a demand or right of action against the other. Norton v. Larco, 30 Cal. 127, 89 Am. Dec. 70; Millet v. Bradbury, 109 Cal. 170, 41 Pac. 865; Ross v. Ross, 6 Hun (N. Y.) 80. It is not necessary, to support a mutual account, that there be items of merchandise sold to each party. In Toponce v. Corinne, etc., Co., 6 Utah, 439, 24 Pac. 534, there were demands on plaintiff's side for services rendered and money paid out, and on defendant's side demands for money received on sales of livestock, money loaned, paid out, and expended for plaintiff, and it was held a mutual account, and not barred. See same case, Corinne, etc., Co. v. Toponce, 152 U. S. 405, 14 Sup. Ct. 632, 38 L. Ed. 493.

Where different conclusions may be reasonably drawn by different minds from the same evidence as to whether an account is a mutual account, the question is one for the jury. Abbott's Civil Trial Evidence, 386; Gunn v. Gunn, 74 Ga. 555, 58 Am. Rep. 447. In the case at bar it may be conceded for the purposes of this decision that the evidence would support a finding that the three items above referred to were matters of payment simply. But, on the other hand, we do not think that the evidence necessarily establishes the proposition that these three items of credit were payments simply, and not matters of set-off upon which a demand arose against plaintiff, in favor of defendants. It may be fairly urged that the evidence discloses, not three items of payment to plaintiff, but rather three items of money paid at his request for which demands at once arose in favor of defendants and against plaintiff. The word "payment" was never used by either party to the transactions. The effect of the evidence may be fairly said to be that the plaintiff authorized the purchase of goods for his sister on his account, and requested defendants to pay for the same for him. This, in connection with the testimony that the items were entered in the accounts kept by each party, would make the account a mutual account.

The difference between a payment of money by a debtor to his creditor, and the payment of money by a debtor to a third party at the request of the creditor, may be technical, but it is nevertheless substantial. While in the first case it is presumed to be a payment on the debt, in the second case it may be a payment on the debt if the parties so agree, or it may be a matter of set-off for which an action would lie. Under the evidence in this case it was for the jury to determine what was intended by the parties—whether the moneys paid to third parties for clothing for plaintiff's sister were intended to be payments to plaintiff, or were matters of set-off to be charged to plaintiff and credited to defendants pending the final settlement of the account.

We are therefore of opinion that the court in its instructions correctly submitted the question to the jury, and that there was sufficient evidence to warrant the verdict of the jury.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, P. J; COOPER, J.

4 Cal. App. 213

PEOPLE v. KING.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California Aug. 9, 1906.)

1. Criminal Law—Plea—Prior Conviction—Jurisdiction of Court.

Pen. Code, § 1093, provides that, where a defendant has confessed former conviction, the clerk, in reading the information, shall omit all that relates thereto. Section 1158 provides that, where defendant is found guilty, the jury must also, "unless the answer of defendant admits the charge," find whether he has been previously convicted. Section 1025, repealed by St. 1880, p. 19, c. 47, provided that, where the indictment alleged a previous conviction, defendant must be asked whether he has suffered such previous conviction. Held, that it could not be said that it was an act in excess of jurisdiction for the court, after the repeal of section 1025, to call upon defendant to plead to the charge of prior conviction contained in the indictment.

2. Same—Appeal—Harmless Error.

Since defendant would in no event confess the charge of prior conviction if innocent thereof, and since by confession, if guilty, he would derive a positive advantage before the jury by removing such charge from the consideration of the jury, the action of the court in calling upon him to plead to the charge, in the absence of the jury, was at most a harmless irregularity.

3. Same—Review—Credibility of Witnesses.

Though the character of witnesses may not indicate much moral discrimination, yet, where the jury have accepted their testimony, it is not the province of the Supreme Court to discredit them.

4. Burglary—Felonious Entry—Evidence—Sufficiency.

Defendant, about 2 p. m., went to a house occupied by the W. C. T. U., and having inquired for mail, though he had never before received any at such place, shortly thereafter left. A trunk which had been locked at 9 a. m. was standing in the hall. The owner of the trunk left the house about 9 p. m., and, returning about 10 p. m., missed the trunk. About 11 p m. defendant and another took the trunk to their room on another street, entering the house in haste through a narrow alley, broke it open, and appropriated the contents. Held sufficient to support a finding of felonious entry so as to justify a conviction of burglary.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Burglary, § 97.]

5. Criminal Law—Trial—Instructions—Repetition.

It is not error to refuse to give an instruction as to the conviction of crime on suspicion, which is covered by instructions already given.

6. Same—Matters of Fact.

In a burglary case, an instruction that there was no evidence of any conspiracy between defendant and another would be in violation of Const. art 6, § 19, forbidding a charge with respect to a matter of fact.

7. Burglary—Theft by Another—Instructions—Supporting Evidence—Sufficiency.

Where, in a prosecution for burglary, there is no evidence on which to base a hypothesis that defendant may have received from another, who had stolen it, property which was proved to have been in defendant's possession a short time after the theft, an instruction is properly refused to find for defendant, unless the evidence excludes the hypothesis that he received the property after its theft by another.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; W. P. Lawlor, Judge.

Joseph King was convicted of burglary, and appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph King, in pro. per. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Information for burglary alleging also two prior convictions of burglary of the second degree. Defendant was found guilty by the jury and appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The transcript contains the following entries: "October 14th, 1902. Being called upon to plead, the defendant pleaded not guilty as charged in the information. * * *" The cause came on for trial October 27, 1902, and out of the hearing of the jury panel the district attorney withdrew one of the two charges of prior conviction. The minutes of the court then show: "Being called upon, the defendant, out of the hearing of the jury panel, pleaded guilty to the prior conviction of felony, to wit, burglary of the second degree. * * * Thereupon the defendant excepts to the order of the court requiring the said defendant to plead as to said prior conviction, upon the grounds alleged in the demurrer herein." Thereafter a jury was formed, and, being complete, "the information herein was read to the jury, no reference being made to the said prior convictions contained in said information when said information was read to the jury, and the plea of the defendant of not guilty as charged in the information was stated to the jury." It is claimed by defendant that it was prejudicial error for the court after arraignment (Pen. Code, § 1003) to call upon defendant to plead to the charge of prior conviction; that the court exceeded its authority, there being no statute authorizing the court to ask the defendant whether or not he had suffered a previous conviction; that the particular offense and the previous conviction constituted one charge, a plea of not guilty to which puts in issue every material allegation therein contained, and that the plea of not guilty, first offered by defendant, was the only one admissible under section 1017 of the Penal Code; and that he had a right to rest upon that plea and could be convicted only by a verdict of a jury that tried him—citing cases. The record fails to disclose the grounds of defendant's objection to pleading to the second conviction when called upon. Indeed the record does not show that he objected. It shows only that he excepted upon the grounds stated in his demurrer to the information, but the record does not contain the demurrer. There is nothing in the record sustaining defendant's contention that he was compelled, over his protest, "to either confess or deny the said prior conviction." So far as appears he voluntarily pleaded guilty when called upon. Waiving the apparent failure of defendant to affirmatively show error, we do not think the court exceeded its authority, or, if it did, that defendant was in any degree prejudiced thereby.

Defendant's argument is constructed chiefly on the fact that section 1025 of the Penal Code was repealed in 1880 (St. 1880, p. 19, c. 47), and that until re-enacted in 1905 (St. 1905, p. 773, c. 574) there was no law providing that the defendant "must be asked" whether he has "suffered such previous conviction." The condition of the statute on the subject is shown in People v. McNeill, 118 Cal. 388, 50 Pac. 538. It was held, in People v. Wheatley, 88 Cal. 114, 26 Pac. 95, that where the defendant has been charged with a prior conviction, and has pleaded not guilty, he may be permitted afterwards, in the discretion of the court, to withdraw his plea as to that charge and enter a plea of guilty thereof; "the object doubtless being to keep from the jury on trial all knowledge of the prior convictions, and thus secure a better chance for an acquittal of the main charge." People v. King, 64 Cal. 338, 30 Pac. 1028, relied on by defendant, has since been overruled. People v. Wheatley, supra. Section 1093, Pen. Code, provides that, where the defendant has confessed the charge of former conviction, the clerk in reading the information to the jury "shall omit therefrom all that relates to such previous conviction." Section 1158 of the same Code provides that, if the jury finds a verdict of guilty of the offense charged, the jury "must also, unless the answer of defendant admits the charge, find whether or not he has suffered such previous conviction." It seems to us that, even after the repeal of section 1025, it was within the power of the court, before the trial, to ascertain whether the defendant adhered to his plea of not guilty to the charge of prior conviction, and to give him an opportunity to "admit the charge" if willing to do so. If he "admits" or "confesses" the charge, the sections above referred to give him protection from any resultant prejudice with the jury, for his admission removes that part of the information from the knowledge of the jury. It is inconceivable that he would confess the charge if innocent of it, and by confession, if guilty, he derives a positive advantage before the jury. It was said, in People v. McNeill, supra: "No doubt it would be better for the record to show that the defendant formally made confession in the form of a plea entered upon the minutes contemporaneously with the making of the confession, but it cannot be said that the Code requires such procedure." But whether or not the court was authorized by any statute to "call upon" the defendant to plead to the charge of prior conviction, in doing so there was the exercise of no power that can be said to be in excess of jurisdiction. At most it was but an irregularity in procedure which plainly, not only worked no prejudice, but was a positive benefit to defendant. Besides the defendant could have stood upon his original plea of not guilty, or he could have again pleaded not guilty to the prior conviction. The re-enactment of section 1025, while not affecting the present case, makes the question no longer of importance, if it ever had a serious aspect.

Upon the facts: There was evidence tending to show that, some time between 2 p. m. and 4 p. m. of April 21, 1902, defendant went to a house at No. 132 McAllister street, San Francisco, in which the Woman's Christian Temperance Union had rooms. In going to these rooms he passed through a hall in which was a trunk containing sundry articles and belonging to one Mrs. Sheppard. He inquired at these rooms whether there were any letters for him, though he had never before received any there, and shortly after left the house. The trunk had been in this hall for some time, and its owner testified that she took some articles from it on the morning of the 21st of April and left it locked. She went out of the house about 9 o'clock that night and returned about 10 o'clock and then missed the trunk. The same night about 11 o'clock defendant and one Hamilton, a codefendant, took the trunk to their room, at 835B Howard street, entering the house in the rear by a narrow alley, running from Tehama street to the rear of the premises. The trunk was locked, but defendant opened it with a cold chisel and distributed some of the contents to inmates of the house to whom he said the trunk was his. The circumstances of his bringing the trunk to the house and breaking it open, his conduct two nights later when several police officers went to arrest him, his attempt to evade arrest, the hiding of the cold chisel with which he forced the trunk open, his final arrest in a dark place where he had concealed himself, and other facts tending to show guilty possession of the stolen property, were brought out by the testimony of the police officers and by two women witnesses who occupied part of the Howard street house.

It is strenuously urged that these women were self-confessedly immoral persons and were accomplices, and the rule as to the latter is invoked against their testimony. We find nothing in the record showing that they were accomplices. Their character for truth and veracity was not assailed, and, while their life was not of a character to indicate the possession of much discrimination as to their companionships or moral conduct, the jury must have accepted their testimony, and it is not the province of this court to discredit them.

It must be admitted that the evidence of a felonious entry to commit larceny is not strong, and the claim is made that there is an entire absence of evidence pointing in that direction. There is evidence, however, that defendant entered the McAllister street house and had an opportunity to steal the trunk and had it in his possession a few hours later under circumstances indicating its theft by him. There was sufficient evidence to justify the jury in its inference that the McAllister street house was entered by defendant with felonious intent. It has been held that, where the defendant entered a dry goods store during business hours, and while there was caught in the act of attempting to steal a garment, the jury were warranted in finding him guilty of burglarious entry. People v. Brittain, 142 Cal. 8, 75 Pac. 314, 100 Am. St. Rep. 95. The statute applies to a dwelling. Pen. Code, § 459. See People v. Flynn, 73 Cal. 511, 15 Pac. 102; People v. Smith, 86 Cal. 238, 24 Pac. 988; People v. Lang, 142 Cal. 482, 76 Pac. 232. The brief of defendant is signed by himself and purports to be the work of his own hand. It possesses the professional earmarks of the lawyer and is clearly not the work of a layman. We are asked to scrutinize instructions, requested by defendant and refused by the court, numbered 29, 48, and 49, as "he feels that they should have been given," though no reasons are given for thus feeling. Instruction 29 was that the law does not permit a conviction of crime on suspicion. This was properly refused as covered by the other instructions, and particularly instruction 13 given at defendant's request. Instruction 48 was that there was no evidence of any conspiracy between defendant and any other person to commit the crime charged. This instruction, if given, would have been charging the jury on the matter of fact, which is forbidden (Const. art. 6, § 19), and would not have been responsive to any issue in the case. Instruction 49 was as follows: "If the evidence before you does not reasonably exclude the hypothesis that defendant might have received the trunk and contents after they had been taken by another from the premises, 132 McAllister street, then your verdict must be that the defendant is not guilty, unless the evidence satisfies your minds beyond all reasonable doubt that defendant aided and abetted the person who took the property." Much the same may be said of this instruction as has been said of No. 48. There was no evidence on which to base the theory of theft by any other person, or that defendant received it from some other person. The court gave instructions 46 and 47, at defendant's request, with some proper modifications, which were sufficient to direct the minds of the jury to the facts proven as to the possession of the trunk by defendant and their legal effect.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

NOBLE v. LEARNED et al. (Civ. 235.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 31, 1906.)

1. JURY—RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL—LEGAL OR EQUITABLE—ACTIONS OR ISSUES.

A suit to determine title to stock in a building association, to cancel the certificate representing the stock, to restrain the payment of money on account of the certificate, and to require the issuance to plaintiff of a new certificate for the stock, is a suit in equity, and a jury trial is not demandable as of right under Code Civ. Proc. § 592, providing that, in cases other than actions for the recovery of specific real or personal property, etc., issues of fact must be tried by the court, subject to its power to order issues to be tried by a jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 31, Cent. Dig. Jury, §§ 35-47.]

2. GIFTS—ASSIGNMENTS OF CORPORATE STOCK—DELIVERY.

An owner of stock in a building association gave to the secretary thereof a list of the persons to whom she wanted the stock assigned, and assignments were made on the back of the certificates. The secretary was given possession of the certificates subject to the owner's order, and told to hold them until the owner's death, and then deliver them to the assignees. A few months afterwards the owner died. Held, that title did not vest in the assignees, but remained in the owner.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; F. H. Smith, Judge.

Action by Arthur M. Noble, as executor of Deborah H. Lee against D. A. Learned and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, for appellant. Plummer & Dunlap, for respondent. Budd & Thompson, for Building & Loan Association.

BUCKLES, J. This action was prosecuted to determine the title to certain stock in the San Joaquin Valley Building & Loan Association, and for the delivery up and cancellation of the certificate representing the same, for an injunction restraining the payment of money on account of said certificates, and for the issuance to plaintiff of certificates of said stock. Judgment was for plaintiff, and the appeal is from the judgment.

The first error assigned is that the court refused the defendants' demand for a jury. Whatever view may be taken of the case as to other matters, it is an equity case, and there was therefore no error in denying the defendants' demand for a jury. Code Civ. Proc. § 592; Meek v. De La Tour (Cal. App.) 83 Pac. 300; Ashton v. Heggerty, 130 Cal. 517, 62 Pac. 934. The complaint alleges that Deborah H. Lee died intestate March 12, 1903, and at that time she was the owner and entitled to 40 shares of the capital stock of the San Joaquin Valley Building & Loan Association, in a certificate numbered 465, and that one Gennis H. Learned, upon the death of said Deborah H. Lee, wrongfully and unlawfully took possession of said certificate of stock, had the same canceled and a new certificate issued to her in her own name for 39 shares and received $100 in money for the other shares. That said Gennis H. Learned died testate, and the said certificate of stock is now held by D. A. Learned, the executor of the last will of said Gennis H. Learned. Alleges demand made, and the value of the property to be $4,000. The prayer is that the certificate of stock No. 559 be delivered up by said defendant, that it be canceled and the San Joaquin Valley Building & Loan Association issue to plaintiff certificates in due form evidencing the ownership of plaintiff to said 39 shares, and also the return of the $100. The San Joaquin Valley Building & Loan Association answered by general denial. D. A. Learned answered by denying specifically, admitting the death of Deborah H. Lee and Gennis H. Learned and the proceedings taken to settle their respective estates, and, further answering, alleges that on October 17, 1902, Deborah H. Lee duly assigned by indorsement all said shares of stock to Gennis H. Learned, and then delivered the same so indorsed to A. M. Noble, to be held by him in trust for the said Gennis H. Learned as long as the said assignor should live, and at her death to me delivered to the said assignee; that said Noble accepted said trust; that the said trust was not revoked, and was in force when the said Deborah H. Lee died; that after her death, and on or about the 20th of March, 1903, Noble delivered said certificates of stock to Gennis H. Learned, and she then had said certificate for 40 shares canceled and the new certificate No. 559 issued to her for 39 shares in said association, receiving $100 in money. Prays that the said trust be declared valid, and defendant be adjudged the owner and entitled to the possession of said stock. The court found that Deborah H. Lee never made any gift of said shares of stock to Gennis H. Learned and "never created any trust therein, and never parted with any title, ownership, or control of said property during her lifetime, and the property and the whole thereof was, at the time of her death, the property of the said Deborah H. Lee, deceased, and at the date of her death constituted and still constitutes a part and parcel of the estate of said deceased."

This finding is based upon the testimony of Arthur M. Noble, of whom she purchased the 40 shares of the capital stock of the San Joaquin Valley Building & Loan Association. Mrs. Deborah H. Lee was sick, had about $1,600 which she wanted placed where she could have the income from it and use any part of the principal in case she needed it at any time. In negotiating the purchase of said shares of stock with the witness A. M. Noble, who was the secretary of the San Joaquin Valley Building & Loan Association, she informed him that this was the only money she had, and that she did not want to put it out of her control. This certificate of stock No. 465, with others, was issued to her with the assurance to her by Mr. Noble that she could retain control of them and draw money on them. The certificates were then issued in the name of Deborah H. Lee, and given to her. She assigned them to different persons, assigning No. 465 to Gennis H. Learned. They were then by Mrs. Lee returned to Mr. Noble, who testified in relation thereto as follows: "I left them [certificates] at the house with her. Two or three days subsequent to that she sent for me and wanted me to take these certificates and pass book and keep them for her, subject to her order—call. She said if she did not get well, and anything happened to her, to notify the people to whom these certificates had been assigned and send for them and deliver them to them. She said she would use more or less of it, and what was left at the time of her death was to be given to the people mentioned by her. In pursuance of that, I presume I took the certificates. I took certificate No. 465 which has been read in evidence. After this occurrence I had occasion to visit Mrs. Lee again. She sent for me, because she said she needed some money and wanted to surrender one of those certificates of stock she held. I took the certificate No. 480 for one share out with me." After this he went out to her house with said certificates as she desired to get money on them. He continues: "After the cancellation of the last certificate, on the 28th day of February, 1903, the remainder of the certificates were handed back to me. Mrs. Lee told me to take and keep them the same as I had done before—to keep them for her. There were 19 certificates of this stock, and all issued in the name of Deborah H. Lee. She afterwards, but on the same day, gave me a list in writing of the persons to whom she wanted the stock assigned, and the assignments were made on the back of the certificates."

It thus clearly appears that Deborah H. Lee did not and never intended to part with control of her title to said stock while she lived. On March 12, 1903, she died without having revoked said assignments, or any of them, The certificates were then in the safe in the possession of Noble, who afterwards delivered certificate No. 465 to Gennis H. Learned, she being the one named therein as assignee. The finding is warranted by the evidence. Noble v. Garden, 146 Cal. 225, 79 Pac. 883. This, then, disposes of the issue that Noble held the certificate as trustee, against the contention of appellant. A similar case to the one before us, and involving the same question as to delivery and title of others of these identical certificates of stock, was well considered and decided in Noble v. Garden, 146 Cal. 225, 79 Pac. 883. The court there held under the same state of facts that Deborah H. Lee retained control and dominion of these certificates; and that the title did not vest in the parties to whom the assignments were made because she expressly stated it should remain in deceased. Upon the authority of Noble v. Garden, supra, the judgment of the lower court must be upheld.

Judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. McMAHILL. (Cr. 54.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 15, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 4, 1906.)

EMBEZZLEMENT—INDICTMENT—CONVERSION.

Under Pen. Code, §§ 950-952, requiring an indictment to be direct and certain, and to contain such a statement of the facts that a person of common understanding may know what is intended, an indictment charging that an agent and servant did "willfully, unlawfully, and fraudulently," "appropriate to his own use" certain money of his employer does not charge an embezzlement under section 504, which requires the appropriation to be to a "use or purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his trust."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 18, Cent. Dig. Embezzlement, §§ 51, 52.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

I. B. McMahill was convicted of embezzlement, and appeals. Reversed, with directions.

C. F. Hanlon, G. W. Waldorf, E. Coolidge, and W. A. Bowden, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

COOPER, J. The information charged as follows: "The said defendant, on or about the 25th day of April, A. D. 1905, at the county and state aforesaid, did willfully, unlawfully, and fraudulently, and while said defendant was the secretary, agent, and servant of the San José Chamber of Commerce, an association, appropriate to his own use the sum of $901.67 in lawful money of the United States, the property of said San José Chamber of Commerce, which money was on said date in the control and care, and had come into the control and care of said defendant solely by virtue of his said employment as such secretary, agent, and servant." To this information the defendant interposed a demurrer upon the grounds that it does not substantially conform to the requirements of sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code, and that the facts therein stated do not constitute a public offense. The demurrer was overruled, and defendant entered his plea of not guilty. After trial he was convicted and sentenced to a term of two years in the state prison. This appeal is from the judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The important and controlling question in the case is as to whether or not the demurrer should have been sustained. It is conceded that the district attorney in the information intended to charge the crime of embezzlement under section 504 of the Penal Code, which, so far as material here, is as follows: "Every * * * clerk, servant, or agent of any association * * * who fraudulently appropriates to any use or purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his trust, any property which he has in his possession or under his control by virtue of his trust * * * is guilty of embezzlement." The gist of the offense under the statute is the appropriation to a use or purpose not in the due and lawful execution of the trust. The information must charge the offense in ordinary language, so that a person of common understanding may know by reading it what is intended, and the facts stated in the information must necessarily charge a crime. If the facts stated may be true, under certain circumstances, and yet not constitute a crime the information will be held insufficient. The information in this case, when divested of the adverbs "unlawfully, feloniously, and fraudulently" simply states the fact that defendant appropriated to his own use $901.67, the property of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, which had come into his control and care by virtue of his employment as such secretary, agent, and servant. The conditions of the trust are not stated, nor is there any attempt to state them. The object and purpose for which the money came into defendant's possession is not stated. No attempt is made to state that defendant appropriated the money for a purpose not in the due and lawful execution of the trust. It may, for aught that appears in the information, have come into his control for his own use. There are many ways in which an agent might lawfully come into control of the money of his principal for his own use. We must presume that defendant is not guilty of any crime, and that he came into the control of the money for his own uses and purposes, and not for uses and purposes which may have existed in the imagination of the pleader. If the money was given to him for his salary, it was for his own uses and purposes. If it came into his control to reimburse him for moneys laid out and expended for his principal, it was for his own use. While it is ordinarily sufficient to charge a crime substantially in the language of the statute defining it, yet the information cannot be aided by inference or presumption. We cannot presume that the use of money which had come into the control of defendant was "not in the due and lawful execution of his trust."

In all the cases which we have examined under the section the informations which have been held valid allege that the money was appropriated to a use not in the due and lawful execution of the trust, or words of similar import. In People v. Gale, 77 Cal. 120, 19 Pac. 231, the indictment alleged that "defendant did then and there, as such administrator, fraudulently appropriate to his own use and purpose the sum of $94, which said money then and there belonged to the estate of the said Warren Polley, deceased." The ruling of the court below sustaining a demurrer to the indictment was upheld. In People v. Ward, 134 Cal. 301, 66 Pac. 372, where the words used were that defendant did "feloniously convert, embezzle, and appropriate to his own use, contrary to his said trust as such officer as aforesaid," the information was held sufficient upon the ground that "contrary to his trust" was the equivalent of "not in the due and lawful execution of his trust." In People v. Shearer, 143 Cal. 66, 76 Pac. 813, it was held that the charge that defendant fraudulently appropriated the sum of $105, the property of Sonoma county, which had come under his control by virtue of his trust as county physician was insufficient, because the term "county physician" did not show that defendant held any trust relation to the county. It is there said: "Embezzlement is purely a statutory offense. Under the provisions of our statute it is essential to the commission thereof that there should be a fraudulent appropriation of property to some use or purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his trust by one into whose possession it has come by reason of some relation of trust or confidence mentioned in the statute, and existing between him and another, and it is therefore necessary that an indictment or information for embezzlement should allege the trust relation, in order that it may be determined therefrom whether there has been any such violation of a trust or confidence reposed in the defendant." The rule is that it must clearly appear from the facts alleged that a crime has been committed. People v. Terrill, 127 Cal. 99, 59 Pac. 836.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the court below directed to make an order sustaining the demurrer to the information.

GUTHRIE v. SUPREME TENT KNIGHTS OF THE MACCABEES OF THE WORLD. (Civ. 284.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 31, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 28, 1906.)

1. INSURANCE—POWERS OF MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE ASSOCIATION — CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION.

A certificate of insurance provided for one assessment on the membership not exceeding $2,000 as a benefit to his daughter on satisfactory proof of his death, and, in case of total or permanent disability "or on attaining the age of 70 years," he would be entitled to receive one-half of the endowment as provided by the laws of the order. Held, that such contract should be construed to entitle the insured to one-half of the endowment in case of permanent disability, of which the attaining the age of 70 years was to be conclusive proof, and, as so construed, the contract was within the charter powers of the society, which was authorized to make payment of monthly and weekly sums in case of disability, etc.

2. SAME — BY-LAWS — CHANGE—RETROACTIVE OPERATION.

The act under which a mutual benefit insurance society was organized provided that the trustees should adopt by-laws, but that no by-laws adopted, affecting the rights and benefits belonging to or to be derived by the members of such corporation, should be changed by the trustees. Held, that by-laws adopted by trustees which materially changed the benefits to be derived under contracts written by the association would be construed not to apply to contracts made prior to their adoption.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Francis B. Guthrie against the Supreme Tent Knights of the Maccabees of the World. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank James and D. D. Aitken (De Vere Hall, of counsel), for appellant. E. M. Guthrie, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Action upon a written agreement. Judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, from which judgment and order defendant appeals.

The defendant is a corporation created under a legislative act of the state of Michigan, which authorized the incorporation of associations for certain purposes, among which were that of "* * * securing a certain sum of money weekly or monthly to any member disabled by sickness or other disability." The act required that persons desiring to form such associations must file in certain public offices articles of association, which, among other things, should state the business of the corporation and the terms and conditions of membership. The act further provided that the trustees of such association named in the articles should adopt by-laws, but that no by-laws adopted affecting the rights and benefits belonging to or to be derived by the members of such corporation should be changed by such trustees. Pursuant to this act, certain persons, in the year 1885, filed with the proper officers the articles of association described, defining the purposes of the association, among other things, to be to give material aid to its members; to establish a benefit fund or funds from which, on satisfactory evidence of the death or disability of a member who has complied with all its lawful requirements, the sum of $2,000, in case of death, shall be paid to his family, orphans, dependents, or legal heirs, as such member may direct; and, in the case of total or permanent disability, such sum as may be designated in the endowment laws of such corporation. One of these endowment laws provides: "A total and permanent disability to perform or direct any kind of labor or business, or upon reaching the age of 70 years, shall entitle a member holding a certificate of endowment, so disabled or aged, to the payment of one-half of the endowment to which he would be entitled at death, provided, however, that in case of a total and permanent disability, satisfactory proofs must be submitted to the supreme medical examiner and board of trustees before payment is made, showing that such disability is permanent; and that it did not arise from his voluntary act, or from intemperance or any immoral or unlawful conduct on his part, or from the violation of the laws of the country; and provided further, that the member shall have paid all dues and assessments from date of initiation to date of disability, or upon reaching 70 years of age. From the date of such payment such member shall only pay pro rata or one-half as much at each assessment as prior thereto. On the death of such member his heirs or assigns shall receive his endowment, less the amount which may have been paid as provided above."

Plaintiff, during the year 1885, when this act and the by-laws and regulations above mentioned were all in force, became a member of the defendant, and there was issued to him a certificate of membership, which certified that he was a member and a beneficiary in good standing, and that, in accordance with and under the provisions of the laws governing the order, he is entitled to receive one assessment on the membership, not exceeding in amount the sum of $2,000, as a benefit to his daughter, upon satisfactory proof of his death and a surrender of the certificate, provided he shall have, in every particular, complied with all the rules and regulations of the order. In case of total or permanent disability, or upon attaining the age of 70 years, he will be entitled to receive one-half of the said endowment, as provided in the laws of the order. Under this agreement plaintiff continued the payment of all dues and performed all obligations devolving upon him thereunder; and in the year 1905, when he arrived at the age of 70 years, claimed payment of one-half of the endowment; and upon defendant's refusal to pay, instituted this action. It appears from the record that after this certificate was issued, without the consent or agreement upon plaintiff's part, the by-law hereinbefore referred to was changed in material respects, notably that instead of paying $2,000 when permanent disability should ensue, the defendant would pay 10 per cent. of the endowment fund annually during the existence of such permanent disability. It is found by the court that plaintiff and defendant both believed, when the certificate was issued, that the corporation possessed the power to issue the same in the manner of its issuance, and to enter into the contract thereby made, and that plaintiff, without knowledge upon his part that want of authority so to do was claimed by defendant, paid and defendant received, during the 20 years of his membership, all dues and assessments levied or assessed against him. The court further finds that plaintiff had no actual notice of any changes in the by-laws affecting his rights. The trial court also finds that the defendant corporation, from its organization up until 1899, provided for the payment of benefits to its members when they reached the age of 70 years; and further, that assessments had been made and funds existed out of which plaintiff's claim was payable, and that he was entitled under his contract to receive $1,000, with interest from February 15, 1905, and the sum of $6, assessments overpaid; for which it rendered judgment.

Defendant's principal contention upon this appeal is that the contract sued upon was ultra vires and void; that the stipulation therein that payment should be made at the age of 70 years was not authorized by the act under which the association was formed; and in support of this contention cites as authority certain decisions of the Supreme Court of Michigan, construing a similar act, in which it was held that a contract to pay a stipulated sum in a hundred months was ultra vires and void; and cites other authorities in support of the proposition that if the contract is ultra vires the corporation is not estopped to deny its character. This last proposition is a much controverted one, and the converse thereof has been held by our own Supreme Court in numerous cases. We are of opinion, however, that this question is not necessarily involved upon this appeal; for it is not apparent from the language of the agreement that want of authority existed.

Section 1643 of the Civil Code of this state provides: "A contract must receive such an interpretation as will make it lawful, operative, definite, reasonable, and capable of being carried into effect, if it can be done without violating the intention of the parties"; and section 3541, Civil Code, provides that "an interpretation which gives effect is preferred to one which makes void." The contract involved in this case is susceptible of two constructions: One that a payment is absolutely due when the age of 70 years is attained; the other, that payment is due when permanent and total disability ensues, and that the attainment of 70 years is an evidential fact of such permanent and total disability. Our general government, in its administration of the pension laws of this country, has, through its duly authorized officials, promulgated a rule based upon a statement that old age is an infirmity, the average nature and extent of which the Pension Bureau has established with reasonable certainty, that in the adjudication of pension claims which are payable on account of disability, "it shall be taken and considered as an evidential fact, if the contrary does not appear, and if all other legal requirements are properly met, that when a claimant has passed the age of * * * seventy years" he is entitled to the full pension for total disability. That this contract was made with reference to the intent that 70 years should be a conclusive evidential fact of permanent disability is obvious from the by-law of the corporation, adopted a fortnight before the statute was amended, in which are found provisions with regard to old-age disability as distinguished from disability arising from other causes, and further provisions in relation to permanent disability benefits, whether the same were from disease, accident, or old age, and that disability claimed before such age must be established by proof; and we think that a reasonable and proper construction of this contract, one which will give it effect and carry out the intention of the parties, is to say that, under this contract, total and permanent disability was the event which matured the claim, and that the 70 years mentioned therein was but a term employed as establishing by agreement an age when such condition was conclusively presumed to exist. This construction was not permissible in the cases before the Supreme Court of Michigan, and in many other cases referred to by counsel for appellant; for in those cases the sum was payable within less than 9 years from the issuance of the certificate, regardless of age or the physical condition of the member, and it was apparent that the intent was to make the expiration of a fixed time the event which should mature the claim, and not disability, total or partial. Entertaining these views, we are led to the conclusion that the act authorizing the payment of a sum when disability should arise, even though it limited such payment to monthly or weekly sums, is sufficient warrant, coupled with the other provisions of the act relative to the articles of association, and the by-laws authorized, to render this contract within the powers of the corporation. Certain it is that the power to contract with reference to a payment upon disability is given, and none of the authorities cited go to the extent of determining that where the general power to do the act is given, a corporation is not estopped when the manner of the exercise of the power only is involved.

Appellant next contends that the subsequent changes in the endowment laws had the effect to alter and vary this contract. We find nothing in the contract or record which would indicate an intention upon the part of either of the contracting parties to reserve, or to permit to be reserved, to the association the right to alter or modify the written agreement originally executed. Nor do we find anything in this subsequent change of the by-laws which of necessity changed previously existing contracts; in fact, the statute recognizes the trustees as alone having power to enact by-laws and by its previous by-laws such trustees are prohibited from making any change affecting the rights or benefits of members. A reading of these modifications of the by-laws would indicate that they only purport to be, and we think their only legal effect could be, to affect the relations of those contracting after their enactment. There is nothing suggested in the nature of the amendments or modifications of these by-laws which necessarily alters the terms of the written agreement, and it is not claimed that any executed parol agreement had such effect. The authorities cited in the appellant's brief, namely, Supreme Council v. M'Alearney, 135 Fed. 72, 67 C. C. A. 546, and Clymer v. Supreme Council (C. C.) 138 Fed. 470, to the effect that one contracting party must be presumed to have consented to the abrogation of the provisions in the certificate providing for the payment of a fixed sum, if no action was taken by him after notice of such change, even if accepted as correct expositions of the law, are not controlled in a case where the plaintiff had no knowledge that the defendant intended to dispute the validity or amount on maturity of his claim. In so far as any constructive notice is concerned, the notice in the statute that no by-law could be changed affecting plaintiff's rights should certainly operate as an assurance to him that changes made in such by-laws were not intended to affect his vested rights as to benefits due him from membership.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

4 Cal. App. 228

BECKETT v. MORSE et al. (Civ. 193.)

(Court of Appeal, First District. California. Aug. 15, 1906. Rehearing Denied Sept. 13, 1906.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—PROPOSAL FOR BIDS—NOTICE—STATUTES—COMPLIANCE.

A resolution ordering a public work was passed by a city council December 16th. On the same day it directed its clerk to post for five days a notice thereof, with specifications, inviting sealed proposals, and to cause such notice to be published for five days. The notice was posted and published. On or before December 30th following several sealed proposals were presented, and the city council in open session examined the proposals and by resolution awarded the contract to one of the bidders. Held, that the council complied with Street Improvement Act, § 5 (St. 1891, p. 199), providing that, before the awarding of any contract by a city council for doing any work, it shall cause notice, with specifications, to be posted for five days and to be published in a newspaper published in the city, etc., and the fact that the council did not fix a day or hour prior to which, or at which, it would receive or open proposals for doing the work, nor direct its clerk to fix such day or hour, did not invalidate the assessment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, §§ 857, 860.]

2. SAME—ACTION FOR STREET ASSESSMENT—EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where, in an action on a street assessment, the court found that the averments in the complaint of the making and recording of the assessment, warrant, and diagram, with the affidavit of demand and nonpayment, were true, plaintiff was prima facie entitled to recover, and defendant had the burden of showing a defect in the prior proceedings sufficient to overcome the prima facie case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 1282.]

3. PLEADING—CONCLUSION OF LAW.

An allegation, in an action on a street assessment, that the superintendent of streets did not make the assessment in the manner prescribed by law, without setting forth the particulars in which the assessment was defective, is but an averment of a legal conclusion, and not of a fact.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, § 19.]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — ACTION ON STREET ASSESSMENT—DEFENSES.

An averment that a lot was not assessed for a public improvement for any one of the separate sums stated in the complaint in an action on a street assessment is insufficient as a defense to an action for the aggregate of the sums, where such separate sums could have been properly assessed against the lot for its proportion of the costs of the entire work.

5. SAME—ASSESSMENT—VALIDITY—REVIEW.

Street Improvement Act, subd. 7 (St. 1891, p. 202), provides that, where a subdivision street terminates in another street, the expense of the work done on one-half of the width of the subdivision street shall be assessed on the lots fronting on such termination. A city ordered the construction of a sewer in an avenue. A lot against which an assessment was made was described as situated on the easterly side of the avenue. The lot was assessed to pay for frontage work and for termination work on the easterly half of the avenue opposite the termination of certain streets. Held, that the assessment was in accordance with the statute; but, if the facts were otherwise, or if by reason of the position of the streets the assessment for termination work was not authorized, the remedy was by appeal to the city council.

6. SAME.

Where a lot fronting on an improvement was assessed for more than its lawful proportion of the cost, whether by reason of an erroneous computation or an improper distribution of the cost on the lands assessable, error was waived by a failure to appeal to the city council, and in the absence of such appeal the objection could not be made for the first time in an action to enforce the assessment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 1269.]

7. SAME.

The validity of a street assessment is not impaired by the fact that the proportion of the cost for which a lot is chargeable is subdivided into several amounts; the cost of the entire work being apportioned in separate amounts to the several portions of the territory chargeable therewith in accordance with their relative position to the work, and the several amounts so apportioned being assessed against the lots within the respective territories chargeable therewith.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Action by John P. Beckett against Harry N. Morse and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Fitzgerald & Abbott, for appellant. R. M. F. Soto, for respondents.

HARRISON, P. J. Action upon a street assessment in the city of Oakland. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff has appealed therefrom upon the judgment roll without any bill of exceptions. The complaint is in the ordinary form and sets forth all the facts necessary to entitle the plaintiff to recover judgment. The court found that, with the exception of certain facts specifically found upon issues raised by the answer of the defendants, all of the facts alleged in the complaint are true.

1. In their answer to the complaint the defendants allege that the city council did not, by resolution or otherwise, fix a day or hour prior to which, or at which, it would receive or open or consider any proposal for doing the work mentioned in the complaint, and did not authorize or direct its clerk to fix such day or hour; and one of the special findings of fact made by the court was in accordance with this averment. Section 5 of the street improvement act, in force at the time these proceedings were had (St. 1891, p. 199), is as follows: "Before the awarding of any contract by the city council for doing any work authorized by this act the city council shall cause notice with specifications to be posted conspicuously for five days on or near the council chamber door of said council, inviting sealed proposals or bids for doing the work ordered, and shall also cause notice of said work, inviting said proposals, and referring to the specifications posted or on file, to be published for two days in a daily, semiweekly or weekly newspaper printed and circulated in said city, designated by the council for said purpose, and in case there is no newspaper published in said city then it shall only be posted as hereinbefore provided. * * * Said proposals or bids shall be delivered to the clerk of said city council, and said council shall in open session examine and publicly declare the same." The council is not required by this section to limit the time within which the proposals may be delivered to its clerk, or to fix the day or hour at which it will open or consider them; nor is it required to direct the clerk to designate in his notice inviting such proposals any day or hour before or at which they shall be delivered to him. All that is required by this section is that, before a contract shall be awarded, the council shall cause a notice of the work ordered, with specifications, inviting sealed proposals for doing the same, to be posted conspicuously for five days, and shall also cause to be published for two days a notice of said work, inviting said proposals, and referring to the specifications posted or on file; and that, at an open session of the council held after the completion of the posting and publishing of said notice, it shall open, examine, and publicly declare the same. Thereupon it may award the contract to the lowest responsible bidder. Edwards v. Berlin, 123 Cal. 544, 56 Pac. 432; Belser v. Allman, 134 Cal. 399, 66 Pac. 492. The resolution ordering the work was passed December 16, 1895, and on the same day the council directed its clerk to post and keep posted conspicuously for five days a notice thereof, with specifications, inviting sealed proposals for doing the work, and in like manner cause such notice to be published for five days. It is alleged in the complaint, and not denied in the answer, that such posting and publication were properly had, commencing December 21, 1895. On or before December 30th several sealed proposals were delivered to the clerk, one of which was so delivered by the assignor of the plaintiff, and on February 13, 1896, the city council in open session opened and examined all said proposals, and publicly declared the same, and afterwards on January 20, 1896, by its resolution, awarded the contract for doing said work to the plaintiff's assignor. As in these proceedings the city council strictly complied with all of the above provisions of section 5, the fact which is above alleged in the answer and found by the court had no tendency to impair the validity of the assessment.

2. The improvement ordered by the city council was the construction of a sewer in Newton avenue from the center line of Fourth avenue to the center line of Lester avenue produced—10 inches in diameter from the center of Fourth avenue to the center of Athol avenue produced, and 8 inches in diameter from the center of Athol avenue to the center of Lester avenue produced. The complaint alleges that the lot described therein was numbered in the assessment and diagram as No. 43, and was assessed to pay $96.63 for frontage work, $27.80 for Lester avenue termination work, $16.05 for Athol avenue termination work, and $31.90 for work opposite the termination of Watson avenue, making in the aggregate $172.98 for which the lien is claimed. The finding of the court that the averments in the complaint of the making and recording of the assessment, warrant, and diagram, with the affidavit of demand and nonpayment, are true, in the absence of any other evidence, entitled the plaintiff to a judgment in his favor, and threw upon the defendants the burden of showing some defect in the prior proceedings sufficient to overcome the prima facie effect of those facts. Belser v. Allman, 134 Cal. 399, 66 Pac. 492; Raisch v. Hildebrandt, 146 Cal. 721, 81 Pac. 21. "If the defendant would rely upon any error, defect, or irregularity that may have supervened in the proceedings subsequent to the ordering of the work, the burden is upon him, not only to allege such defect, but also to show the same by affirmative evidence." Belser v. Allman, supra. In their answer the defendants deny, upon their information and belief, that the superintendent of streets made the assessment referred to in the complaint, or that the said assessment had any diagram attached thereto, and in like manner deny that the said assessment was made in the manner or form prescribed by law, and deny that, by or according to said assessment or diagram, the lot described in the complaint and therein numbered as 43 was assessed for any one of the separate sums stated in the complaint or for any sum. Upon this issue the court found that the superintendent of streets made and issued the assessment, together with the warrant and diagram attached thereto, in the manner and form as stated in the complaint, except that upon the assessment there was but one number, viz., 43, to represent the whole of the lot described in the complaint; that upon the diagram attached thereto said lot is exhibited as a single lot, and has but one number, viz., 43, to correspond with the same number on the assessment; and that upon the assessment there were assessed against said lot the four separate and distinct sums mentioned in the complaint. The allegation of the defendant that the superintendent of streets did not make the assessment in the manner or form prescribed by law, in the absence of setting forth the particulars in which it is defective, was but the averment of a legal conclusion and not of a fact. The finding of the court that it was made as alleged in the complaint with certain exceptions leaves only the character of these exceptions to be considered.

The averment that the lot was not assessed for any one of the separate sums stated in the complaint was insufficient as a defense to an action for the aggregate of these sums if such separate sums could have been properly assessed against the lot for its proportion of the cost of the entire work. The diagram in connection with which the assessment is made is not set forth in the record, and there is no averment in the answer of any fact tending to impeach the correctness of either of the several assessments against the lot numbered therein as 43 for a portion of the cost of the entire work. If there could be any circumstances under which such an assessment could be proper, it will be assumed that such circumstances existed in the present case. Subdivision 7 of the street improvement act (Stat. 1891, p. 202) provides that where a subdivision street or avenue terminates in another street or avenue the expenses of the work done on one half of the width of the subdivision street or avenue shall be assessed upon the lots fronting on such termination. Lot 43, against which the assessment herein was made, is described in the complaint as situated on the easterly side of Newton avenue; and it is in harmony with the terms of the assessment as set forth in the complaint that Lester avenue, Athol avenue, and Watson avenue are subdivision streets terminating in Newton avenue on its westerly side, and that the several amounts assessed against lot 43 for "termination" work were so assessed for the work done on the easterly half of Newton avenue opposite the termination of those streets. In such case the assessment would not be void upon its face, but would be in accordance with the provisions of said subdivision 7. If the facts were otherwise, or if, by reason of the position of such avenues, the assessment upon the lot for work done opposite their terminations was not authorized, that was a matter to be determined by evidence outside of the assessment, and could be remedied only by an appeal to the city council. McDonald v. Conniff, 99 Cal. 386, 34 Pac. 71; Ryan v. Altschul, 103 Cal. 176, 37 Pac. 339; Bates v. Adamson (Cal. App.) 84 Pac. 51. The defendants' lot fronted upon the improvement, and was assessable for its proportion of the cost of the work. If it was assessed for more than its lawful proportion of such cost, whether by reason of an erroneous computation, or an improper distribution of the cost upon the lands assessable therefor (Wells v. Wood, 114 Cal. 255, 46 Pac. 96), the error was waived by their failing to appeal to the city council. In the absence of such appeal the objection cannot be made for the first time in an action to enforce the assessment.

The validity of the assessment was not impaired by the fact that the proportion of the cost for which lot 43 is chargeable is subdivided into several amounts as alleged. The cost of the entire work is apportioned in separate amounts to the several portions of the territory chargeable therewith in accordance with their relative position to the work, as is required by the provisions of the street improvement act, and the several amounts so apportioned are assessed against the lots within the respective territories chargeable therewith under the provisions of the act. The assessment does not cease to be a single assessment by reason of this apportionment, nor is the lot of the defendants charged thereby with more than its proportion of the cost of the entire work. In thus distributing portions of the cost upon lots not fronting upon the street on which the work was done the amount which would otherwise be assessed against the lot of the defendants is not increased or otherwise affected. See S. F. Pav. Co. v. Dubois (Cal. App.) 83 Pac. 72. It must therefore be held that the validity and correctness of the assessment was not impaired by the mode in which the court finds that it was made, and, inasmuch as the facts specifically found by the court have no tendency to impeach the correctness of the proceedings culminating in the assessment, it follows that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment, and that the court erred in rendering judgment in favor of the defendants.

The judgment is reversed.

BRACKETT v. MARTENS. (Civ. 213.)

(Court of Appeal, First District. California. Aug. 15, 1906.)

1. SALES—WARRANTY OF MERCHANTABLENESS—FRUIT TREES.

A statement by the seller of fruit trees after having explained to the buyer that they had not been very well taken care of and were of the cheapest grade, that they were good trees if taken care of, amounted merely to an expression of an opinion, and did not constitute a warranty of merchantableness.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 43, Cent. Dig. Sales, §§ 727-732.]

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS — ACCRUAL OF RIGHT OF ACTION ON WARRANTY—SALES.

Where plaintiff sued on an alleged warranty of merchantableness of certain fruit trees purchased from defendant, the cause of action, if any, arose on the purchase of the trees, and was barred after two years by Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 1, requiring actions on a contract, obligation, or liability not founded on an instrument of writing to be commenced within two years.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Limitation of Actions, § 248.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; A. L. Rhodes, Judge.

Action by Cora L. Brackett, as administratrix, of the estate of L. P. Brackett, deceased, against H. Martens. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

Wm. P. Veuve, for appellant. J. B. Kerwin, for respondent.

COOPER, J. The complaint alleges that in February, 1896, the defendant sold and delivered to plaintiff 1,000 French prune trees, and, at the same time, warranted to the plaintiff that they were merchantable French prune trees properly budded on Myrobolan roots; that plaintiff relied solely upon said warranty, and paid defendant the price therefor, $45; that all of said trees were not merchantable French prune trees, properly budded, nor were either or any of them properly budded on Myrobolan roots, but that they were all and each of them budded in an improper manner on an inferior and worthless root, and of no value whatever to plaintiff. That plaintiff planted the said trees upon land owned by him in March, 1896, but that at no time subsequent to the sale did plaintiff discover, nor had he any means or opportunity by ordinary diligence of discovering, that said trees were not of the variety so ordered and paid for by plaintiff, to wit, merchantable French prune trees properly budded on Myrobolan roots, as represented and warranted by defendant, until the fall of 1899, when the said trees began rapidly to die. That plaintiff's land with said worthless and inferior variety growing thereon is worth less by $5,000 than it would be worth were the trees growing thereon the trees so ordered and paid for by the plaintiff, and that hence plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $5,000. The defendant demurred to the complaint on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled, and defendant answered, denying the material allegations of the complaint, and also alleging that the cause of action is barred by the provisions of section 337, and the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The case was tried before the court and findings filed, upon which judgment was ordered and entered in favor of the plaintiff for $1,500 damages, besides costs.

Defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and the order denying the motion. The court found that defendant warranted the said prune trees to be merchantable French prune trees, budded on Myrobolan roots, but that they "were not merchantable French prune trees, though budded on Myrobolan roots, but were each and all unmerchantable French prune trees, and were not fit for the purposes for which they were sold." The court further found that plaintiff "did not know, and by the use of ordinary diligence did not and could not discover, that said 1,000 trees were defective and unmerchantable until the fall of the year 1899, when they began rapidly to die, and he then for the first time discovered that said trees were not as represented and warranted by defendant." The court found against defendant as to the statute of limitations. There is no finding as to whether or not the trees were properly budded, and as the court found that they were budded on Myrobolan roots, and that they were French prune trees, we must presume that they were properly budded. There is no finding that the trees were improperly budded, nor that they were budded on inferior roots, and we must therefore presume that they were properly budded on Myrobolan roots. The material finding, then, upon which the judgment must rest, if it can rest upon any finding, is that the trees were warranted to be merchantable and that they were not merchantable as warranted.

It is contended that there was an express warranty made by the defendant to the plaintiff at the time of the sale to the effect that the trees were merchantable, and the court so found. Upon a careful examination of the evidence we have concluded that it does not support the finding. It will not be necessary to decide the question as to whether or not the trees were merchantable, for the reason that if the defendant did not warrant them to be merchantable the question would be immaterial. It may, however, be said that there is slight evidence that the trees were not merchantable, except the fact that they began rapidly to die in the fall of 1899. They grew during the summer of 1896, 1897, 1898, and 1899 until fall, before the plaintiff, according to his own testimony, discovered or could have discovered that they were not merchantable. It is not a presumption of law or of fact that a fruit tree sold in February, 1896, was not then merchantable simply because it died in the fall of 1899. The reason why the trees began to die in the fall of 1899 is not clear. There is much testimony to the effect that the soil where the trees were planted is only 2 or 3 feet deep, and that beneath it there is a blue clay some 100 feet in depth that is not porous and through which water will not penetrate, and hence the sediment or top soil is not moistened or fed by capillary attraction from the clay below; that there is a great amount of alkali in the soil, and that it is not proper soil for an orchard; that the roots of the trees when they reached the clay could go down no farther, and hence spread out along the clay underneath the soil, and being unable to get nutriment, the roots starved and perished. There is also testimony to the effect that the trees were poorly cultivated, not properly pruned, and crops grown in between the rows, which deprived them of the nutriment and moisture that they would otherwise have received. The fact that they grew for more than 3 years so that plaintiff could not discover anything wrong about them, would tend very strongly to corroborate the theory that when the trees arrived at the age when the roots needed more room to reach down and procure nourishment, and could go no farther, the starvation of the tree began. There is testimony which is not contradicted that an orchard had before been planted on this same land and perished. The trees died by what many of the witnesses call "pinch-off," which is the growing of the bud on top much more rapidly than the root or original stock, causing the trunk of the tree or new stock to be larger above the point where it has been joined or grafted than the stem of the original variety. The testimony showed that the union of bud and stock was good, and there was no weakness of the stem at the point of union except the overgrowth of the scion as described by the witnesses.

The testimony claimed to support the finding as to an express warranty is that of the plaintiff and the defendant and that of the plaintiff's father. Defendant's testimony shows without conflict that the trees were graded in three classes or grades. If they had made a growth of four feet or over at one year old, they were called first class and sold at ten cents each; from three to four feet, the second class, and sold at six cents each; and from two to three feet the third class, and sold at four cents each. Plaintiff testified: "Went to defendant's nursery and looked at his trees. My father bought some six-cent trees and I took the balance of them, two hundred. Then he (defendant) showed me some smaller trees, and said they were just as good only they had not been irrigated and forced along; took eight hundred of the latter. He said they were No. 1 trees, only they were not forced along by water like the balance. He told me I could have my choice of the four-cent trees. This is all he said." Plaintiff's father testified: "I went with my son to defendant's nursery to post him, to see that he got good trees. Defendant said they were good trees, but they had not had the care the others had. All that was said was this—that I wanted so many trees, and my son so many. I wanted then on Myrobolan root—would not take any other as a gift because I was afraid of the floods coming there and injuring them. I could not raise peach root, or peaches or apricots. I can't tell the words that were said, but the meaning was to get good trees—good roots. That is the manner and kind I did get. * * * Martens said they were good trees if taken care of—that they would make good, thrifty trees * * * he said they had not been irrigated and cultivated as the others had." Defendant testified: "I told him we had plenty of trees, but they were of different sizes and different prices. He asked me what the first-class were worth. I told him ten cents; that there was a nice size which we call No. 2, worth six cents; and there was a size which we call No. 3 worth four cents. * * * I told him there were four-cent trees, if he approved of them, but that they were not so large as he had been getting. He said the four-cent trees looked to him plenty good enough, and he would just as soon have them as any others for that price. So he accepted the trees shown to him. He pulled up and examined several bunches of the four-cent grade. They were satisfactory to him, he said, so long as he was getting them at that price. He came for them himself, and took his own choice of the lot. I was not present when he took the trees—the four-cent trees. This is all the conversation we had about the purchase of the trees. * * * When this purchase was made, some of the trees were drawn out of the piles, and Mr. Brackett examined them. In his case many trees out of many piles of the different grades were pulled out and inspected by Mr. Brackett. The trees I sold to Brackett were third-class trees, and I told him so. * * * I did not warrant these trees which I sold to Brackett, and the words 'warrant' and 'merchantable' were not used at all in our conversation." This is all the testimony on the question of warranty. The defendant did not say that he would warrant the trees, and while he said they were good trees he fully explained to plaintiff that they had not been very well taken care of, and that they were the cheapest grade. He also told the plaintiff that if taken care of, they would make good, thrifty trees. They were shown to plaintiff and he examined them, and picked them out of the grade shown him. They were French prunes on Myrobolan roots, properly budded. The defendant was asked for French prune trees on Myrobolan roots, and by the sale of the trees he warranted them as such. This warranty the court found to be true, but defendant, by stating that they were good trees if taken care of, was merely expressing his opinion. It was not understood that the language used was used as an undertaking that the trees were merchantable trees. They were sold as the smallest, lowest grade in the nursery. Plaintiff bought them as such. There was no undertaking by defendant that they would continue to grow three, five, or ten years.

A warranty is an engagement by which a seller assures to a buyer the existence of some fact affecting the transaction. Civ.

Code, § 1763. In this case plaintiff did not ask for merchantable trees, but for French prune trees on Myrobolan roots. The statement by the defendant that they were good trees if taken care of was not the assurance of a fact affecting the transaction. A warranty is defined in Benjamin on Sales, section 610, as a "collateral undertaking forming a part of the contract by the agreement of the parties, express or implied," and the American note to the same section, pages 606–8 says that a warranty "is an assurance of some fact, coupled with an agreement, express or implied, to make the assurance good or pay for the deficiency," and that all the authorities "agree that mere words of praise and commendation, or which merely express the vendor's opinion, judgment or estimate, do not constitute a warranty." In Byrne v. Jansen, 50 Cal. 627, the plaintiff claimed damages for breach of an alleged warranty in the sale of certain wool. The court said: "The conversation had between the defendant and the plaintiff's agent did not amount to a warranty. * * * There is nothing in the circumstance that the defendant expressed a somewhat favorable opinion of his wool, that he indulged an opinion that, while Mr. Conn's wool might be a little finer than his own, his was fully as profitable as Conn's for manufacturing purposes. This was mere praise of his own property—the simplex commendatio which is allowable in making a trade, and is not held by the rule of the common law to amount to a warranty." In Polhemus v. Heiman, 45 Cal. 579, a portion of the opinion in Henshaw v. Robins, 9 Metc. (Mass.) 83, 43 Am. Dec. 367, is quoted with approval wherein it is said: "No expression of opinion, however strong, would import a warranty. But if the vendor at the time of sale affirms a fact as to the essential qualities of his goods in clear and definite language, and the purchaser buys on the faith of such an affirmation, that we think is an express warranty." Saying to a buyer that a machine will do good work, or is a good machine, was held not to necessarily constitute a warranty. McDonald Mfg. Co. v. Thomas, 53 Iowa, 558, 5 N. W. 737. So the words "good excellent butter" were held to be merely descriptive, and not a warranty (Greenthal v. Schneider, 52 How. Prac. [N. Y.] 133); and a statement by a seller of guano "that it is a good fertilizer" was held not to amount to a warranty. (Farrow v. Andrews, 69 Ala. 96); and by the vender of a machine that it "was a very good machine, and will do very nice work" (Worth v. McConnell, 42 Mich. 473, 4 N. W. 198).

Counsel for respondent states in his brief, "It seems to us that in the sale of the prune trees there was an implied warranty, even if the language used was not an express warranty, that they were merchantable in that they should reasonably answer the purpose for which they were sold," and he cites in support of his theory of implied warranty sections 1769 to 1778 of the Civil Code. The sections referred to are under part IV, chapter II, article III of the Code. Section 1764 is as follows: "No implied warranty in mere contract of sale. Except as prescribed in this article a mere contract of sale or agreement to sell does not imply a warranty." The only section under the article claimed to be applicable is section 1769, which reads: "Manufacturers' warranty against latent defects. One who sells or agrees to sell an article of his own manufacture thereby warrants it to be free from any latent defect, not disclosed to the buyer, arising from the process of manufacture, and also that neither he nor his agent in such manufacture has knowingly used improper materials therein." It may be doubted whether the prune trees were an article of defendant's own manufacture within the meaning of the above section. The trees were purchased; that is, the original Myrobolan stock, by the defendant, and imported from France, and subsequently budded by defendant to French prunes. Defendant planted the young trees and budded them to a different stock. But if it can be conceded that the trees were "an article of defendant's own manufacture," there was no latent defect arising from the process of manufacture, because the only process was budding the French prune in the Myrobolan stock, which, as has been said before, was properly done, and proper materials were used.

The defendant alleged in his answer that the cause of action is barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that an action must be commenced within two years upon "a contract, obligation, or liability not founded upon an instrument of writing." The court erred in holding that the action was not barred under the section cited. The cause of action, if any, arose upon the purchase of the trees in February, 1896. If the defendant sold to plaintiff trees different from what he had warranted, they were different at the time they were sold. Section 338 cannot aid plaintiff, because the action is one for a breach of warranty, and not for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake. Upon the breach of any contract the statute begins to run at the date of the breach. See Lattin v. Gillette, 95 Cal. 317, 30 Pac. 545, 29 Am. St. Rep. 115, where the question is fully discussed. If the rule contended for by plaintiff be correct the trees might have lived 8, 10 or 15 years, and then have died, and plaintiff would not till then have discovered that they were not merchantable in February, 1896. If defendant had warranted in writing that the trees would live and grow, such warranty would not mean that they would live and grow forever.

The judgment and order are reversed.

4 Cal. App. 245

FLINN et al. v. STRAUSS et al.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 15, 1906.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—CONTRACTS—FORM OF BIDS—AFFIDAVITS — SUFFICIENCY — SEVERAL BIDDERS.

Charter of San Francisco, art. 6, c. 1, § 16 (St. 1899, p. 289, c. 2), provides that every bid on a public improvement shall have thereon the "affidavit of the bidder" that the bid is not collusive or sham, etc. Held, that the affidavit of one of two persons uniting to make the bid does not satisfy the requirement.

2. SAME—SPECIFIC CASE.

An affidavit attached to a bid by two persons contained the purported signature of but one of them, nor was there a showing, either in the instrument or by extrinsic evidence, of the official character of the person before whom it purported to have been signed and sworn. The instrument was undated, and the name of the purported signer did not appear as affiant in the body thereof. Held not a compliance with the statute.

3. SAME — SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS — ENFORCEMENT—VALIDITY OF ASSESSMENT—PRESUMPTION—CONCLUSIVENESS.

In an action to enforce the lien of a street assessment, the introduction in evidence of the warrant, assessment, and diagram, together with an affidavit of demand and nonpayment, makes merely a prima facie case, subject to be overcome by evidence of defects in the prior proceedings.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 1282.]

4. SAME — REBUTTING EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action to enforce the lien of a street assessment, the proposal of plaintiffs, with a defective affidavit of good faith indorsed thereon, was produced from the records of the board of public works, and a deputy of that office testified that the indorsed affidavit was the one submitted by plaintiffs, and on which their contract was let and based. Held sufficient to overcome the prima facie case as to the validity of the proceedings made by plaintiffs' introduction of the warrant, assessment, and diagram, and, in the absence of further evidence, to authorize a finding that such affidavit was the only one given upon the proposal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by James J. Flinn and another against Gaston Strauss and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

D. H. Whittemore, for appellants. E. G. Knapp and Chapman & Knapp, for respondents.

HARRISON, P. J. Action for the foreclosure of the lien of a street assessment in San Francisco. The plaintiffs have appealed from a judgment rendered in favor of the defendants, and have presented the appeal upon the judgment roll, including a bill of exceptions.

The charter of San Francisco (article 6, c. 1, § 16, St. 1899, p. 289, c. 2) provides that all proposals for public work, including street improvements, "shall be made upon printed forms to be prepared by the board and furnished gratuitously upon application, with a form for the affidavit hereinafter provided for printed thereon. Each bid shall have thereon the affidavit of the bidder that such bid is genuine and not collusive or sham; that he has not colluded, conspired, connived or agreed, directly or indirectly, with any other bidder or person to put in a sham bid; or that such other person shall refrain from bidding; and has not in any manner sought by collusion to secure any advantage against the city and county, or any person interested in said improvement for himself or any other person. All bids shall be clearly and distinctly written without any erasure or interlineation, and if any bid shall have an erasure or interlineation it shall not be received or considered by the board. Any contract made in violation of any of the foregoing provisions, and in case of improvements of streets, any assessment for the work done under such contract, shall be absolutely void."

The complaint herein is in the ordinary form, and alleges among other matters that the plaintiffs herein delivered to the board of public works their proposal to do the work for which it had invited sealed proposals, and that their said proposal had thereon the affidavit of each of the plaintiffs setting forth the matters required by the above provisions of the charter. Upon an issue thereon the court found that the alleged proposal "did not have therewith or thereon the affidavit as alleged, or any proper affidavit as required by law."

The bill of exceptions sets forth at length the alleged proposal of the plaintiffs for doing the work, together with the following, purporting to have been printed thereon, viz.:

Affidavit.

"State of California, City and County of San Francisco—ss: ———, being first duly sworn, deposes and says: That he is ——— the party making the foregoing proposal or bid; that this bid is genuine and not collusive or sham; that said bidder has not colluded, conspired, connived or agreed, directly or indirectly, with any other bidder or person to put in a sham bid, or that such other person shall refrain from bidding; and has not, in any manner, sought by collusion to secure any advantage against the city and county, or any person interested in said improvement, for himself or any other person.

"Jas. J. Flinn.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this ——— day of ———, 190—.

"H. J. Smith."

Although this instrument purports to have the signature of "Jas. J. Flinn," his name is not set forth in the body of the instrument as the affiant thereof, and the instrument itself is without date, and is not authenticated as being his affidavit by any official signature or seal. The official character of "H. J. Smith" is not shown, either in the body of the affidavit, or, by having any official description written after his signature, and it does not appear on the face of the instrument that he was an officer authorized to take an affidavit, nor was there any evidence given at the trial of the cause that he had such authority. The proposal of the plaintiffs to do the work purports to have been made by two persons, "Flinn and Treacy," and the complaint alleges that they were partners and made the proposal, and that it had thereon the affidavit of each of them; but the statement in the purported affidavit of Flinn "that he is the party making the foregoing proposal" is at variance therewith. The provision in the charter requiring "the affidavit of the bidder" is not satisfied by the affidavit of one of several bidders. The purpose of the provision is to prevent collusion and fraud, and to sift the conscience of the bidder, or of all of the bidders if there be more than one; but an affidavit of one of several bidders might be made in good faith notwithstanding a collusion on the part of one or more of his associates.

The above finding of the court was fully sustained by the evidence. Although by the introduction of the warrant, assessment, and diagram in evidence, with an affidavit of demand and nonpayment, the plaintiffs threw upon the defendants the burden of showing any defect in the proceedings prior thereto (Williams v. Bergin, 129 Cal. 461, 62 Pac. 59; Belser v. Allman, 134 Cal. 399, 66 Pac. 492), yet these documents are only prima facie evidence of the plaintiffs' right of recovery, and are subject to be overcome by any affirmative evidence of such defect. At the trial herein the contract of the plaintiffs, together with their proposal and the aforesaid purported affidavit, were produced from the records of the board of public works, and a deputy from that office testified that the purported affidavit indorsed upon the proposal is the paper that was submitted as an affidavit by the plaintiffs at the time the proposal was handed in, and that the contract with them was let and executed on that proposal. This evidence was sufficient to authorize the court to hold that the prima facie character of the documents introduced by the plaintiffs was overcome thereby, and to throw upon the plaintiffs the burden of showing that there was printed upon their proposal an affidavit sufficient to meet the requirements of the charter. In the absence of any further evidence the court was authorized to find that there was no affidavit of the bidder upon the proposal other than the one purporting to have been made by Flinn which was offered in evidence. By the express terms of the above section of the charter the failure to make the affidavit required by the section rendered the contract, and the assessment for the work done under such contract, absolutely void.

The judgment is affirmed.

PACIFIC PAVING CO. v. DIGGINS et al.

(Civ. 214.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 15, 1906.)

1. Municipal Corporations—Enforcement of Assessments for Improvements—Trial—Findings—Construction.

In an action on a street assessment, the issue of fact on which plaintiff's right to recover depended was whether the board of supervisors had jurisdiction to pass the resolution ordering the performance of the work. Defendants' answer alleged that this resolution was not duly passed, which was deemed controverted by plaintiff, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 462. Held, that a finding that the resolution was "duly passed" was a determination that the board had jurisdiction to pass it.

2. Pleading—Legal Conclusions.

While an averment that an act has been "duly" performed is ordinarily but a legal conclusion, it will be, nevertheless, sufficient, in the absence of a special demurrer or objection on that ground, to authorize evidence on the issue.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, §§ 19, 20.]

3. Pleading—Objections—Waiver.

Where parties proceed to trial without an objection that an averment in the complaint is but a legal conclusion, and introduce evidence on the issue, they are precluded, after a decision thereon, to object that the issue was not before the court for decision; especially where the party making such averment supplements the same in his answer with an averment of the probative facts on which he relies to support his averment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, §§ 1355-1360.]

4. Trial—Findings of Fact.

In an action on a street assessment, a finding that the board of supervisors passed each and every resolution with reference to the work mentioned in the complaint should be regarded as a finding of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, § 958.]

5. New Trial—Errors of Law—Findings of Fact.

Where defendant claimed that the court erred in making a particular finding of fact, defendant properly disregarded the probative facts found by the court, and sought to correct the error through a motion for a new trial and a statement of the case, in which the evidence relevant to the issue was set out.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, § 165½.]

6. Same—Determination.

Where, in an action on a street assessment, the court found that the resolution of intention to make the improvement had been duly passed by the board of supervisors, but the evidence set forth in a statement of the case on a motion for a new trial clearly established that the board of supervisors was without any jurisdiction to order the improvement, and that the resolution therefor was not "duly passed," the court properly granted defendant a new trial.

7. Appeal—Discretion of Court—Dismissal of Motion for New Trial.

An application to dismiss a motion for a new trial for lack of diligence in prosecuting the same is addressed to the discretion of the court, whose action thereon will be affirmed, unless it affirmatively appears that the court's discretion was abused.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, § 3861.]

8. NEW TRIAL—MOTION TO DISMISS—DELAY.

A statement of the case was settled and filed May 15, 1903, and on September 16, 1904, plaintiff gave notice of a motion to dismiss defendant's motion for a new trial for failure to prosecute with diligence. On the hearing the court's attention was called to the manner and times at which, under the rules, the motion could have been made, and to the periods of time since the filing of the statement during which the court was in vacation. Held that, in the absence of any definite showing that the motion could have been presented or heard at some time during the expired period, the mere lapse of time was insufficient to show an abuse of the trial court's discretion in refusing to dismiss the motion.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, §§ 312, 313.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Paving Company against J. C. Diggins and others. From an order granting defendants a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Booth & Bartnett and W. J. Bartnett, for appellant. Knight & Heggerty and Wm. M. Madden, for respondents.

HARRISON, P. J. Action upon a street assessment in San Francisco. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant Byron Diggins, and upon the motion of the said defendant the court granted a new trial. The present appeal is from this order.

The complaint is in the ordinary form, except that there is no averment therein that the board of supervisors had passed a resolution of intention to order the improvement for which the assessment was made. In his answer thereto the defendant, for a separate and special defense to the action, alleged that the resolution ordering the work referred to in the complaint was not duly passed by the board of supervisors; that it was passed by the board November 29, 1897; that more than six months prior to said date the board passed a resolution of intention to order such work, but that within 10 days after the expiration of the time of the posting and publication of the notice thereof the owners of a majority of the frontage of the property fronting on said proposed work made and delivered to the clerk of said board a written objection and protest thereto, upon which the clerk indorsed the date of its reception by him; that no further proceedings were had in relation to the doing of said work until November 29, 1897, when it passed the aforesaid resolution ordering the work; and that the board did not, prior thereto or relative to said order, pass a resolution of intention to order said work. Upon the trial of the cause the court found that all the allegations of the complaint are true, and that the board of supervisors did duly pass each and every resolution mentioned therein. It also found the aforesaid facts specially set forth in the answer of the defendant to be as therein alleged, and held as a conclusion of law that the plaintiff was entitled to the relief asked by it.

One of the grounds for a new trial specified by the defendant in its notice of intention therefor is the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision, and in the statement of the case it is specified as one of the particulars of such insufficiency that whereas, it appeared from the evidence that by reason of the protest of the property owners against the resolution of intention passed November 23, 1896, the board of supervisors ceased to have any authority to order the work, and could not order the same unless they should, after the expiration of six months, pass another resolution of intention to do so, there was no evidence that any other resolution of intention had been passed by the board, and that the finding of the court that the resolution set forth in the complaint was "duly" passed was not justified by the evidence.

The issue of fact upon which the plaintiff's right of recovery depended was whether the board of supervisors had jurisdiction to pass the resolution ordering the work to be done. The allegation in the answer that this resolution was not duly passed, which, under the provisions of section 462 of the Code of Civil Procedure, was deemed controverted by the plaintiff, presented this issue of fact to be determined by the court, and the finding of the court that it was "duly" passed was a determination that the board had jurisdiction to pass it. While the averment that an act has been "duly" performed is ordinarily but a legal conclusion, yet, in the absence of a special demurrer or objection on that ground, it will be held sufficient to authorize the court to receive evidence upon the issue; and if the parties proceed to trial without such objection, and introduce evidence upon the issue, they will not be permitted, after a decision thereon, to contend that it was not before the court for such decision (Minor v. Baldridge, 123 Cal. 187, 55 Pac. 783); especially where, as in the present case, the party making such averment supplements the same in his answer with an averment of the probative facts upon which he relies in support of his averment that the act was not duly performed. In such a case the general averment may be held to be either the ultimate fact established by the probative facts, or as merely an equivalent for the legal conclusion raised by the law upon the proof of such facts, and therefore disregarded as surplusage. If there is any conflict between the ultimate fact that is found and the probative facts which are also found, the former will ordinarily control; "and although a finding of probative facts from which the ultimate fact conclusively follows is sufficient in the absence of a finding of such ultimate fact, yet, when the ultimate (issuable) fact is found, no finding of probative facts which may tend to establish that the ultimate fact was found against the evidence can overcome the ultimate fact so found. In such case the only remedy of the party injured is to move for a new trial on the evidence. See Perry v. Quackenbush, 105 Cal. 305, 38 Pac. 740, and cases cited." Sharp v. Bowie, 142 Cal. 462, 76 Pac. 62. Upon these principles the finding herein that the board of supervisors did pass each and every resolution mentioned in the complaint is to be regarded as the finding of a fact. The finding is a negation in identical language of the allegation in the answer of the defendant. "The only purpose of findings is to answer the questions put by the pleadings, and if the facts are stated in the findings in the same way that they are stated in the pleadings they are sufficient. Dam v. Zink, 112 Cal. 91, 44 Pac. 331; McCarthy v. Brown, 113 Cal. 15, 45 Pac. 14. See, also, City Street Imp. Co. v. Babcock, 139 Cal. 690, 73 Pac. 666; Rauer v. Bradbury (Cal.) 84 Pac. 1007, filed March 16, 1906. Under the claim of the defendant that the court erred in making such finding, he very properly disregarded the probative facts found by the court, and sought to correct the error through a motion for a new trial and a statement of the case, in which he set forth the evidence in reference thereto. From the evidence thus set forth the aforesaid allegations in his answer are fully sustained, and it clearly appears therefrom that the board of supervisors was without any jurisdiction to order the improvement, and that its resolution therefor was not duly passed. City Street Imp. Co. v. Babcock, 123 Cal. 205, 55 Pac. 762; Same v. Same, 139 Cal. 690, 73 Pac. 666. The court, therefore, very properly granted a new trial.

The statement of the case was settled by the court and filed May 15, 1903. On September 16, 1904, the plaintiff gave notice to the defendant of a motion to dismiss the latter's motion for a new trial, upon the ground that he had failed to prosecute the same with diligence, and in support of such motion presented an affidavit setting forth the dates at which the several steps in the proceeding prior thereto had been taken. Upon the hearing of the motion the attention of the court was called to the manner and times at which, under its rules, the motion could have been heard, and to the periods of time since the filing of the statement during which the court was in vacation. No fact in support of the motion, or tending to show that the motion could have been heard by the court, other than an inference to be drawn from the time that had intervened since the filing of the statement, was presented to the court. Upon the submission of the motion it was denied, and the plaintiff has also appealed from this order.

A motion of this nature is eminently addressed to the discretion of the court, and, unless it shall be made to affirmatively appear that there has been an abuse of discretion, its ruling thereon will be affirmed. In addition to the matters to which the attention of the court was called, the judge had personal knowledge of the extent and manner in which the time of the court had been occupied during this period, and from such knowledge, and its consideration thereof, could determine whether there had been any negligence in the prosecution of the motion. In the absence of any definite showing that the motion could have been presented or heard at some time during this period, it cannot be held that the mere lapse of time is a sufficient ground to overcome the presumption of the proper exercise of its discretion by the court.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

In re MAYHEW'S ESTATE. (Civ. 233.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 23, 1906.)

1. APPEAL—NOTICE—APPEARANCE—WAIVER.

On petition by a legatee for distribution, conceding that it was necessary to serve notices of appeal on all legatees entitled to a share of the residue remaining after petitioner's demise, the written appearance, acknowledgment of service, and consent that any judgment rendered should bind them, filed in the cause by the parties not served, cured the omission, and gave the appellate court jurisdiction to determine the rights of all interested parties.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 2, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 2184–2190.]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—RIGHTS OF LEGATEES—PETITION FOR DISTRIBUTION—TIME.

Civ. Code, § 1663, provides that any legatee may present his petition for distribution at any time after the lapse of one year from issuance of letters testamentary. Held, that a legatee was entitled to file his petition at any time after the lapse of one year from the issuance of letters testamentary, though after the issuance of the letters a supplement to the will was filed and probated as a part thereof.

3. WILLS—INTERESTS CREATED—MONEY OR INCOME THEREOF—LIFE ESTATES.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1317, provides that a will must be construed according to the intention of the testator, and his intention given effect as far as possible. By section 1324 words are to be taken in their ordinary and grammatical sense, unless a clear intention to use them in another sense can be collected, and section 1325 provides that the words of a will are to receive an interpretation which will give every expression some effect. Testatrix's will provided: "I direct that if my husband, M., provided he shall survive me, be paid for his use his lifetime, the sum of forty thousand dollars, or if he wishes he may have that much in value in whatever or wherever he may wish. I direct that my husband shall have the use of this money or the interest of it his lifetime. * * * I direct that whatever there may be left after my husband has the forty thousand dollars I wish to give him the use of that the remainder be equally divided between my four children. * * * I also direct that at the death of my husband that every dollar that is not used for his comfort and pleasure shall be equally divided between my four children as before mentioned. * * * As a supplement to this my last will and testament I wish to say I have deeded all my real estate to my husband, * * * but in that I do not wish him to keep and use that as his forty thousand dollars or any part of it unless he wishes to, but that is so he can deed the property so that it need not go into court, but that he can deed to any of the children the same as they want it or he wants to let them have it, but my husband is not to have forty thousand besides this real estate, that is to be sold as soon as convenient and turned into money as I have directed." Held, that the $40,000, and not merely the income thereof, was payable to the husband for his unrestricted use during his lifetime; any portion of such sum that remained on his death to go to the residuary legatees.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Petition by Horace Allen Mayhew for the distribution to him of a certain sum as a legatee under the will of Mary Jane Mayhew, deceased. From the decree making distribution, petitioner and another appeal. Motion to dismiss the appeal denied, and decree modified and affirmed.

L. T. Hatfield, for appellants. W. F. George and L. J. Hardy, for respondent Hardy.

McLAUGHLIN, J. Mary Jane Mayhew died in August, 1903, leaving an olographic will, the parts of which material to our inquiry, read as follows: "I direct that if my husband, Horace Allen Mayhew, provided he shall survive me, be paid for his use his lifetime, the sum of forty thousand dollars, or if he wishes he may have that much in value in whatever or wherever he may wish. I direct that my husband shall have the use of this money or the interest of it his lifetime, and at his death he shall have suitable interment and his grave marked as his children may deem proper, provided any of them shall survive him, in case they do not his grandchildren may attend to that as they deem proper. * * * I direct that whatever there may be left after my husband has the forty thousand dollars I wish to give him the use of that the remainder be equally divided between my four children. * * * I also direct that at the death of my husband that every dollar that is not used for his comfort and pleasure shall be equally divided between my four children as before mentioned. * * * As a supplement to this my last will and testament I wish to say I have deeded all my real estate to my husband Horace Allen Mayhew, but in that I do not wish him to keep and use that as his forty thousand dollars or any part of it unless he wishes to, but that is so he can deed the property so that it need not go into court, but that he can deed to any of the children the same as they want it or he wants to let them have it, but my husband is not to have forty thousand besides this real estate, that is to be sold as soon as convenient and turned into money as I have directed."

The will proper was admitted to probate in September, 1903, and the supplement thereto was also probated as part of the will on January, 1905. On May 29, 1905, Horace Allen Mayhew filed his petition for the distribution to him of $40,000 in cash, and in such petition set forth the will and supplement, the admission of the same to probate, the appointment and qualification of the executors, the return of the inventory showing the value of the estate to be more than $85,000, and alleged that there were no debts, and sufficient funds of the estate in the hands of the executors to pay the said sum. He further alleged that he had notified the executors of his election to take the $40,000, and had tendered and executed deeds conveying the real property to them, and persons who had purchased from them. Florence A. Hardy, a granddaughter of the deceased, and the only child of George H. Mayhew, a deceased son of Mary Jane Mayhew, filed an answer to said petition, in which she denied that petitioner had a right under the will to have more than the income of $40,000 for the period of his natural life. The court filed findings which are in substantial accord with the averments of the petition, save that as a conclusion drawn from the will it is found that petitioner "is entitled to have and receive of the moneys of said estate for his use for the term of his natural life the sum of $40,000, and on his death said sum shall go to Charles P. Mayhew and Frank J. Mayhew, the sons, to Mary E. Phipps, the daughter, and to Florence A. Hardy, the granddaughter of the said Mary Jane Mayhew, deceased, in equal shares." The distributive clause in the decree was identical with said finding, and the executors were directed to pay petitioner said sum for his use during the term of his natural life, with interest thereon at the legal rate from August 3, 1904. From this decree both petitioner and Florence Hardy appeal. The former contends that he is entitled to have said money distributed to him without restrictions, and the latter as stoutly contends that he was only entitled to the income or interest arising from said sum during his lifetime.

The motion to dismiss the appeal of petitioner must be denied. Conceding that it was necessary to serve notices of appeal on all legatees entitled to a share of the residue remaining after petitioner's demise, we think that the written appearance, acknowledgment of service, and consent that any judgment rendered shall bind them, filed herein by the parties not served, cures the omission, and gives this court jurisdiction to determine the rights of all interested parties. Piercy v. Piercy (Cal.) 86 Pac. 507; McLean v. Schartzer, 5 Cal. 70, 63 Am. Dec. 84; Hibernia S. & L. Soc. v. Lewis, 111 Cal. 519, 44 Pac. 175.

The petition to distribute the legacy was not premature. It was filed 20 months after letters testamentary were issued, and the subsequent proceedings, through which the supplement was probated as part of the will, did not operate to compel delay in presenting such petition. The law expressly provides that any heir, devisee, or legatee may present his or her petition for the distribution of the share of the estate to which they are entitled at any time after the "lapse of one year from the issuance of letters testamentary," and, as this time had admittedly elapsed, the petitioner had a right to demand that his share be distributed to him. Code Civ. Proc. § 1663. The will must be so construed as to effectuate the intention of the testatrix, and to this end all parts thereof must be construed in relation to each other, so as, if possible, to make one consistent and harmonious whole. Civ. Code, §§ 1317, 1324. Another rule requires that words used in a will be taken in their ordinary sense, and that effect be given to every expression therein. Civ. Code, §§ 1324, 1325. Taking the will under consideration "by its four corners," and construing it in obedience to these rules, it seems clear that the testatrix intended that $40,000 should be paid to her husband for his unrestricted use during his lifetime. We are thoroughly convinced that the will can be given no other construction without thwarting the evident intention of the testatrix. It contains the direction that, if her husband survived her, he "be paid, for his use, his lifetime, the sum of forty thousand dollars." There is no room for construction of this language, for it is too plain to be misunderstood. If, however, further light is needed touching the intention of the testatrix, it is suppled by the clause immediately following the language just quoted, where she emphasizes her desire by saying "or if he wishes he may have that much in value, whenever or wherever he may wish." If this is not enough to bring conviction as to the dominant idea she was trying to express, cumulative evidence of her intention is found in the third subdivision of the will, where she directs that "whatever there may be left after my husband has the forty thousand dollars I wish to give to him the use of" shall be equally divided among her four children, who at the death of her husband shall also have "every dollar that is not used for his comfort and pleasure," and then in the supplement, as if to clinch the proposition, she says with reference to the realty, "but in that I do not wish him to keep and use that as his forty thousand dollars or any part thereof unless he wishes to," and then adds, by way of preventing possible misapprehension, "but my husband is not to have forty thousand dollars besides this real estate." The supplement, which must be taken as the latest expression of her will, taken alone, clearly indicates that her design was to give her husband the $40,000 as fully and completely as the land which she had already deeded to him. He is clearly given full rein to do as he pleased concerning the realty. At his option he might keep it "as his forty thousand dollars," or any part thereof, but he could not have the money and real estate both. This idea is in accord with the general terms of the will, and but for the two expressions "his use his lifetime" and "I wish to give him the use of," found, respectively, in the second and third clauses of the will, and the idea conveyed in the clause disposing of the residue which might remain at the time of her husband's death, no other construction would be possible than that she intended that he should take the money absolutely. But the supplement, referring, as it certainly does, to the bequest in the main will, must be construed with the latter unless there is a clear repugnance, in which case, the supplement must control. It is therefore necessary to give some effect to the expressions and residuary clause above mentioned, and to consider the expression upon which contestant places great reliance, where it is said, "I direct that my husband shall have the use of this money or the interest of it." Taking up the clause just quoted, and construing it in relation to the part immediately preceding it, we can hardly escape the conclusion that the words "or interest of it" were used in line with her evident purpose to give him his choice, and to consult his wishes in that and all other particulars. A construction that would confine the bequest to the interest on $40,000 would not only be repugnant to the preceding language, but in absolute conflict with the supplement, which clearly expresses the intention that he shall have the money. We must adopt the only construction which will give this expression some effect, and that is that he could have the use of the money or the interest on it, according to his wishes, which are clearly manifested in the petition herein. Any other construction would give undue weight to an isolated phrase as against oft-repeated and later expressions of testatrix, and be tantamount to making a new will. Clearly, her design was to give him the money to use, according to his judgment and discretion, for his comfort and pleasure as long as he lived. Analysis of the will as a whole leads to the inevitable conclusion that her dominant intention and idea was that her husband would be paid and would have the money, or that much in value, according to his selection and pleasure, for his untrammeled use; or, of he so desired, he could retain the land already his, and thus forego the payment of the money, which he was evidently to use, with as little restriction as the land. This being the central, controlling, all-pervading, and oft-repeated intention, her secondary or subordinate intention or idea as to what should be done with it after her main intention had been accomplished cannot be allowed to impair, modify, or nullify the dominant intention, perfectly manifest in every line of the will, and particularly in the supplement. The main precedent intention must be carried out, and then the secondary or subservient intention must be given such effect as the law may dictate. When a testator or testatrix gives positive directions that money or other personal property shall be paid or given to a legatee, and then directs the disposition to be made of it afterward, the latest direction is not only performable subsequently, but its performance is secondary and subordinate to, as well as dependent upon, the performance of the precedent and primary direction. Here there is no difficulty in determining what the intention of the testatrix was, and the only difficulty suggested arises from the alleged effect of rules of law on the secondary and subordinate intention if the main intention is given full effect. But this difficulty is more imaginary than real, for we are to effectuate the intention of the testatrix in sequential order, so far as rules of law will permit. We cannot violate, modify, change, or nullify the plain direction that the money shall be paid to the petitioner for his use as long as he shall live, and that he shall have it, unless he chooses to retain land previously deeded to him, or selects that much in value in other property, simply because he may use all or the greater portion in the pursuit of comfort and pleasure. The contestant, who is only entitled to her share of every dollar that is not so used, cannot complain of such distribution or its possible results, for the very excellent reason that by the terms of the will she is only entitled to share in what may remain at the time of petitioner's death. Neither can we refuse to recognize the positive direction that he shall be paid and shall have this money to use as "his forty thousand dollars" during life, because the legal effect of such payment may be to confer upon him an absolute right to do as he pleases in expending all or any portion of it for his comfort and pleasure. She has directed that he must be paid and have it. She clearly contemplated that he would use it as he pleased, for she recognizes his full right to do so by only attempting to dispose of what may be left after he has the unrestricted and uncontrolled use of it for his comfort and pleasure during his lifetime. In the very latest expression of her intention she places his right to use the money, and the manner in which he shall use it as his, on a par with his right to use the land, by placing the money in the scale with land already his, and giving him the selection of either. And in the clause where she directs that it be paid to him, she again manifests her intention as to the use he will be entitled to make of the money by giving him the right to waive the cash, and "have that much in value whenever or wherever he chooses." These plain and oft-repeated expressions of her intention and desire cannot be curtailed, ignored, or disregarded, and if he uses every dollar of the money for comfort or pleasure, according to his discretion, no right of contestant will be violated. As before stated, she is only entitled to share in what may remain, even if every clause in the will is given full effect, and hence she cannot complain, much less ask that he be deprived of his plain rights, to the end that she may have more than the testatrix intended.

In the case of In re Garrity, 108 Cal. 473, 38 Pac. 628, 41 Pac. 485, the facts were almost identical with the facts in the case at bar. In that case the will gave the surviving wife all of the property, consisting of land, money in bank, and chattels, for her use during her life, the remainder going to three children. The court distributed the estate by awarding her the share to which she was legally entitled as surviving wife, absolutely, and the balance of the estate, including $1,834.47 in money, was distributed to her for her use during her life. Upon appeal the very questions presented here were fully and carefully considered, and it was held that she was entitled to receive the corpus of the money and other property, for the reason, among others, that the will implied that the estate might be diminished while in her hands. And so it is here. The will clearly implies, and the testatrix evidently contemplated, that the sum might be diminished by petitioner, for only the unused portion remaining at his death is given to the children. Therefore, the cas cited applies with cogent force to the case at bar, and the principles of law therein declared are controlling here.

The decree of the court below was in full consonance with the aforesaid principles and with our construction of the will in every particular save one. The court found as a fact, and so decreed, that the full sum of $40,000 should go to contestant and her aunt and uncles, in equal shares, upon the death of petitioner. This finding being nothing more than a conclusion of law, it is unnecessary to send the case back for further proceedings. It is therefore ordered that the decree therein entered be modified by inserting before the words "said sum" on the fifth line of the distributive clause found at folio 74 of the transcript the words "the unused portion of," thereby distributing the portion of said $40,000 remaining unused at petitioner's death to the residuary legatees.

As so modified, the decree is affirmed.

BURKE v. BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF POLICE RELIEF & PENSION FUND OF CITY & COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 200.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 15, 1906.)

1. Pleading—Legal Conclusions.

In an action to recover a sum alleged to be due from a police pension fund, an averment that there was in the official custody and subject to the official control of the defendant more than sufficient money applicable to and with which to pay plaintiff's claim was but a legal conclusion, and was limited by the facts on which she based her claim and the provisions of law applicable to such facts.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, § 29.]

2. Municipal Corporations — Police—Pension Fund—Contributions.

Where two dollars a month was retained from the pay of a member of a police department, under San Francisco City Charter, art. 8, c. 10, § 11, subd. 9 (St. 1899, p. 334, c. 2), directing the treasurer of the pension fund to retain from the pay of each member of the police force two dollars a month for the benefit of such fund, such money was not voluntarily contributed to the fund, but was money of the state, retained in its possession to create the fund.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 518.]

3. Same—Statutes.

San Francisco City Charter (St. 1899, p. 241, c. 2), went into effect January 1, 1900, and created the police relief and pension fund. Article 8, c. 10, § 6 (page 333), declares that when any member of the department shall, after 10 years' service, die from natural causes, his widow, etc., shall be entitled to a sum equal to the amount retained by the treasurer from the pay of such deceased member, and paid into the relief and pension fund. Article 8, c. 10, § 11, subd. 9 (page 334), requires the treasurer to retain from the pay of each member of the police force two dollars a month for the benefit of such fund. Held, that the act was prospective only, so that on the death of a police officer his widow was only entitled to recover a sum equal to the amount retained from his pay for the benefit of the pension fund after the act took effect.

4. Mandamus—Right to Writ—Denial.

Where, prior to the institution of mandamus proceedings to compel payment of a portion of a police pension fund to petitioner, defendant had audited and allowed a demand in favor of petitioner for an amount greater than she was entitled to, and it did not appear that petitioner had demanded such money, or shown any reason why she had not received same, mandamus was properly denied.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Mandamus, § 48.]

5. Municipal Corporation — Freeholders' Charter.

San Francisco freeholders' charter, when approved by St. 1899, p. 241, c. 2, became the organic law of the city and county by the express terms of Const. art. 11, §§ 6, 8, and superseded the existing charter and all laws inconsistent therewith, so that the city thereafter was not subject to nor controlled by general laws.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Hettie T. Burke against the board of trustees of the police relief and pension fund of the city and county of San Francisco. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Jordan, Treat & Brann and Jordan & Brann, for appellant. P. V. Long, City Atty., for respondent.

HARRISON, P. J. The appellant seeks by this proceeding to obtain a writ of mandate, commanding the board of trustees of the police relief and pension fund of the city and county of San Francisco, the respondent herein to pay to her the sum of $596 from said fund, which she claims to be entitled to receive by virtue of certain provisions of the charter of said city and county. In her petition therefor she alleges that she is the surviving widow of John Burke, and that her husband was appointed a member of the police department of San Francisco, February 10, 1874; that on January 5, 1903, on his application to the board of police commissioners, and it having been made to appear to said board that he had become physically disabled by bodily injury received in the performance of his duty, he was retired from further service in the department; that in the resolution for his retirement it was provided that he be paid from the police relief and pension fund of the department a monthly pension, equal to one-half the amount of the salary attached to the rank which he held in the department for the period of three years preceding the date of his retirement; that after his said retirement he died from natural causes, February 26, 1903; that he was not paid any portion of said pension fund, but that on March 31, 1903, the defendant audited and allowed a demand on the treasurer of the city and county for the sum of $99.66, payable out of said pension fund, as for his pension for the quarter ending on that date. She also alleges that while her husband was a member of the police department he paid into said fund out of his salary the sum of $2 each month, from April, 1878, to and including January, 1903, amounting in the aggregate to $596. The superior court sustained a demurrer to the petition, and from its refusal to issue the writ of mandate prayed for, the petitioner has appealed.

The rights of the appellant are measured by the provisions of the charter of San Francisco, and these provisions alone can be considered in determining whether she is entitled to any relief, and, if so, the extent of such relief. She bases her claim upon the provisions of section 6, c. 10, art. 8, of the charter (St. 1899, p. 333, c. 2), which declares: "When any member of the department shall, after ten years' service, die from natural causes, then his widow, and if there be no widow then his children, of if there be no widow or children then his mother, if dependent upon him for support, shall be entitled to a sum equal to the amount retained by the treasurer from the pay of such deceased member and paid into the relief and pension fund; but the provisions of this section shall not apply to any member of the department who shall have received any pension under the terms of this chapter." Whatever money she is entitled to receive is to be paid to her out of this fund, and only such amount of the fund as the treasurer shall have retained from the pay of her husband and paid into the fund. The fund itself is provided for by section 1 of said chapter 10, art. 8 (page 332), which declares that "a fund is hereby created to be known and designated as the 'Police Relief and Pension Fund.'" The moneys constituting the fund are enumerated in section 11 of the chapter, subdivision 9 (page 334) of which directs the treasurer "to retain from the pay of each member of the police force $2 a month, which shall be forthwith paid into the police relief and pension fund."

The averment in the appellant's petition that there is in the official custody and subject to the official control of the defendant "more than sufficient money applicable to" and with which to pay her claim of $596 is but a legal conclusion, and is limited by the facts upon which she bases her claim and the provisions of law applicable to those facts (Pennie v. Reis, 132 U S. 464, 10 Sup. Ct. 149, 33 L. Ed. 426; Nichols v Police Pension Fund Commissioners, 82 Pac. 556, 1 Cal App. 494); and although the appellant has alleged in her petition that her husband, while he was a member of the police department, paid out of his salary the sum of $2 each month, yet, as we said in the case of Nichols v Same Defendant, supra: "The 'two dollars per month' which the petitioner alleges was retained by the treasurer from Nichols' pay as a member of the police department, and paid into said fund, was not a contribution to the fund by Nichols, but, as was said in reference to a similar provision in the act of 1878 in Pennie v. Reis, 132 U. S. 464, 10 Sup. Ct. 149, 33 L. Ed. 426, 'was money of the state retained in its possession for the creation of this very fund.'"

The charter of San Francisco went into effect January 1, 1900, and the police relief and pension fund created by it had its birth at the same time. The provisions of the charter, as well as the duties of the officers created by it, are prospective. It is only such moneys as the treasurer should retain from the pay of the appellant's husband after that date that could be paid into the fund, and it is only to such an amount of money so paid into the fund that under the provisions of section 6 the appellant is entitled. As her husband died in February, 1903, less than 38 months after the charter took effect, the treasurer could not have retained from his pay and paid into the fund more than $78. Prior to the institution of this proceeding by the appellant, the defendant had audited and allowed a demand on the treasurer against the fund of a greater sum than this; and, as it does not appear that the appellant had demanded this money, or shown any reason in her petition why she had not received the same, the court very properly denied her application.

The act of March 4, 1889 (St. 1899, p. 57), is not available to the appellant. That act was a general law applicable to all counties, cities and counties, and towns in the state, whereas the charter of San Francisco is a freeholders' charter, and when approved by the Legislature in 1899 became by the express terms of the Constitution (article 11, §§ 6, 8) the organic law of the city and county, and superseded the existing charter and all laws inconsistent therewith, and thereafter the city and county was no longer subject to or controlled by general laws. There is no provision in the charter by which the fund created by the act of 1889 should be transferred to or placed under the control of the officers created by the charter. The fund was at all times subject to legislative disposition (Pennie v. Reis, supra), and as section 14 (page 60) of the act required the surplus thereof to be transferred to the general fund on the last day of June of each year, and declared that it should be "no longer under the control of the board, or subject to its order," there is no presumption that any portion of the fund thereby authorized was transferred to, or is under the control of, the respondent herein. See Nichols v. Police Pension Fund Commissioners, supra.

The proposition urged in the brief on behalf of the appellant that she is entitled to the sum claimed by her upon the ground that her husband never "received" any portion of the pension awarded him does not require discussion. Whatever right she has to any portion of the pension fund depends upon the provisions in the first portion of section 6. The concluding sentence of the section, upon which this argument is based, instead of conferring any rights, creates a limitation upon the rights which otherwise might exist, and whatever rights she has by virtue of the section she must establish under its other provisions.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, J.; HALL, J.

4 Cal. App. 201

DU BRUTZ v. BANK OF VISALIA. (Civ. 236.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 4, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 3, 1906.)

1. Insurance — Collateral Assignment of Policy—Rights of Assignee.

The insured and the beneficiary of a life policy providing for the issuance of a paid-up policy on nonpayment of premiums assigned it as collateral. The assignment transferred "all rights" under the policy and all benefits "accrued or to accrue" by virtue of its terms and covenants, and authorized the assignee to "receive" and "collect" any money "to become due" thereunder. Held to give the assignee power to demand and receive a paid-up policy, where insured paid neither the debt nor the premiums, and to receive any benefits accruing thereunder.

2. Banks and Banking—Loans—Collateral Security — Statutory Provisions—Insurance Policy.

Under Civ. Code, § 3054, providing that a banker shall have a general lien dependent upon possession on all property in his hands belonging to a customer for the balance due from such customer in the course of his business, a banker, in addition to rights granted by an assignment of a life policy by the insured and beneficiary, has a statutory lien for the insured's overdraft on a paid-up policy issued to the banker in lieu of the assigned policy.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 6, Cent. Dig. Banks and Banking, § 673.]

3. Pledges—Collateral Assignment of Insurance Policy—Rights of Assignee—Paid-Up Policy—Application on Debt.

An assignment of a life policy by the insured and beneficiary as collateral to the insured's debt gave the assignee a right, on insured's failure to pay the premiums, to receive a paid-up policy in lieu of the one assigned. Defendant failed to pay either the premiums or the debt, which amounted to more than the face of the paid-up policy, which the assignee demanded and received. Held that, though without the assignment the paid-up policy would have belong to the beneficiary, yet under it the assignee could treat such paid-up policy as so much money and apply it on the debt without attempting to make any sale of it as pledged property.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 40, Cent. Dig. Pledges, § 130.]

4. Limitation of Actions—Security Already Applied—Effect.

A bank holding a paid-up insurance policy as security for an overdraft applied the face thereof as a credit on the overdraft within two years from the date of the last entry. After the expiration of the two years insured died and the assignee collected the money. Held that, even if the two-year statute applied to the overdraft, it did not benefit the beneficiary claiming the proceeds of the policy from the bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Sarah J. Du Brutz against the Bank of Visalia. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Charles G. Lamberson, for appellant. Hannah & Miller, for respondent.

BUCKLES, J. This was an action by the widow to recover from the bank $2,840 which had been paid to the bank on a life insurance policy on the life of Edward R. Du Brutz. Judgment was for the plaintiff. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The policy was originally for $5,000, and was made payable to Sarah J. Du Brutz upon the death of her husband, Edward R. Du Brutz. The husband was indebted to the Bank of Visalia, and to secure such indebtedness and future advances these spouses joined in assignment of the policy to said bank. This assignment was made December 21, 1898. On the 13th day of November, 1901, on failure of assured to pay the premiums, this policy was by the company changed into a paid-up policy for $2,840, without the knowledge or consent of either husband or wife. The date of the last check drawn by Du Brutz on and paid by said bank was February 28, 1901, marked "Paid" March 1, 1901, and his indebtedness to said bank at that date was $3,982.26. On August 14, 1902, the bank credited Du Brutz's account with the amount of the paid-up policy, to wit, $2,840. Du Brutz died May 17, 1904, and the bank thereupon collected the $2,840 from the life insurance company.

The contention of respondent is that the statute of limitations of two years had run in favor of Du Brutz in his account with that bank prior to the commencement of this action. The last item of the account was March 1, 1901, and the action was commenced on October 5, 1904. That the account in the bank being balanced on February 28, 1901, and a statement thereof rendered, the account became an account stated and the statute began to run from that date.

Appellant contends that Du Brutz's indebtedness to the bank was founded on written instruments, to wit, the checks he drew upon the bank and which the bank paid.

There is still another contention of plaintiff, and that is that the paid-up policy was not the policy assigned. But we think this latter objection not well taken. In the written assignment the assignors, Du Brutz, and his wife say: "Do hereby assign said policy, and all our, and each of our, rights thereunder." One of their rights under said policy was to have a paid-up policy issued in lieu thereof. The written assignment continues: "And all benefits accrued or to accrue under and by virtue of the terms, covenants or conditions thereof, to the Bank of Visalia." This carried with it the assignment of the benefits to accrue under the paid-up policy as well as those under the original policy. Continuing further, the assignment provides: "And hereby authorize said Bank of Visalia to receive, collect and receipt for any money or thing of value which is now or may become due by virtue of said policy or the terms, covenants or conditions thereof, as fully and completely as we, or either of us, might or could do if this assignment had not been made." This assignment couched in the terms it is we think gave the bank power to apply for and receive a paid-up policy in lieu of the original. The policy was taken out December 7, 1886. Payments had been made up to November 5, 1901, and the premium then due was not paid. Premiums had therefore been paid for more than three years, and under the terms of the policy the life insurance company was bound to issue a paid-up policy. Under the assignment the bank might have paid the premium and kept the policy alive for the full amount of $5,000, but it chose not to do so. The paid-up policy for $2,840 is dated November 13, 1901, and presumably was issued on that day, but seems from the uncontradicted evidence of the cashier of the said bank that it was not received at the bank until August 14, 1902, and on that date the sum of $2,840, the amount named in said paid-up policy, was placed to the credit of Du Brutz's account, leaving a balance then due of $1,142.26, which balance was charged to profit and loss and the account closed. This paid-up policy represented a promise to pay a fixed, definite sum to become due and payable at the death of the insured, but the bank chose to treat it as so much money. At the most, the plaintiff had a right to have paid to her any balance of the $2,840 which might exist at the death of her husband after paying his account in full at the bank, for the bank had a statutory lien on the policy in addition to the assignment for security. Section 3054 of Civil Code: "A banker has a general lien, dependent upon possession, upon all property in his hands belonging to a customer, for the balance due to him from such customer in the course of his business." But, as has been seen, the debt due the bank was much more than the policy, so that the plaintiff could not have been injured by the whole of the $2,840 being credited on the debt for which the assignment had been made.

It is claimed, also, that this paid-up policy was the property of plaintiff and not subject to the payment of her husband's debts. Had she not assigned all her rights under it to the bank, her contention would be correct. The policy being a security for the money owing when the assignment was made and for future advances, plaintiff would have no right to said policy or its proceeds until she had first tendered the debt due for which the policy was assigned. However, this seems not to have been made an issue in the case. Under the circumstances in this case, to wit, that the debt at the bank was very much larger than the policy, that the amount of the policy could never have increased and more than a year had passed since anything had been paid on the indebtedness to the bank, and the fact which occurred after the credit was given, that the husband dying on May 17, 1904, had not paid anything on said indebtedness, we think that the bank was justified in applying the policy as so much money on August 14, 1902, without attempting to make any sale of it is as of pledged property. The debt was due, and to have put the policy up and sold it would have been an idle thing, as it could not have brought more than its face value, the assured being still alive. Even could it be said that the two-year limitation in which to collect the debt was the proper period, the credit of the policy on the debt was made before the lapse of the two years. But we think the indebtedness was based upon instruments in writing, to wit, the check given by Edward R. Du Brutz as follows: "Pay to the order of ——— $———. E. R. Du Brutz." A check on a bank, if the drawer have money deposited therein to be checked out, is a demand on such bank for the payment of a specific sum of money. If there be no funds on deposit, then it is a request for credit and becomes an overdraft. A check is under our Code (section 3254, Civ. Code) a bill of exchange and is negotiable. But whether it is a demand or a request it is always the written instrument on which the payment of a sum mentioned therein is founded, and is the foundation of any suit growing out of the payment of such money or a refusal to pay the check. The statute of limitations pleaded here provides that an action upon any contract, obligation, or liability founded upon an instrument in writing executed in this state may be commenced within four years after the right of action accrues. Section 337, Code Civ. Proc. There is in every check two implied promises: (1) That the money is in the bank with which to pay it; and (2) that, if the money is not there, the drawer of the check will repay the money to the bank. Everything implied in a writing is as much a part of it as though it were expressed therein. Bancroft v. S. F. Tool Company, 120 Cal. 228, 52 Pac. 496. As there is here a written contract into which the law imports a promise to repay, and this promise created by law, being an element of the contract, enters into and forms a part of this written check, the statute of limitations governing written contracts to pay money is the only one that applies. Long v. Straus, 107 Ind. 94, 6 N. E. 123, 7 N. E. 763, 57 Am. Rep. 87. In an action to recover the money paid on an overdraft, the check or overdraft, and not oral testimony, would be relied upon as the proof. In Meherin v. Saunders, 131 Cal. 681, 63 Pac. 1084, 54 L. R. A. 272, one Ambrose bought property at a constable's sale, paid part cash and gave a check for the balance, but afterward had payment thereon stopped. The check was dated October 24, 1891. Suit was brought against Ambrose for the amount of the check on September 28, 1895, and the court said this was "less than a month prior to the date when an action on the check would have been barred by the statute of limitations."

The obligation of the maker of a note to reimburse his security for having paid the note is not founded upon the note, but upon the new promise made when the security pays the note (Chipman v. Morrill & Webster, 20 Cal. 131; Thomas v. Pacific Beach Company, 115 Cal. 136, 46 Pac. 899); and therefore the authorities presented on that point have no bearing on the question here.

Judgment reversed.

DU BRUTZ v. BANK OF VISALIA. (Sac. 1,458.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 3, 1906.)

In bank. Action by Sarah J. Du Brutz against the Bank of Visalia. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals to the District Court of Appeal, where the judgment was reversed. 87 Pac. 467. Proceeding to transfer from District Court of Appeal to the Supreme Court. Transfer denied.

PER CURIAM. In denying a transfer of this cause to the Supreme Court for hearing and decision, we desire to qualify the order by saying that we do not approve that portion of the decision of the District Court of Appeal which holds that an action by a bank to recover the amount of an overdraft is not barred by the statute of limitations short of four years. The case is not to be deemed a precedent upon that point.

JONES v. WATERMAN. (Civ. 158.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Aug. 17, 1906. Rehearing Denied Oct. 11, 1906.)

1. Appeal—Findings of Court—Conflicting Evidence—Review.

A finding of a trial court based on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal where there is sufficient evidence in the record to support it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, § 3983.]

2. Principal and Agent—Agency—Evidence.

In an action to recover an agreed rent for certain reamers used by a well driller in drilling a well under contract with defendant, the memorandum of agreement between defendant and the driller, and evidence of the oral agreement between them, by which the driller agreed to furnish all tools necessary for the work, was admissible to show that no authority could be implied from the transaction by which the driller was authorized to obtain the reamers on defendant's credit.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 40, Cent. Dig. Principal and Agent, §§ 402–412.]

3. Same—Unauthorized Acts—Ratification.

Where defendant employed a well driller to drill a well on his ranch and to furnish all required tools, the fact that one of defendant's employés paid the expressage on certain reamers hired by the driller from plaintiff for use in drilling the well, and agreed to pay $30 toward such hire, without defendant's knowledge, was insufficient to establish that the driller had authority to contract for the reamers on defendant's behalf.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 40, Cent. Dig. Principal and Agent, § 412.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; J. W. Taggart, Judge.

Action by Fred W. Jones against Isaac G. Waterman. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. Griffith, for appellant. Canfield & Starbuck and H. C. Booth, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Action for money. Judgment for defendant, and a motion for new trial denied. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and order.

The action was brought in the court below by plaintiff to recover a sum for the hire of two certain under reamers, alleged to have been furnished by him to defendant for use in drilling a well. The complaint is based upon an express contract upon the part of defendant to pay for the reasonable value of such hire. The answer denies the contract and also the hire or the use by defendant of said tools. The court finds in favor of defendant upon all of the issues.

There is no evidence in the record tending to support the issue as to the express promise to pay for such hire, and were we to assume that under the issues evidence was admissible to show an implied agreement to pay therefor, the record discloses a conflict in such evidence, and that there is sufficient in the record to support each and every finding of the court below, and under the well-established rule such findings will not be disturbed.

There was no error in admitting in evidence the memorandum of agreement between defendant and the well driller, nor in admitting the oral agreement between the parties in reference to the driller's obligation to furnish all tools necessary in the prosecution of the work. It was competent as tending to show that no obligation rested upon defendant to furnish such tools, and that no authority could be implied from the transaction between defendant and the party who made the order. The order for such under reamers was made by the driller, and he did not, in terms, represent that he was acting for defendant. He simply ordered the tools, and directed them to be shipped to defendant's ranch, where he was then employed, and defendant is not shown to have had any knowledge of such order, or to have acquiesced therein; and it was competent for him to show that he gave no authority for the order, but, on the contrary, that the tools were to be furnished by the driller, and the driller's use thereof in no wise established any implied promise on defendant's part to pay for the hire. The mere fact that one of defendant's employés paid the expressage, and had, without authority from defendant, agreed to pay $30 toward such hire, would not render defendant liable on account of such hire, he having no knowledge either of the payment of expressage nor of the arrangement between the driller and his employé.

We perceive no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, P. J.; SMITH, J.

BASHORE v. MOONEY et al. (Civ. 217.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District. California. Aug. 30, 1906.)

1. Quieting Title—Issues and Proof.

Though, in a suit to quiet title to an irrigation ditch, the complaint alleged plaintiff to be the owner of the ditch in fee, it did not preclude the court from finding a right or ownership in the nature of an easement.

2. Waters and Water Courses—Irrigation Prescription.

One who constructed an irrigation ditch on the land of another might acquire title to the ditch by adverse use for the statutory period.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 48, Cent. Dig. Waters and Water Courses, § 144.]

3. Same.

One might acquire a prescriptive right to use an irrigation ditch to convey a limited quantity of water to his land, while another retained the right also to use the ditch for his own purposes to the extent of its remaining capacity.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 48, Cent. Dig. Waters and Water Courses, §§ 149, 150.]

4. Same—Elements of Right.

In a suit to quiet title to an irrigation ditch, a finding that it had been used by the persons constructing it, openly, continuously, adversely to the titles of all others and under a claim of title exclusive of any other right, as their own, and notoriously and uninterruptedly for a period of more than five years, prior to the commencement of the action, and that they had paid all the taxes levied or assessed against the ditch, and the right of way therefor, sufficiently showed a prescriptive right.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 48, Cent. Dig. Waters and Water Courses, § 150.]

5. Same.

Where one constructed an irrigation ditch across the lands of another and used the ditch adversely for the statutory period, he was not prevented from acquiring a prescriptive right by the fact that he took the water for his ditch from another ditch instead of from a natural stream.

6. Frauds, Statute of—Interests in Real Estate—Irrigation Ditches.

A right of way for an irrigation ditch is an interest in real property within Code Civ. Proc. § 1971, providing that no interest in real property can be created, assigned, etc., otherwise than by a conveyance in writing subscribed by the grantor, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Frauds, Statute of, § 84.]

7. Waters and Water Courses—Prescription—Evidence.

In a suit to quiet title to an irrigation ditch, evidence considered, and held sufficient to warrant a finding that plaintiff had acquired a prescriptive right to the ditch.

8. Evidence — Admissions — Ownership of Property.

Where, in a suit to quiet title to an irrigation ditch, plaintiff claimed that it had been so constructed and used over the lands of defendant by plaintiff's predecessor, and that plaintiff had a prescriptive right to it, it was proper to admit conversations between plaintiff and defendant, wherein plaintiff inquired as to the ownership of the ditch and defendant made no claim to it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, §§ 771, 772.]

9. SAME.

In a suit to quiet title to an irrigation ditch, claimed by plaintiff by prescriptive right acquired by his predecessor, it was proper to admit in evidence testimony of the predecessor as to his efforts to sell the ditch to defendant, and that defendant did not dispute the witness' ownership.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, §§ 771, 772.]

10. TRIAL—ORDER OF PROOF.

Where, in a suit to quiet title to an irrigation ditch, plaintiff claimed that his predecessor had acquired a prescriptive right to it, there was no error in admitting in evidence deeds from plaintiff's predecessor to him before the introduction of evidence tending to show that plaintiff's predecessor acquired any title.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, §§ 138, 139, 141, 143.]

11. EVIDENCE — RELEVANCY — MATTERS EXPLANATORY OF EVIDENCE.

Where, in a suit to quiet title to an irrigation ditch, plaintiff claimed that his predecessor had acquired a prescriptive right to it, and evidence was introduced tending to show adverse use by a third person, it was proper to admit evidence of certain leases made by plaintiff's predecessor to such third person to show that he used the ditch under lease from the predecessor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, §§ 134, 135.]

12. APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR — EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—SUBSEQUENT ADMISSION.

In a suit to quiet title to an irrigation ditch, plaintiff claimed that his predecessor had acquired a prescriptive right to maintain the ditch over defendant's land and a witness testified that he had frequently worked the ditch on defendant's land, and was then asked by defendant if he did not get defendant's permission, and an objection to the question was sustained, but the witness subsequently testified that defendant directed him about the work. Held, that any error in sustaining the objection was cured.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 4200–4205.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by John Bashore against H. M. Mooney and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, certain defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hannah & Miller and Alfred Daggett, for appellants. Chas. G. Lamberson, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action to quiet title to a certain water ditch known as the "Zumwalt Extension of the Tulare Irrigation Company's Ditch," and the right of way therefor. Two of the three original plaintiffs conveyed to the third after the complaint was filed, and the latter filed a supplemental and amended complaint as sole plaintiff in the case. There were numerous defendants, as to some of whom the court found that they had no interest in the ditch; as to others the court found that they had a certain interest therein; as to the defendant Tulare Irrigation Company it was found that it was the owner of said ditch to a certain point, connecting with the portion of said ditch found to belong to plaintiff, with "the right at all times to turn into said portion of said ditch owned by plaintiff as aforesaid, all the surplus water of said defendant which it shall desire to turn therein." None of these defendants appeal. As to defendants, appellants, the court found that they are the owners of the right to maintain certain drops and headgates in the ditch and certain side ditches leading therefrom on certain land by them owned, situated in section 7, township 19 south, range 25 east, through which plaintiff's ditch runs, in part, and to take therefrom water sufficient to irrigate 100 acres of land on said section, but that they have no other right to or interest in plaintiff's said ditch. Plaintiff was found to be the owner of the ditch and right of way in question, except as above indicated and judgment passed for plaintiff accordingly. The defendants last above referred to appeal from that part of the judgment which adjudges plaintiff to be the owner of so much of said ditch and right of way as passes over said last-named defendants' lands in said section 7 with the right to enter thereon at proper times to repair and operate the same; also from that part of the judgment which limits said defendants' rights as above stated. After judgment was entered and notice of appeal served, defendant and appellant J. J. Mooney died, and defendant H. M. Mooney was substituted, as administrator. In their brief appellants do not question that part of the decree or the findings which relate to the Tulare Irrigation Company and that interest will not be noticed farther. Indeed, by their answer they seem to concede the rights of the irrigation company. The appealing defendants in their answer denied plaintiff's ownership of the portion of said ditch which passes over defendants' said land, and alleged that the Tulare Irrigation Company is the owner of the portion of said ditch from the east line of said section 7 for a distance of one-quarter of a mile, and that the remaining portion of said ditch situated on said section 7 is owned by defendants. In the answer of some of the many remaining defendants it is alleged that the entire ditch from its point of commencement to its end was constructed for the use and benefit of the owners of the land lying along the same, "and as a neighborhood ditch to supply water for irrigation to and upon said lands from the system of the Tulare Irrigation Company and from other irrigation systems * * * and has been since its construction appurtenant to the said lands of defendants." Other defendants claimed part ownership in the ditch. The Tulare Irrigation Company was made a defendant upon a demand of several of the defendants. Appellants challenge the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings upon which the interests decreed to plaintiff and appellants are based. It is also urged that the findings do not, nor does the complaint, support the judgment.

The judgment and its support: The contention is: (1) That the complaint is insufficient to support the judgment, because based upon the allegation that the plaintiff is the owner in fee of the ditch in question, while the findings show simply a tenancy in common with appellants. (2) That the findings show that the ditch is constructed upon land owned by appellants, and plaintiff never acquired any title to the ditch from the owner by conveyance or agreement. (3) That the findings fail to show that plaintiff acquired title by prescription as required by the statute of limitations. (4) That the findings are so uncertain that it cannot be ascertained therefrom to what extent plaintiff is the owner of a right of way for the ditch referred to in the findings and judgment.

1. The point that the findings are insufficient as to the extent of plaintiff's title, because of the allegation in the complaint of ownership in fee, is not well taken. That plaintiff claimed title in fee did not preclude the court from finding a right or ownership in the nature of an easement; the greater title alleged included the lesser. The judgment may not exceed the demand of the complaint, but there is no rule that would prevent the court from granting less relief than that demanded. Plaintiff's right had its inception in the act of constructing the ditch, and if it ripened into title by adverse use for the statutory period this was sufficient.

2. It was not necessary that the prescriptive right should have its origin in a grant from the owners of the land or by agreement with them. Code Civ. Proc., §§ 324, 325. The rule requiring entire possession by one claiming land under a prescriptive right is inapplicable to rights of way for roads and ditches. Otherwise it would be practically impossible to acquire similar easements by prescription. It was said in Humphreys v. Blasingame, 104 Cal. 40, 44, 37 Pac. 804, 805: "Plaintiff's use of the way under claim of right was necessarily hostile, but it need not amount to an ouster or exclusion of the defendant from a right to use the way. The use of the way, if without right, is a trespass, which would have given the defendant a right of action, and that is all that is necessary to set the statute running, so far as a right of action is concerned." Of course there must be occupancy of so much of the land as is sought to be taken for the right of way.

3. The prescriptive right which the court found to have ripened in plaintiff and his predecessors in interest was initiated as early as 1879 and is the right referred to in the findings and, as presently shown, continued until the filing of the complaint, except as to defendants' interest. Defendants' prescriptive right was found by the court to have been initiated about the year 1890, long after the five years adverse use by plaintiff's predecessors had elapsed. That defendants could acquire a prescriptive right to use the ditch to convey a limited quantity of water to their lands while plaintiff or his predecessors retained the right also to use the ditch for his own purposes to the extent of its remaining capacity, we have no doubt. We so held substantially in the recent case of Smith v. Hampshire (Cal. App.) 87 Pac. 224. See, also, Abbott v. Pond, 142 Cal. 393, 396, 76 Pac. 60. "Every interest created in favor of several persons in their own right is an interest in common," unless acquired in a way not involved here. Civ. Code, § 686.

4. It is also contended that the findings are insufficient to show a prescriptive right. The particular finding attacked is the following: "That ever since the construction of said ditch as aforesaid (which the court found was in 1879) it has been used by the said persons who constructed the same as aforesaid, and by their grantees, openly, continuously, adversely to the titles to all others, and under a claim of title exclusive of any other right, as their own, and notoriously and uninterruptedly for a period of more than five years prior to the commencement of this action, and they have paid all the taxes levied or assessed against said ditch and the right of way therefor." This finding, in our opinion, covers every element mentioned in Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 595, 49 Am. Rep. 100, as requisite to a perfect title by prescription. This case has been frequently cited approvingly as authority on this point. The title there involved was to a city lot and the court said: "There are five elements required to make out an adverse possession sufficient to constitute a defense under the statute of limitations. (1) The possession must be by actual occupation, open and notorious, not clandestine. (2) It must be hostile to the plaintiff's title. (3) It must be held under a claim of title, exclusive of any other right, as one's own. (4) It must be continuous and uninterrupted for a period of five years prior to the commencement of the action, not, however, necessarily next before the commencement of the action. (5) Since the passage of the proviso to section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure in 1878, payment of taxes." Appellants cite Churchill v. Louie, 135 Cal. 608, 67 Pac. 1052, and claim that it is there held as necessary that it must appear that the use was exclusive. The point there decided was that the pleading failed to show "that the use was exclusive or adverse to plaintiff * * * or that it was adverse to any one." Section 324 of the Code of Civil Procedure is as follows: "Where it appears that there has been an actual, continued occupation of land, under a claim of title, exclusive of any other right, but not founded upon a written instrument, judgment or decree, the land so actually occupied, and no other, is deemed to have been held adversely." Section 325 of the same code declares that adverse possession is not established, "unless it shall be shown that the land has been occupied and claimed for the period of five years continuously, and the party or persons, * * * have paid all the taxes * * * which have been levied and assessed upon such land." The courts have added some explanatory words in formulating the elements which are deemed necessary, under the statute, to constitute prescriptive title, but they do not and could not materially change its requirements. When these requirements of occupancy are fully met, a title is conferred, "denominated a title by prescription, which is sufficient against all." Civ. Code, § 1007. We are unable to discover any element lacking in the finding referred to which is necessary to meet the statutory requirements or the decisions of our Supreme Court.

5. There is no radical or other uncertainty in the description of the ditch such as is contended by appellants. It was commonly known as the "Zumwalt Extension Ditch," sometimes called the "Mooney Ditch," and its location was well known. There would be no difficulty in finding it from the description given, and a map was made part of the bill of exceptions, by defendants, which locates the ditch definitely.

Appeal from the order: In discussing this branch of the case appellants appear to attach importance to the fact that the ditch in question is not used to divert water from a natural water course but from the canal of the irrigation company, and to the further fact that the land over which the ditch runs belongs to defendants. It is immaterial whence plaintiff gets the water for his ditch, whether from another ditch or from some natural stream. The ownership of the land by defendants is also, as we have already shown, equally immaterial. It is also argued, and may not be disputed, that a ditch or right of way is an interest in real property and can be granted only by an instrument in writing (Code Civ. Proc., § 1971; Smith v. O'Hara, 43 Cal. 371; Hayes v. Fine, 91 Cal. 396, 27 Pac. 772) and if the evidence in the opinion of the trial court, had established simply a parol license, as claimed by appellants, founded in personal confidence or favor, no interest in the land would have been created that was not subject to revocation. Jensen v. Hunter (Cal. Sup.) 41 Pac. 14, is cited by appellants, to the point. The evidence shows that the ditch in question from its point of connection with the Tulare Irrigation Company's ditch to its terminus is four or five miles long, constituting a continuous ditch, and from it several defendants at different points have obtained water to irrigate their land for various crops ever since its completion. It was constructed in the spring of 1879, as found by the court, and, as the evidence establishes, by D. K. Zumwalt, J. B. Zumwalt, Samuel Fowler, and A. J. Fowler. It was an extension and known as the "Zumwalt Extension of the Tulare Irrigation Company's Ditch" and was designed to irrigate the lands situated west of defendants' lands. There was some controversy with this irrigation company as to the starting point, but by stipulation it was agreed that it began 15.54 chains west of the east line of section 7, above described, and ran thence southwesterly across said section of which the south half and the southwestern quarter of the northwestern quarter was then owned by Michael Mooney. He died in November, 1881, and defendant John J. Mooney became the executor of his will and administered his estate and managed the property until February, 1890, when it was distributed, including the said lands in section 7, to defendants (appellants), the heirs at law of Michael Mooney. The map shows that the ditch passes over the lands of defendants J. J. Mooney and H. M. Mooney.

The contested and vital issue, reduced to its simplest form, is whether the right of way and ownership of the ditch, claimed by plaintiff, ripened into a prescriptive title. Some testimony given by witness Samuel Fowler was offered by these defendants tending to establish the fact that the ditch was built by consent of Michael Mooney, and that he agreed to pay Fowler $100 if he, Fowler, would bring it through Mooney's land, and hence that Mooney became its owner. It would require strong evidence to show that a ditch of the length and cost of this one, made to serve so many interests, would be left to the absolute control of Mooney by the sole ownership and control of the section connecting the ditch with the water system of the Tulare Irrigation Company. Similar evidence would be called for to convince the ordinary mind that such a ditch would be constructed under a mere license subject to revocation at any moment.

As appellants place much reliance on Fowler's testimony, coming from one of the ditch builders, it may as well be here noticed as elsewhere. He testified that he met Michael Mooney at the time the ditch was projected. He was asked what was said about the ditch between him and Mooney and answered: "I told him I wanted to build a ditch down through his place. I asked him how much he would be willing to assist me in building the ditch, how much he would pay me. He said he would give me $100 if I would bring water through there. Q. Did he say he would give you $100 if you would bring water through there, or if you would bring the ditch across his land? A. Well, it was $100 for helping construct the ditch. He was to give $100 if I was to build the ditch through there. That is about all I can recollect of it." On cross-examination he testified. "I think I had gone up there and located where I wanted the ditch before I saw Mooney. I and D. K. Zumwalt, J. B. Zumwalt, and my son Jack had agreed that we should build the ditch. I certainly would have built the ditch whether Mooney had offered to pay me anything or not. It was my intention to go and build the ditch, provided I was not interfered with by any one." He testified that there was nothing said between him and Mooney to the effect that, when built, the ditch was to belong to Mooney. It appeared that witness did not call upon Mooney for the $100, nor did he present a claim against his estate therefor. But some time after it was too late to present claims he was given some hay by J. J. Mooney, value not stated, on account of this claim, but whether it was "in satisfaction of the debt his father owed" the witness, the latter could not recollect.

Witness D. K. Zumwalt testified: "J. B. Zumwalt, Sam Fowler, Jack Fowler, and myself constructed that ditch. I made no arrangements for any leave or license to make that ditch through the Mooney land." In reply to the use made of the ditch he testified: "Running water through it for irrigation purposes, stock, and irrigation purposes. The men who helped make the ditch, I mean J. B. Zumwalt, Samuel Fowler, and Jack Fowler, who assisted me in building the ditch used it in conjunction with me, and afterwards our neighbors, we permitted them to use water from the ditch. Jack Fowler's proper name was A. J. Fowler. Samuel Fowler continued to use the ditch somewhat, but not regularly, until the time he sold to me. J. B. Zumwalt continued to use it up to the time of his death, which occurred about December, 1891, and I continued to use it more or less each year up to the present time. From the time I acquired all the title to that ditch I used it for the purpose of conveying water up to the time I sold it, and have been using water through the same ditch since, but not exercising control. I continued to run water through there, and, whenever repairs or anything was necessary, it was done through my men, or others along the ditch using water. I never at any time asked the permission of the Mooneys or any of them, to run water through that ditch, and I never at any time asked permission of the Mooneys, or any of them, to go upon their land for the purpose of repairing the ditch. Whatever I did in connection with running that water through the ditch was done without any reference to the rights or claims of the Mooneys, or any of them, or in relation to anything I did to the ditch. The Mooneys did not, nor did any of them, ever at any time interfere in any way with my operation of that ditch." He testified to having been along the ditch on the Mooney land and clearing the ditch, and that he had sent his men there to make repairs on the ditch, and that to his knowledge the Mooneys made no objection. He testified also to having proposed on several occasions to sell the ditch to the Tulare Irrigation Company while J. J. Mooney was president of the company, and in 1891, just before the death of J. B. Zumwalt, who joined with him for that purpose; that J. J. Mooney was present at the meeting of the board of directors when the matter was talked over, and that he made no objection on the ground that witness was not the owner of the ditch. Witness stated, however, that some one objected to buying the ditch "because of the adverse claim of Stufflebeam and the Bashores"; that the directors, including Mooney, went with witness along the entire line of the ditch to examine it and witness went for the purpose of showing the property he proposed to sell, and it included the ditch over the Mooney land. He testified that most of the work done in constructing the ditch was by hired men; that some time in "the latter part of the 80's," about 1886, J. J. Mooney asked permission to use the ditch to irrigate some land and to put in a headgate to turn out the water and witness stated to him that there was no objection. Witness did not recollect that permission was afterwards asked, but he testified: "The Mooneys, H. M. and J. J., have used that ditch every year and up to now, every year to irrigate their lands through which it flows, and they have not come to me to get my permission to do that."

There was evidence that owners of land along the ditch below the Mooney land, including, among others, the ditch builders, were users of the water coming through the ditch from the time of its completion, and that they exercised the right of repairing and controlling the ditch from its head down. There was more or less controversy among these users with D. K. Zumwalt as to the right to the ditch and in some instances litigation ensued. The evidence tended to show that these contested rights did not involve the Mooneys, and that the latter made no claim to the ditch itself beyond the right to use a certain amount of the water running through it, of which the extreme claim proven was a right to use the water necessary to irrigate 100 acres of their land, as found by the court, and there was evidence that the Mooneys made no claim to the ditch itself until about the time this action was brought. The evidence was abundant to establish the prescriptive right as found by the court to be in appellants. Touching plaintiff's right to the ditch there was more or less conflict in the evidence, but there was sufficient to support the findings. It is not the office of the reviewing tribunal to attempt a reconciliation of the conflicting evidence, or to say what witnesses are to be believed and what ones to be distrusted, or to determine where the preponderance of evidence lies. This is peculiarly the function of the trial judge.

Appellants assign numerous errors in the admission or exclusion of evidence. Some of these will be noticed; all of them do not call for comment. Plaintiff was interrogated as to certain conversations with J. J. Mooney concerning this ditch. That occurring in 1880 need not be noticed as the testimony was withdrawn. The witness testified as to conversations with Mooney in 1884 and some other times, the object of which seems to have been, not to show a transfer by Mooney or create an estoppel, as suggested by appellants, but to show that the witness was inquiring as to the ownership of the ditch right, and that Mooney made no claim to it. As a circumstance bearing upon the issues the evidence was admissible.

It would require a recital of much evidence to show its bearing as to the witness having turned water out of ditch on the Higbee land above the Mooney land. Conceding its irrelevancy it was harmless.

The testimony of witness Zumwalt as to his efforts to sell the ditch to the Tulare Irrigation Company while Mooney was president was admissible as tending to show Zumwalt's claim of ownership, and Mooney's acquiescence in the claim by his conduct at that time.

The deeds placed in evidence by plaintiff, showing that the title claimed by the original builders of the ditch had been conveyed by them to D. K. Zumwalt and through him finally to plaintiff, were admissible. The objection urged is that there was as yet no evidence, introduced when these documents were offered, tending to show that Zumwalt ever had any title to the ditch by adverse use or otherwise. The order of proof is not ground for error. We must consider these conveyances and other documentary proofs in connection with all the other evidence of which there was some supporting the findings as to the Zumwalt title by prescription. The case of Hayes v. Fine, 91 Cal., 391–398, 27 Pac. 772, is not in point. There the claim made was under an instrument in writing, and the effort to establish the claim by proof of labor done would be inadmissible because in the nature of parol proof where something higher is required. Here the claim is not based at all upon a written instrument, but upon adverse use, and that having been established the subsequent conveyances were admissible to show ownership in plaintiff.

Certain leases made by Zumwalt in 1885 and 1886, by which he agreed that one Adlesbach might use the ditch, were admitted. This was in plaintiff's rebuttal and was for the purpose of meeting certain evidence which concerned defendants Peter and Marie Adelsbach. There was some evidence tending to show adverse use by the Adelsbachs, and counsel stated that the purpose was to show that they used the ditch under lease from Zumwalt, whose interest plaintiff had acquired. We cannot see that the evidence injuriously affected appellants under the offer.

Defendants' error marked 13 was cured by their subsequently drawing out the facts sought. Witness Fay was a defendant and, when called as a witness for defendants, testified that he had gone frequently into the Mooney field to work on the ditch. He was asked by defendants if he did not, before doing this work, get permission from John or Hugh Mooney. The question was objected to and objection sustained as irrelevant, incompetent, and self-serving. He subsequently testified that J. J. Mooney directed him about the work. This answer appears to us to have met the point defendants were making. If Fay was working under direction of Mooney, the latter's permission would seem to follow.

Certain objections were made to evidence which appears to have concerned defendants other than appellants and was admitted not so much as bearing upon appellants' interests as upon the interests of other defendants or as tending to contradict certain of their witnesses. We cannot see that appellants were injuriously affected by this testimony.

Discovering no prejudicial error in the record, the judgment and order are affirmed.

ANDERSON v. ANDERSON. (Civ. 208.)

(Court of Appeal, First District. California. Aug. 24, 1906.)

1. DIVORCE—NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—IRREGULARITIES IN CONDUCT OF TRIAL.

Where, in an action for divorce, after the evidence on behalf of the plaintiff had been given, the defendant was called as a witness and testified in her own behalf, but before she concluded her testimony, she was interrupted by the court, and informed that she had testified enough, and the court then, before she concluded her testimony or left the witness stand, granted plaintiff a divorce and denied the prayer in the cross-complaint, this constituted an irregularity entitling the defendant to a new trial.

2. APPEAL—PRESENTATION OF QUESTION IN LOWER COURT—AFFIDAVITS FOR NEW TRIAL.

Where objections to affidavits for a new trial were not supported by any facts presented to the court either when the affidavits were presented, or when the motion for a new trial was heard, and the bill of exceptions, authenticating the affidavits, was subsequently settled by the court without reference to the objections they cannot be considered on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by John Anderson against Johanna Matilda Anderson for divorce. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. Morgenthal, for appellant. Jos. Rothschild, for respondent.

HARRISON, P. J. In his complaint, the plaintiff alleges as his cause of action the extreme cruelty of the defendant, setting forth divers acts thereof, all of which were denied by the defendant in her answer, and in addition thereto she filed a cross-complaint, charging the plaintiff with extreme cruelty, for which she asks a decree of divorce in her favor. Upon the trial the court found that "all of the allegations and averments in the complaint as to defendant's cruelty are true, and all the denials, allegations, and averments in the answer and cross-complaint having reference to plaintiff's cruelty towards defendant are untrue," and directed an interlocutory decree of divorce to be entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant. The defendant moved for a new trial upon the grounds of irregularity in the proceedings of the court, by which she was prevented from having a fair trial, and that the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision of the court. This motion was presented and heard upon a statement of the case and affidavits of the defendant and her daughter properly authenticated in a bill of exceptions. The motion for a new trial was denied, and from this order and from the judgment the defendant has taken the present appeal.

It is shown by the affidavits that after the evidence on behalf of the plaintiff had been given the defendant was called as a witness, and testified in her own behalf, and that before she had concluded her testimony, and while she was still on the witness stand she was interrupted by the court, and informed by him that she had testified enough; that the court then and there, before she had concluded her testimony or left the witness stand, granted the plaintiff a divorce, and denied the prayer in the cross-complaint; that upon her counsel objecting thereto, and informing the court that he had other witnesses in court, the judge informed him that he had the privilege to appeal to the Supreme Court. In the statement of the case which was settled by the judge it is shown that after the plaintiff had rested his case the defendant offered herself as a witness on her own behalf, and after having given testimony in contradiction of much of the testimony of the plaintiff, and before her testimony was concluded, the judge interrupted her saying: "That is enough. Let an interlocutory decree for the plaintiff be entered"; and upon her counsel stating to the court "We have other testimony here," the court replied, "I do not care for it at all. Take your exception. Take your interlocutory decree."

In her affidavit the defendant also recounted in detail the testimony which she intended to give for the purpose of overcoming the testimony on behalf of the plaintiff and in support of the denials in her answer and the allegations of her cross-complaint, and which testimony appears to have been clearly relevant to the issues therein; and in the affidavit of her daughter the latter states similar testimony which she would have given if she had been permitted so to do. The matter set forth in these affidavits was not contradicted, nor were there any counteraffidavits filed on behalf of the plaintiff. That these proceedings constituted an irregularity of the court is not open to dispute, and that, by reason thereof, the defendant was prevented from having a fair trial is equally clear. Whatever weight the testimony of the plaintiff might have with the court in support of the allegations of his complaint, it was clearly irregular for the court to determine the issues before it upon that testimony without giving to the defendant a full opportunity to present her testimony, and to give to it proper consideration in connection with that of the plaintiff. And it was equally erroneous for the court, after refusing to permit the defendant to give any testimony in support of the averments in her cross-complaint in reference to the plaintiff's cruelty, to find as a fact that those averments were untrue.

The bill of exceptions, authenticating the affidavits, contains a subscript by the attorney for the plaintiff that it may be settled by the court "plaintiff saving the objection that said affidavits were served and filed in violation of law and in violation of section 659 Code Civil Procedure, and on the further ground that all the matters therein contained are set out in the answer and cross-complaint of defendant, and present no new or further evidence to justify the court granting a new trial." No facts in support of this objection were stated or presented to the court, nor does it appear that any objection to the affidavits was made at the time they were presented, or when the motion for a new trial was heard; and as the bill was subsequently settled by the court without reference thereto the objection cannot be considered. The fact that the matters contained in the affidavits are set forth in the answer and cross-complaint was not a matter of objection. It was still necessary for the defendant to establish the same at the trial of the cause by competent evidence.

The judgment and order are reversed.

DAWSON v. CERF. (Civ. 212.)

(Court of Appeal, First District. California. Aug. 30, 1906.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—RECOVERY OF POSSESSION BY LANDLORD — UNLAWFUL DETAINER.

Where the term of a lease expired on March 15, 1904, but the lessee holding over continued to pay rent monthly in advance on the first day of each calendar month, and the lessor served notice that an increased rent would be demanded from January 15, 1905, and, on January 3d, served on the lessee a demand for a half month's rent at the former rate and a half month's rent at the increased rate, which was refused, but the lessee tendered a month's rent at the former rate, the lessor could not maintain forcible entry and detainer, since, conceding his contention that the lessee's month expired January 15, 1905, so that his notice was sufficient under Civ. Code, § 827, providing that in a lease from month to month, the landlord may, by giving notice at least 15 days before the expiration of the month, change the terms of the lease to take effect at the expiration of the month, no part of the rent for the month beginning January 15th, would be due before that date.

Action by George Dawson against Myrtile Cerf. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. J. Burt, for appellant. B. L. Quayle, for respondent.

COOPER, J. Action of unlawful detainer. Findings were filed, upon which judgment was ordered and entered for plaintiff for the restitution of the premises described in the complaint, besides rent and costs. This appeal is from the judgment on the judgment roll with a bill of exceptions. The facts, so far as necessary to be stated, are as follows: In February, 1903, the plaintiff was in possession of a lot on the south side of California street, east of Sansome, having a frontage of 23 feet on California street by a uniform depth of 66 feet, together with the building thereon, 321 California street, under a lease from the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, which lease, by its terms, was to expire on the 15th day of March, 1904. During said month, and while plaintiff was so in possession of the premises, he leased or sublet a portion thereof known as the "cigar stand" to the defendant for the term of 1 year and 1½ months, from February 1, 1903, to and including the 15th day of March, 1904, which was the time when the plaintiff's lease from the insurance company would terminate. The lease to defendant provided that the rent should be $80 per month, payable monthly in advance. The lease contained the following clause: "If said lessor shall hold said premises at No. 321 California street, as tenant or otherwise, after March 15th, 1904, it is hereby agreed for the parties hereto, their respective heirs, executors and assigns, that said lessee shall have the privilege of retaining the premises hereby demised upon the same terms and conditions as are herein expressed, for such term as said lessee may elect, however not to exceed the term for which said lessor, his heirs, executors or assigns may hold said premises as aforesaid; and in no event to exceed a period of twenty years from date hereof." Defendant entered into possession and paid his rent according to the terms of his lease up to the termination thereof, and there is no question raised as to the written lease during the time it was in force. Before the written lease expired, on March 1, 1904, defendant paid to plaintiff the sum of $80, and received from him a receipt of which the following is a copy: "Rent must be paid in advance. Mch. 1, 1904. $80.00. Received from M. Cerf eighty 0-100 dollars rent of cigar store 321 Cal. St. S. F., from March 1st to April 1st, 1904. George Dawson." The defendant continued in possession and paid his rent to plaintiff, receiving similar receipts for every month thereafter up to January 1, 1905. During this time no other or different lease had been made. The rent was paid monthly as before and at the same rate provided in the original lease. On December 22, 1904, the plaintiff served defendant with a notice in writing, of which the following is a copy: "San Francisco, Cal., December 22, 1904.—Mr. Myrtile Cerf: You will please take notice that on and after January 15, 1905, the rent for the cigar stand at 321 California street, San Francisco, which stand you now occupy, will be one thousand dollars per month, payable, as heretofore, in advance. [Signed] George Dawson, 321 California, street San Francisco." On January 3, 1905, the defendant tendered to plaintiff $80 as rent for the month of January, being the amount of rent he had paid under the written lease and the amount he had paid each and every month thereafter, but plaintiff declined to receive the rent so tendered. On the last-named day plaintiff served a written demand upon defendant for $540, rent for January, 1905, consisting of the following items:

January 1st to January 15th at $80 per month	$ 40 00
January 15th to and including January 31, 1905	500 00

The demand stated that the defendant was required to pay the said sum of $540 as rent for the month of January, otherwise to surrender possession of the premises. After the expiration of three days, and on January 9, 1905, this action was commenced.

It is not necessary to pass upon the defendant's contention that he had the right, under his written lease, to continue it for such term as he might elect, nor upon the plaintiff's contention that defendant waived his right to another or fixed term by not exercising his right to elect before, or at the time of, the expiration of the written lease. It may be conceded for the purposes of this case that the plaintiff's contention is correct to the effect that defendant was holding under a tenancy from month to month, and that his month would expire January 15, 1905, and yet the plaintiff cannot recover in this action. It is provided in section 827 of the Civil Code that in a lease from month to month the landlord may, by giving notice in writing at least 15 days before the expiration of the month change the terms of the lease to take effect at the expiration of the month. In this case the plaintiff, in his notice, took the position that defendant's month would expire, and now contends that it did expire, on January 15, 1905. By the notice the terms of the lease were to be changed from and after January 15th to "one thousand dollars per month payable, as heretofore, in advance." It is therefore evident that, until the 15th day of January, 1905, the defendant did not owe $1,000 rent for the month commencing January 15, 1905. Nor did he owe $500 for one-half of the month. The terms of the lease were not to be changed until January 15th, at which time the $1,000 was to be due for the month commencing at that time. According to the demand made here $500 was claimed of the defendant before plaintiff claims that the lease had been changed, and not only this, but the suit was commenced before the change of the lease was to take effect. If the notice had stated that the rent would be $1,000 per month payable semimonthly in advance, the $500 for the latter half of the month of January and the first half of the month, under the changed terms of the lease, would not have been due until the 15th day of January, 1905. At the time this action was commenced the plaintiff had been tendered more than the amount that was due under the tenancy by which the defendant was holding. He could not recover under the changed terms of the lease until it took effect as changed.

The judgment is reversed.

CALEGARIS v. CALEGARIS. (Civ. 159.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 24, 1906.)

DIVORCE—DECREE—MODIFICATION.

Where plaintiff in a suit for divorce prayed for the custody of her four children and one-half of the community property, she could not have a decree granting all of her prayers subsequently modified, so as to include directions to defendant to pay plaintiff a certain sum monthly for the care, custody and education of the children, notwithstanding Civ. Code, § 138, providing that the court may, before or after judgment, give such direction for the custody, care, and education of the children as may seem necessary and proper, and may at any time vacate or modify the same.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Divorce, § 803.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

Petition by Elvira Calegaris against Joseph Calegaris to modify judgment in divorce action. From an order modifying the judgment, defendant appeals. Reversed.

P. F. Dunne and O'Connor & Hirsh, for appellant. John J. Barrett, for respondent.

COOPER, J. This appeal is from an order purporting to modify a judgment and decree of divorce by directing defendant to pay to plaintiff the sum of $60 per month for the future care, education, and support of four minor children.

The action was brought by plaintiff for a divorce on the ground of desertion. She asked in the complaint for the care, custody, and possession of the minor children—Mario, aged 12 years, Inez, aged 10 years, Marguerite, aged 8 years, and Hugo, aged 6 years—and for one-half of the community property, alleged to have been of the value of $60,000. The court made findings, and caused to be entered a decree on the 17th day of April, 1902, granting plaintiff a divorce, the custody of the minor children, and awarding her the sum of $30,000 as permanent alimony for her support, being the amount prayed for in the decree, and which was one-half of the community property. This decree gave no directions as to the education of the minor children, and made no provision for their maintenance or support, but gave to plaintiff their "sole care, custody, control, and possession." It is has never been appealed from, and has become final. On August 25, 1902, but a little over four months from the date of the decree, plaintiff filed her petition, in which she set forth that the original decree made no provision for the maintenance, support, care, custody, or education of said minor children, or any of them, and that they are still minors. The petition further stated that each of the said minors was without means, but contained no statement as to the plaintiff's means, or as to the $30,000 she had received from the defendant under the decree, and concluded with a prayer that the court order the defendant to pay the plaintiff the sum of $50 per month each for the care, custody, and education of said minors. It appeared at the hearing that the minors were all in plaintiff's custody, living in her house, and attending the public schools. It also appeared that the defendant married after the decree, and now has another family to support. After the hearing, and on the 13th day of October, 1902, the court made an order modifying the judgment and decree of divorce by directing the defendant to pay to plaintiff the sum of $15 per month each from said date "for the future care, custody, and education of each of said four above-named minor children."

The respondent relies upon the provisions of section 138, Civ. Code, and the order must find support, if it can be supported at all, under the provisions of this section, which at the time it was made provided as follows: "In an action for divorce the court may, before or after judgment, give such direction for the custody, care and education of the children of the marriage as may seem necessary or proper, and may at any time vacate or modify the same." Under this section the court may, after the judgment, vacate or modify any provision therein which gives a direction for the custody, care, or education of the minor children of the marriage. The primary purpose of this section is that the children of the marriage shall be properly cared for, and the authority thereby given is to be exercised in their interest. Crater v. Crater, 135 Cal. 634, 67 Pac. 1049. If no provision in reference to the children is made in the original judgment, but, by reason of their necessities, or for the protection of their interests, any judicial action is required in their behalf, it may be sought in an independent proceeding therefor. By the terms of the original decree herein, the care, custody, and control of the children were given to the plaintiff, and in the order appealed from no modification or change of the judgment in this respect has been made; and in awarding to her $30,000 of the community property, estimated at one-half thereof, and making no provision that the defendant shall contribute to the support or education of the children, it must be assumed that the court intended that he should not contribute to the plaintiff any portion of the expense incurred by her in caring or providing for them. See Parkhurst v. Parkhurst, 118 Cal. 18, 50 Pac. 9. The failure to provide in the original decree that defendant should pay any money to plaintiff for the care, custody, and education of the children had the legal effect of an adjudication as between them that he should not be required to make any payment therefor (Howell v. Howell, 104 Cal. 45, 37 Pac. 770, 43 Am. St. Rep. 70; Lamb v. Wahlenmeier, 144 Cal. 91, 77 Pac. 765, 103 Am. St. Rep. 66); and section 138, Civ. Code, above quoted, confers no authority upon the court to declare such obligation. "If the decree of divorce makes no provision for the maintenance of the children of the marriage, the court is without jurisdiction subsequently to make any order compelling either party to pay to the other for such maintenance." Shattuck v. Shattuck, 135 Cal. 192, 67 Pac. 45. Section 196, Civ. Code, declares: "The parent entitled to the custody of a child must give him support and education suitable to his circumstances." When a parent is deprived of the custody of his child, and therefore of the right to its services and earnings, by summary proceedings, he is no longer liable, as a general proposition, for its support and education—per Temple, J., Ex parte Miller, 109 Cal. 643, 42 Pac. 428.

The order herein does not, however, in any way modify or purport to change the provision of the original decree relative to the care or custody of the minor children, nor does it give any "direction" as to their future care, custody, or education, except in so far as it orders the defendant to pay to the plaintiff $60 per month therefor. Not only does it fail to give any direction as to the education of the minors, but it does not even provide that the money which it requires the defendant to pay shall be expended in their education. It merely directs that the defendant shall pay to the plaintiff $60 per month for their "care, custody, and education," thus imposing upon him a pecuniary obligation from which he had been exonerated by virtue of the original judgment in the cause. The order directs the money to be paid to the plaintiff. No direction is given as to the education of the minors, but a direction for the education of minor children means something more than a mere order to pay money. The plaintiff is not even directed to send the minors to school, nor is it directed that they shall attend any school, or that they shall receive any education. As to whether or not they shall be sent to school, or educated in any manner, or at all, is discretionary with the plaintiff. The Code does not contemplate that a father may be directed to pay a monthly allowance for the education of a minor child to the mother, who receives no direction and is not by the order required to educate such child. The order, if it had made the allowance to the plaintiff for her own use and support, or for the use and support of the minors, would have been void as beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and it is none the less so although called by a different name. The plaintiff made no showing that any expense would be incurred in the education of said children, or in any way except for their support and maintenance, nor did she make any showing that she had not ample means therefor.

We are further of the opinion that the court, under the circumstances of this case, abused its discretion in making the order. The court, in view of all the circumstances, had given the plaintiff, by the decree of divorce, all the money and property that she asked for. It had also given her the custody of the minor children. The defendant had the right to suppose that the decree would end the litigation, and settle the property rights as between himself and the plaintiff. The plaintiff should have acted in good faith, and should have been satisfied with a decree giving her her just rights and all that she asked. There was nothing in the pleadings or proceedings in the original case to cause the defendant even to suspect that the financial matters between himself and the plaintiff had not been fully settled. He did not have any reason to believe that, before the time for appeal from the judgment would expire, the plaintiff would bring him into court again for more money. The plaintiff did not, at the time she procured the decree, have it in her mind to ask for more money, or, if she did, and did not disclose such intention, she was not acting in good faith. If the conditions of the parties had changed materially after the decree, or if the means allowed to plaintiff had been exhausted, or if the circumstances had been such as to call for aid from defendant to assist in the education of the minors, the question would have been different. As was well said in McKay v. McKay, 125 Cal. 65, 57 Pac. 677: "But the changes which may thus be made are limited to the cases and conditions expressed in the statute by which they are authorized."

The order is reversed, with directions to the court to dismiss the petition.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 24, 1906.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—EMPLOYÉS—APPOINTMENT—CIVIL SERVICE RULES.

An appointee, having taken the examination for ordinary clerks under a classification established by the civil service commission, as provided for in article 13 of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco, who was appointed to a temporary position in the office of the board of elections under article 11 of the charter, giving the board a right to appoint such clerical assistants as might be necessary, and later to other temporary positions in the office of the tax collector and auditor, under article 4 of the charter, providing for the appointment of extra clerks in such offices, was merely an extra clerk, whose employment ended when his services were no longer required, and on the termination of such employment the placing of his name on the register of eligibles, according to the relative excellence of his examination, without regard to the priority thereof, along with persons taking the examination after his appointment to the position in the office of the board of elections, was not a discharge, in violation of the provisions of article 13 of the charter relating to the appointment, term of employment, and discharge of civil service employés.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. C. Sloss, Judge.

Petition for writ of review by Michael J. Rodrigue against John W. Rogers and others as civil service commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

P. V. Long, City Atty., and John T. Morris, Asst. City Atty., for appellants. Chas. W. Slack, for respondent.

HALL, J. Plaintiff filed in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco his petition for a writ of review as to certain proceedings taken by the civil service commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco, and upon the return thereto and hearing thereon judgment was rendered, annulling the action of the civil service commissioners in the respect complained of, and this appeal is from such judgment.

In the month of February, 1900, the civil service commissioners, in accordance with the provisions of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco, classified all the places of employment in or under the offices and departments of the said city and county mentioned in section 11 of article 13 of the charter, with reference to the examinations provided for by said article. Among the classes established was one designated as "ordinary clerks," from which the extra clerks authorized by the charter to be appointed by certain officers are to be selected. Subsequently, in June, 1900, an examination was held for ordinary clerks, which was taken by plaintiff, and as a result his name was placed upon the register of eligibles for appointment as ordinary clerk. Subsequently, September 19, 1900, the board of election commissioners, in accordance with the provisions of the charter, requested the civil service commissioners to certify to the department of elections the names and addresses of persons standing highest upon the register of eligibles. Plaintiff's name and one other were certified, and he was appointed to a position in the department of elections on the 20th day of September, 1900, and continued to perform the duties thereof until the 13th day of October, 1900, when his duties in the said department of elections were fully performed and completed. It is alleged in the petition "that the plaintiff, since his said certification and appointment, has performed, when his services as such ordinary clerk have been required, the duties of such ordinary clerk in said department in the office of the tax collector and in the office of the auditor," but by the return to the writ it appears that each employment has been by virtue of a new certification and appointment. In May, 1903, another examination for applicants for positions as ordinary clerks was held, and thereafter the names of the successful applicants at the second examination were placed upon the register of eligibles with the names of those who had successfully passed the first examination, all the names of applicants—those passing the first and those passing the second examination—being placed on the one register of eligibles in the order of the relative excellence of their examinations, without regard to priority of examinations. It is this action of the civil service commissioners that is complained of by plaintiff. His name on the consolidated register came lower than on the first register, and his contention is that by virtue of his appointment to a position he was removed from the register of eligibles, and became a permanent employé of the city in the position of ordinary clerk. This contention was sustained by the trial court, and the correctness of this action is now before us for review. Section 2 of article 13 of the charter provides that: "The commissioners shall classify all the places of employment in or under the offices and departments of the city and county mentioned in section eleven of this article, with reference to the examinations hereinafter provided for. The places so classified by the commissioners shall constitute the classified civil service of the city and county, and no appointment to any such place shall be made except according to the rules hereinafter mentioned." Section 7 of the same article provides that: "From the returns of the examiners, or from the examinations made by the commissioners, the commissioners shall prepare a register for each grade or class of positions in the classified service of the city and county of the persons whose general average standing upon examination for such grade or class is not less than the minimum fixed by the rules of the commissioners and who are otherwise eligible. Such persons shall take rank upon the register as candidates in the order of their relative excellence, as determined by examination, without reference to priority of time of examination." Section 9 of the same article provides: "The head of the department or office, in which a position classified under this article is to be filled, shall notify the commissioners of that fact, and the commissioners shall then certify to the appointing officer the name and address of one or more candidates, not exceeding three, standing highest upon the register for the class or grade to which the position belongs, but laborers shall be taken according to their priority of application. * * *" Section 10 of the same article is as follows: "The appointing officer shall notify the commissioners of each position to be filled separately, and shall fill such position by the appointment of one of the persons certified to him by the commissioners therefor. Such appointment shall be on probation for a period to be fixed by the rules of the commissioners; but such rules shall not fix such period at exceeding six months. The commissioners may strike off names of candidates from the register after they have remained thereon more than two years. At or before the expiration of the period of probation, the head of the department or office in which a candidate is employed, may, by and with the consent of the commissioners, discharge him upon assigning in writing his reason therefor to the commissioners. If he is not then discharged his appointment shall be deemed complete. To prevent the stoppage of public business, or to meet extraordinary exigencies, the head of any department or office may, with the approval of the commissioners, make temporary appointments, to remain in force not exceeding sixty days, and only until regular appointments, under the provisions of this article, can be made." The period of probation provided for in the above section was fixed by the commissioners at six months. Section 12 provides that: "No deputy, clerk or employé in the classified civil service of the city and county, who shall have been appointed under said rules, shall be removed or discharged except for cause, upon written charges, and after an opportunity to be heard in his own defense."

The plaintiff contends that by having been appointed to a position as ordinary clerk in the department of elections he becomes such an employé as could only be removed in the manner provided for in the above-quoted sections, and that the action of the civil service commissioners in placing his name upon the list of eligibles according to the excellence of his examination, without regard to the priority of the examination, was in violation of his rights and of the said provisions of the charter. To properly interpret the foregoing sections, especially sections 10 and 12, they must be read in connection with other sections of the charter. At the outset of our examination of the charter we find that there is no such position as ordinary clerk known to the charter. The term "ordinary clerk" is used by the civil service commissioners to designate an arbitrary class established by them, from which various extra clerks allowed to various officers and departments must be appointed. A further examination of the charter discloses that various positions are provided for, which by the law of their creation are not continuous or permanent, but are intended by the law to be for limited periods. Thus, article 11 provides for the organization of the department of elections, and, after providing for the appointment of a registrar of voters, it is, in section 4 thereof, provided as follows: "The board may appoint such other clerical assistants as may be necessary, at a salary not to exceed one hundred dollars a month each for the time actually employed. The board shall, by resolution adopted by a majority vote of all its members and entered upon its minutes, designate the service to be rendered by such assistants and the time for which they shall be employed. The time of employment of such assistants shall not be extended except by like resolution of the board, and when a salary shall have been once fixed it shall not be increased. This section is subject to the provisions of article 13 of this chapter." The appointment pleaded in plaintiff's petition was an appointment as one of the clerical assistants provided for in the above section. No other positions are provided for in the department of elections, except that of registrar. If the law was complied with, the resolution authorizing the employment of plaintiff in the department of elections limited the time of his employment. When that time expired, it is difficult to see why his employment did not end. He was not discharged in violation of any provision of the civil service provisions of the charter, but the term of his employment or office expired by the law of its creation.

There is no warrant in the charter for the position that by an appointment to a position in the department of elections plaintiff became entitled to hold a similar or any position in any other office or department of the municipal government. On the contrary, it is perfectly apparent that the head of each department may appoint his own subordinates and assistants, after requisition by the head of such department and certification by the civil service commissioners.

Plaintiff pleaded that after his appointment to the position in the department of elections, and after his duties therein were fully performed and completed, and, as we must assume, after the expiration of his term of employment as fixed by the resolution authorizing his employment, he performed the duties of ordinary clerk in the department of elections, in the office of the tax collector, and in the office of the auditor; but by the return to the writ it appears that he performed such duties by virtue of separate appointments following requisitions and certifications, as required by the civil service provisions of the charter. As we have already seen, he could not under the charter perform duties in either the office of the tax collector or auditor by virtue of any appointment by the department of elections. There is no such position under the charter as ordinary clerk that may be floated from department to department. The charter authorizes the tax collector to appoint one chief deputy, one cashier, and fifteen deputies; "and extra clerks who shall be paid at the rate of not more than one hundred dollars a month during the time of their employment." Article 4, c. 5, § 1, Charter of San Francisco. This clearly indicates that the term of employment of such extra clerk is limited, and not continuous or permanent. Besides various deputies, the auditor "may employ such number of extra clerks during the time their services may be necessary for the lawful discharge of his official duties, as the board of supervisors may designate. Such extra clerks shall each receive a salary not to exceed one hundred dollars a month for the time they shall be actually employed." Article 4, c. 2, § 2, Charter. Here, again, the positions are created of limited duration. It was to such positions only that plaintiff was appointed. The assessor is also authorized to employ, during four months of each year, 100 clerks "who shall each be paid at the rate of not more than one hundred dollars a month during the time of their employment." These various extra clerks were appointed from the class designated as "ordinary clerks" in the classification adopted by the commissioners; and, by the method adopted by the commissioners when the term of employment ended, or the services of such clerk were no longer required, he was treated as no longer an employé, and his name was again placed on the register of candidates according to the relative excellence of his examination, without regard to the priority of the examination.

We think this course of action accords with the letter and spirit of the civil service provisions of the charter. It makes a workable system. Plaintiff has not been discharged in violation of any provision of the charter, or discharged at all. He was employed for a limited term, and upon the expiration of the term of his employment he ceased to hold office, or to be an employé of the municipality. By again placing his name on the register of candidates according to the relative excellence of his examination, without regard to the priority of the examination, the commissioners complied with the charter (article 13, § 7), and accorded to plaintiff his full rights.

The judgment is reversed.

Ex parte WILLIAMS. (Civ. 287.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 31, 1906.)

1. GAMING—OFFENSES—STATUTES.

It is not a crime, under Pen. Code, § 330, making it an offense to operate any banking or percentage game played with any device "for money, checks, credit or other representative of value," to set up and operate a slot machine on which games are played, unless played for money, checks, credits, or other representative of value, and, if played for something not included in these words, it is not a crime.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 24, Gaming, §§ 137, 138.]

2. SAME — OFFENSES — STATUTES — CONSTRUCTION.

Pen. Code, § 330, making it an offense for any one to operate any banking or percentage game played with any device for money, checks, credit, or other representative of value, adopted in 1872, prior to the existence of cigar slot machines, when considered in connection with section 331, prohibiting the use of any house for gambling, prohibited by section 330, and section 4, providing that the Penal Code is to be construed according to the fair import of its terms, does not make it an offense to operate a slot machine on which games are played for cigars.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 24, Gaming, §§ 161, 198.]

Application by C. C. Williams for a writ of habeas corpus for his discharge from imprisonment on conviction of an alleged criminal offense. Petitioner discharged. Transferred to Supreme Court. See 87 Pac. 568.

T. J. Butts, for petitioner. C. H. Pond, Dist. Atty., for the People.

BUCKLES, J. The petitioner was engaged in the saloon business, also selling cigars and tobacco in the city of Petaluma, and had therein a slot machine used by his customers in gambling for cigars. The complaint on which the petitioner was charged, arrested, tried, and convicted was as follows: "On the 4th day of December, A. D. 1905 * * * did willfully and unlawfully open, carry on, and conduct, at his saloon and place of business at 319 Main street, in the city of Petaluma, Sonoma county, state of California, a certain banking game, played by means of a slot machine, for money, checks, and other representatives of value, to wit, cigars and tobacco." While the complaint charges "for money, checks, etc.," there is no pretension that either money or checks were played. It does appear from the return and record in the case that the crime charged and intended to be charged was using the slot machine for "other representatives of value," and that such representatives of value were cigars and tobacco. The petitioner was sentenced to pay a fine of $100, and to be imprisoned until such fine be paid, etc. The fine was not paid, and the petitioner was imprisoned. This answer to the return made by the sheriff contains the following, to wit: "That the slot machine mentioned in said complaint is operated by dropping a nickle or slug in the slot in the right-hand side of said machine, and then pressing a lever, and, if the proper combination of cards showed upon the cylinder, the party putting the nickle in the slot was entitled to a certain number of cigars, according to the combination of cards. If a royal flush was made to show upon the cylinder, the party playing the machine was entitled to 40 cigars; for 4 aces, 15 cigars; for 4 kings, 14 cigars; for 4 queens, 13 cigars, and under queens, 10 cigars; full hand, 8 cigars; a flush, 6 cigars; for three queens, 3 cigars, and under queens, 2 cigars; and 2 pairs, jacks up, 2 cigars; and 1 pair, aces, kings, or queens, 1 cigar; and any other combination would not win anything. That said machine was played for cigars, and nothing else, and that these facts were established and proved at the trial of this case." These facts are not controverted, and are set forth with above particularity for the sole purpose of showing that the entire charge made and the crime complained of was running the slot machine, not for money, checks, or credits, but for "other representatives of value." The slot machine is a device or thing where the person who plays it must, of necessity, play at a chance game, the owner or operator thereof paying when the person who has put in his nickle wins, and taking the nickle when there is a loss, and it is thus a banking game. People v. Carroll, 80 Cal. 153, 22 Pac. 129. It is not a crime, under section 330 of the Penal Code, to set up and run such a device as a slot machine described here, unless played "for money, checks, credits, or other representatives of value." If played for something not included in these, it is not a crime.

As it is here admitted that it was not played for either money, checks, or credit, but for cigars, we are therefore called upon to determine what the Legislature intended to include within the words, "or other representative of value." The respondent contends they can have but one meaning, and that anything of value, and therefore includes all kind of property having a value; while the petitioner claims they can refer only to some similar thing—to money, checks, or credit. If the Legislature was intending to prohibit all gambling with banking devices or by banking games played with cards, dice, or any device, it seems to us there would have been no limitation as now to money, checks, or credits, but the statement would have been for anything of value or that represents value. Gambling such as it is sought to prohibit by section 330 is carried on almost exclusively for money, or some obligation or promise which calls for money, and not other property. The very language of the section precludes any other idea. Then, if this be so, we must keep this in view in trying to determine to what the words "or other representative of value" were intended to apply. There is a general rule in construing statutes, either penal or otherwise, which forbids the adoption of any construction that will defeat the purpose for which the statute was obviously intended, and our Code (Pen. Code § 4) provides that all of the provisions of the Penal Code are to be construed according to the fair import of their terms, with a view to effect its object and to promote justice. These rules apply here. If we take into consideration, as the people contend we must, the fact that the chapter in which section 330 is found is headed "Gaming," we are furnished no aid, no light by which to arrive at the meaning of the words "or other representative of value," for there is no pretense that the section contains a prohibition against all kinds of gaming, but is limited to the kinds therein mentioned. Courts have no power to legislate, and if the Legislature intended to simply prohibit banking and percentage games where played for money, checks, credits, and other things similar to money, checks, and credits, this court has no power to add a further prohibition, and say that it will be a crime if such banking or percentage game is for other kinds of property, such as grain, fruit, horses, cattle, lumber, and all other things of whatever kind which may have a value. The rule seems to be well established in the interpretation of statutes and clauses like the one under consideration that where general words follow particular ones, the former are construed as applicable to persons or things of the same kind, class or nature. The rule has been further stated as follows: "Where a statute or other document enumerates several classes of persons or things, and immediately following and classed with such enumeration the class embraces 'other' persons or things, the word 'other' will generally be read as 'other such like,' so that the persons or things therein comprised may be read as of the same kind, class, or nature, with and not of a quality superior to, or different from, those specifically enumerated." 21 Am. & Eng. Ency. 1012. In New York, where a statute exempted from taxation every building erected for the use of a college, incorporated academy, or other seminary of learning, it was held, as all those enumerated were corporations, that the general words "or other seminary" required that such institution should also be an incorporated one in order to have the benefit of the exemption. Chegaray v. N. Y., 13 N. Y. 220. In the Illinois Criminal Code the words "or other instrument of writing" is held to include only instruments of the same kind as those previously specified; that is, bills, notes, checks, etc., for the payment of money, and not to apply to the case of a contract under which it was wholly uncertain whether the money would ever become payable. Shirk v. People, 121 Ill. 61, 11 N. E. 888. So in Kentucky, where the statute read: "Section 1. Whoever with or without compensation, shall set up, carry on, or conduct, or shall aid and assist in setting up, carrying on, or conducting, a keno bank, faro bank, or other machine or contrivance used in betting whereby money or other things may be won or lost, etc.," the indictment charged that the defendant "unlawfully and feloniously set up, carry on, and conduct a machine and contrivance used in betting, to wit, a game of oontz played with dice and upon which money was won and lost." It was held that other machine or device must be of the same kind or nature with the keno bank or faro bank, under the rule above stated. In that case the evidence showed that the game played was that commonly known as "craps" or "oontz," in which no machinery or implements are used save two ordinary dice. Commonwealth v. Kammerer (Ky.) 13 S. W. 108. Many other cases may be cited which uphold this rule, but we deem this sufficient. But the rule is not inflexible, for where it is plain from the whole act, document, or subject-matter that the real intent was different, then such manifest intent, and not the above rule, prevails. As in the definitions given in the Code of degrees of murder: "All murder which is perpetrated by means of poison, or lying in wait, torture, or by any other kind of willful, deliberate and premeditated killing * * * is murder in the first degree." One who administers poison to another with intent to kill, and death results therefrom, is at once guilty of murder in the first degree, because the deliberation, premeditation, malice aforethought, and all have been established. So when the killing follows from lying in wait or from torture, but there are many other ways than these by which murder in the first degree may be committed. People v. Bealoba, 17 Cal. 389. The killing may be accomplished by pushing one from a high wall or into a deep well, or by any means which shows willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing. Such statute needs no interpretation, for the intent of the lawmaker is seen at once. The betting on elections, on horse racing, and the gambling in stocks and in grain are kinds of gambling not included within section 330. The very language of the statute itself shows that the gambling which the Legislature was attempting to prohibit was that sort of gambling usually carried on at a fixed place of business, where those seeking to play at games of chance could come, and where money is the thing usually wagered, or its representative, such as checks or anything which is a demand to be paid in money. It would hardly be considered reasonable that the Legislature had in mind that the games and devices eunmerated were played in the general markets where grain, animals, and stocks are bought and sold. The intent of the Legislature to legislate against games set up and carried on at a fixed place and in houses or rooms is shown by section 331 of the Penal Code, which attempts to prohibit the use of any house for the gambling prohibited in section 330. Neither is it plain that the Legislature had in mind any kind of property other than money, the thing most common for use in such games, and its representative such as checks and demands for the payment of money. Neither would it be a reasonable supposition that in 1872, when the act was passed, any banking game would be set up or carried on in gambling for anything but money and the instruments representing money, and therefore the Legislature could not have had in mind the cigar slot machine, and could not have prohibited its use. The ingenuity of man, however, has devised a banking game in the cigar slot machine by which gambling may be carried on for property not included within "money, checks, credits or other representatives of value." There is nothing in section 330 which prohibits gambling for cigars. It follows that the petitioner must be discharged.

The prisoner is discharged.

McLAUGHLIN, J. I concur. Section 330 of the Penal Code provides that: "Every person who deals, plays, or carries on, opens, or causes to be opened, or who conducts either as owner or employee, whether for hire or not, any game of faro, monte, roulette, lansquenet, rouge et noir, rondo, tan, fan-tan, stud horse poker, seven-and-a-half, twenty-one, hokey pokey, or any banking or percentage game played with cards or dice or any device, for money, checks, credit, or other representative of value," is guilty of a misdemeanor. It is clear from the language of this section that it is a misdemeanor to conduct or carry on a slot machine or any other device played for money, checks, or credits, but we are here called upon to determine whether a person who conducts or carries on such a device played for cigars and tobacco is likewise guilty of an infraction of the law. Such acts as those enumerated in this and similar statutes are crimes only because they are prohibited by law, and unless the act charged against the petitioner is so prohibited, he is entitled to his discharge. If it is forbidden by law at all, it must be because cigars and tobacco are representatives of value, within the meaning of the section quoted. The words "or other representative of value" found in the section must be construed in connection with the preceding language in the same sentence, for the word "other" is a correlative and specifying word, meaning "different from that which has been specified; not the same; not this or those; different." Hyatt v. Allen, 54 Cal. 357. In other words, the word "other" will "generally be read as 'other such like,' so that persons or things therein comprised may be read as ejusdem generis with, and not of a quality superior to or different from, those specifically enumerated." Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, vol. 21, p. 1012; Stroud's Judicial Dict., p. 1359 et seq.; Lewis Sutherland, Statutory Constitution, §§ 423–430. A study of the innumerable cases supporting this doctrine or dealing with the proposition under discussion, found in the notes in works above cited, will show that in nearly every instance where this rule was not followed the word was used in a different connection or sense from that apparent in the statute before us. In a recent case the Supreme Court of this state said that there was little, if any, controversy as to the rule in its application to the Penal Statutes. Matter of La Societe Francaise, 123 Cal. 531, 56 Pac. 458. Applying this rule, and adopting the meaning of the word "other" when used in exactly the same connection and sense as in section 330 of the Penal Code, declared in Hyatt v. Allen, supra, we cannot escape the conclusion that conducting a slot machine played for cigars and tobacco is not within the prohibition of that section of the Penal Code.

But, aside from this, there is another rule commanding that words not plainly used in a technical sense shall be taken in their ordinary, general sense, and if this is applied to the word "representative," as used in the section, it seems quite clear to my mind that cigars or tobacco cannot be considered as representative of value. The word "representative" as used in the statute certainly means "typifying"; "presenting by means of something"; "standing in the place of"; "that which represents anything." Cigars and tobacco are things of value; they have a value. This is beyond cavil. But in my opinion it could hardly be said that they represent their own inherent or market value. A certain coin or check or bill will represent the value of any quantity of cigars or tobacco, and these in turn will be inherently worth the price obtainable for them. But it would hardly be contended that because they have a certain value, measured by current mediums of exchange, they represent the value of the coin or currency paid for them, any more than they represent any other commodity which might be exchanged for them in the course of trade. Every commodity has a value measured according to fixed standards, but the various commodities sold and bought in many markets and transactions do not represent the value of the gold, silver, or currency paid for them. On the contrary, the medium of exchange established by law or recognized in business dealings represents their value. Thus we are led to the conclusion that the words "representative of value" do not mean that cigars and tobacco or any other commodity represents its own intrinsic or market value. A similar statute was before the Supreme Court of Montana in a recent case, and the decision of that court illustrates this distinction. There the statute read "for money, checks, credits or any representative of value, or for any property or thing whatever," and the court held that this language included cigars and tobacco, and in so holding said: "The enumeration includes every species of property of classes to which the particulars belong. 'Money' includes all money; 'checks' includes all kinds of articles embraced under that designation; 'credits' is a term of universal application to obligations due and to become due; and when we consider the expression 'any representative of value' there is nothing left of any of the classes of property enumerated; and unless the words 'any property or thing whatever' were designed to include merchandise such as cigars and similar articles, then it must be rejected as of no import whatever." State v. Woodman (Mont.) 67 Pac. 1120. It will be noted that the statute there construed was much stronger than ours. It not only contained the comprehensive language "any property or thing whatever," but it was far more emphatic, in this, that it included "any representative of value," and hence the maxim ejusdem generis could not apply. And yet no person reading the decision can doubt that if the words "any property or thing whatever" had been omitted the decision would have been the other way. And so it must be here, for had the Legislature intended to place the ban of the law on slot machines played for cigars or any other class of merchandise, the natural, ordinary common sense, and in fact the only way to do so, would have been to use the phrase "anything of value," or some similar and equally comprehensive expression. Not having done so, we cannot extend the scope of the statute by giving it a construction at variance with rules of law and the accepted and established meaning of words employed. If the legislative department of government desires to prohibit this character of gaming, that result may easily be accomplished; but until they do so, every citizen is entitled to immunity from punishment for acts which are neither mala in se nor mala prohibita.

I concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.

COURTS—COURTS OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION —TRANSFER FROM DISTRICT COURT OF APPEAL TO SUPREME COURT.

The constitutional provision with reference to the transfer of a case from the District Court of Appeal to the Supreme Court has no application in matters of habeas corpus.

Application by C. C. Williams for a writ of habeas corpus for his discharge from imprisonment on conviction of an alleged criminal offense. The District Court of Appeal discharged petitioner. 87 Pac. 565. Application for an order transferring the cause to the Supreme Court for determination. Denied.

PER CURIAM. The application for an order transferring the above-entitled cause from the District Court of Appeal to the Supreme Court for hearing and determination after judgment in the said District Court of Appeal, is denied; a majority of the justices of this court being of the opinion that the constitutional provision with reference to the transfer of cases from the District Court of Appeal to the Supreme Court has no application in matters of habeas corpus.

HOYT v. HART. (Sac. 1,374, 1,454.)

1. Waters and Water Courses—Irrigation—Actions for Injuries—Judgment.

In a suit to restrain defendant from interfering with the waters of an irrigation ditch, and for damages for trespass on plaintiff's rights, it was found that the water to which plaintiff was entitled was only one-eighth of that flowing in the ditch, which one-eighth at no time exceeded 75 inches. She was awarded by the decree a right to carry her share of the water over defendant's land through the waterways in which she claimed a right to carry it. The decree permitted defendant to use the waterways without infringing plaintiff's rights, and he was restrained from reducing the same so that their carrying capacity would be less than 75 inches or from diminishing the supply of water to which plaintiff was entitled. Held, that there was no inconsistency between the portion of the decree declaring that plaintiff had an easement in the waterways and the portion which granted to defendant the right to use them jointly with plaintiff; the easement being a right to use the land of defendant for conducting the water to her own land.

2. Same.

In a suit to restrain defendant from interfering with the waters in an irrigation ditch, it was found that the water to which plaintiff was entitled was only one-eighth of that flowing in the ditch, which one-eighth at no time exceeded 75 inches. The decree awarded plaintiff a right to carry her share of the water over defendant's land through the waterways in which she claimed a right to carry it and gave defendant a right to use them subject to the proviso that he should not interfere with the flow to which plaintiff was entitled. Held that, if the waterways were reduced to a capacity of 75 inches, defendant would be entitled to use them only when plaintiff's one-eighth share of the waters of the ditch amounted to less than 75 inches, and then only to such extent as would not prevent plaintiff from receiving her full one-eighth share.

3. Trial—Adoption by Court of Verdict of Jury—Effect.

Where, in a suit to restrain a defendant from interfering with the waters of an irrigation ditch, and for damages for past interference, the issue raised by the allegation in the complaint and the denial in the answer that defendant trespassed on plaintiff's easement to his damage was determined by the verdict of the jury, and the court adopted the verdict, there was no necessity for any further finding by the court.

4. Same—Finding of Trial Court—Determination of Issues—Sufficiency.

Where, in a suit to restrain defendant from interfering with the waters in an irrigation ditch, plaintiff in his answer to the cross-complaint alleged a former judgment in his favor which declared plaintiff's title to an easement, consisting of the right to use waterways over defendant's land to take water from the ditch without determining whether defendant had a right to use the waterways, and the court awarded to plaintiff the easement claimed, the failure to find that the former judgment was in force did not affect plaintiff's rights.

5. Judgment—Pleading—Construction.

An allegation in a plea of a former judgment that it had been adjudged that plaintiff was the owner of a waterway across the lands of defendant, for the purpose of conveying water from an irrigation ditch, means no more than that plaintiff owned an easement to carry waters over defendant's land through a waterway.

6. Costs—Persons Entitled to.

A suit for damages for trespass to an easement to use a waterway over defendant's land to carry waters from an irrigation ditch, and for an injunction to restrain defendant from interfering with the waterway involves title to real estate within Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, subd. 5, declaring that costs are allowed to plaintiff on a judgment in his favor in an action involving title to real estate, and plaintiff, on obtaining a judgment, is entitled to costs.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 13, Costs, § 138.]

7. Same.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, subd. 5, declares that costs are allowed to plaintiff on a judgment in his favor in an action involving the title or possession of real estate. Plaintiff brought suit to restrain defendant from interfering with his easement to carry water from an irrigation ditch in waterways through defendant's land. Defendant filed a cross-complaint, asking the court to divide the waters of the ditch according to the rights of the parties. The decree determined the rights of the parties. Held, that it was not error to divide the costs between the parties where it did not appear what portion of the costs was properly attributable to the trial of the original action and what portion to the trial of the cross-action.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 13, Costs, §§ 272, 274.]

8. Appeal — Errors in Judgment — Correction.

The error in a judgment in a suit asking for an injunction, and for damages which omits to give plaintiff judgment for $1 damages awarded by the jury is too trifling to require a modification.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth Hoyt against E. C. Hart. From a judgment granting insufficient relief, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. S. Taylor, for appellant. Gillis & Tapscott and James F. Farraher, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff prosecutes two separate appeals; one from the judgment, and one from an order denying a motion for new trial. Both may be considered in a single opinion.

The plaintiff and the defendant are owners of adjoining tracts of agricultural land in Siskiyou county, the plaintiff's holding lying to the west of the defendant's. On the easterly side of the defendant's land there runs an irrigating ditch, variously designated in the record as the "Miller, Hoyt, and Casedy Ditch" and as the "Burgess Ditch," and each of the parties claims an interest in a portion of the waters flowing through it. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff is the owner of 200 inches, measured under a four-inch pressure, of the waters flowing through such ditch, which is stated to have a capacity of 800 inches. It is alleged that for 40 years the plaintiff and her predecessors have conducted their share of the waters of the Burgess ditch over the lands of the defendant through a certain ditch and waterway, the course of which is described, and that they have so conducted such waters continuously, adversely, and under a claim of right. The complaint further sets forth that in May and June, 1903, while the plaintiff was on defendant's land, cleaning out the ditches and waterways connecting with her land, the defendant drove off her workmen, and filled up the ditches, to her damage in the sum of $2,000. The prayer is for judgment for the damage sustained, and for an injunction restraining the defendant from preventing plaintiff from entering upon his lands and cleaning out the ditches across the same, and restraining the defendant from filling up said ditches or interfering with the flow of plaintiff's waters therein. A temporary injunction, restraining these acts was granted. The answer denies that the Burgess ditch is capable of carrying more than 600 inches of water, denies that plaintiff is the owner of 200 inches of the water carried in it, and alleges that the Burgess ditch does not carry a steady and uniform flow of water, and that its owners are entitled, not to a definite or fixed amount measured in inches, but only to a certain proportion of the water flowing in said ditch, the plaintiff's share being one-eighth of such water. It is alleged that the defendant owns five-eighths of the water flowing through the Burgess ditch, and that he has an interest in the other two-eighths, subject to the right of C. Henry Haight to first use them for irrigating his lands. The answer denies that plaintiff has received her share of the water through any defined channel or water course across his lands, but asserts that he, the defendant, has used certain ditches to spread water from the Burgess ditch over his own property, and that plaintiff's water has come to her partly through these ditches, and partly by overflow on the surface of the soil. The defendant alleges, further, that plaintiff had come upon his land and torn out of his ditches a number of dams and gates, and had dug new ditches, deepened the old ones and so prevented defendant from using his irrigating system. The plaintiff's allegation of damage is denied. In a cross-complaint the defendant sets up substantially the same matters pleaded in the answer, asks that the court divide the waters of the Burgess ditch according to the rights of the parties, that plaintiff be required to conduct her waters by a route to be directed by the court, outside of defendant's irrigated premises, and that plaintiff be enjoined from interfering with defendant's dams or ditches. Plaintiff's answer to the cross-complaint asserts that the Burgess ditch has a capacity of 1,600 inches, denies the commission of the wrongful acts charged against her in the cross-complaint, and sets up a prior judgment by which it was determined that the plaintiff was the owner of a ditch and waterway across the lands of defendant for the purpose of conveying her waters through said lands of defendant. This judgment is asserted as an estoppel precluding defendant from asserting that plaintiff is not the owner of said ditch and waterway. By order of the court, C. Henry Haight was brought in as a party, and filed a pleading asserting a claim to two-eighths of the water of the Burgess ditch. As his rights are not here in dispute, they need not be further considered. The cause was tried before a jury, which returned a general verdict in favor of the plaintiff, assessing her damages at $1, and in addition, specially found as follows: "(1) We find that Mrs. Hoyt owns one-eighth of the Miller, Hoyt, and Casedy ditch. (2) The said one-eighth to be delivered over the premises of E. C. Hart and through what is known as the 'B ditch.' (3) Water to be measured at the point taken from the Miller, Hoyt, and Casedy ditch between one foot and 100 feet north of where the back ditch leaves the Miller, Hoyt, and Casedy ditch. (4) Measuring box to be placed in the west end of the B ditch between one foot and 100 feet from the fence or Hoyt line. (5) Mrs. Hoyt to pay one-eighth of the expense for keeping up the said waterway and not to interfere in any way with the irrigating water system of the defendant." The court made its findings of fact, in which it set forth the foregoing verdict and special findings of the jury, and, as it recites, "after fully considering the verdict and findings of the jury," it found that the full capacity of the Burgess ditch is not more than 600 inches, that the water actually carried in it during the irrigating season varies from time to time, at times getting as low as from 40 to 60 inches; that the plaintiff and her predecessors owned an undivided one-eighth of these waters, and the defendant Hart five-eighths, Haight having a first right to the remaining two-eighths, that plaintiff's proportion at no time exceeds 75 inches; that plaintiff and her predecessors have for many years conducted their one-eighth part of the waters of the Burgess ditch over defendant's land through ditches and waterways in a described course, that since the commencement of the action the plaintiff has materially enlarged and deepened one of the ditches running through defendant's land, and has torn out defendant's dams and turnouts, that said ditch has been so enlarged that stock cannot cross it safely, and wagons or farming machinery cannot be driven over it, that these operations have prevented defendant from using for irrigation his share of the waters. It is found that these ditches through defendant's land were constructed by him and his predecessors, and that for 40 years said ditches have been used for irrigating the Hart premises. Following these findings, there was a decree or judgment, which after setting forth the rights of the parties to the waters of the Burgess ditch, and the plaintiff's easement over the premises of the defendant, Hart, as described in the findings, declares that said easement of plaintiff is held by her in common with defendant, Hart, "and he has the right to conduct his waters through said ditches, etc., jointly with plaintiff and to the extent hereinafter specified." The decree then provides for a division of the waters of the Burgess ditch by means of a dividing box, and enjoins the defendant Hart from damming or filling up the ditches in which plaintiff has an easement so as to reduce their carrying capacity to less than 75 inches, "or from in any way or manner interfering with or arresting or diminishing the flow of water therein to which the plaintiff, Elizabeth Hoyt, is at any time entitled to have and receive as her proportionate share of the waters of said Burgess ditch; Provided, however, that said defendant, Hart" shall be permitted to fill up said ditches so that they shall be as they were before plaintiff deepened them, and to use said ditches, in common with plaintiff for carrying his own waters "provided, however, that he at no time prevents the one-eighth of the waters of the said Burgess * * * ditch from flowing down through said ditches." The plaintiff is by the decree enjoined from interfering with Hart's premises or his irrigating system except for the purpose of cleaning out and repairing the ditches and waterways in which she has an easement. The costs are evenly divided between the parties, and judgment is given to plaintiff for $23.60, the excess of her costs, as taxed, over one-half of the costs of both.

It has seemed necessary to make this somewhat extended statement of the pleadings, and the proceedings culminating in the decree, in order that the points made by the plaintiff on her appeals may be clearly set forth and discussed. The appellant's principal objection is directed against the provisions of the decree which declare her right to an easement across defendant's land. It is claimed that the decree, in authorizing the defendant to use the ditches running over his land in common with the plaintiff, deprives the plaintiff of the fixed and definite easement claimed by her. But we fail to see that these provisions of the decree fall short in any degree of securing to the appellant her full rights. It having been found that the water to which she is entitled is only one-eighth of that flowing in the Burgess ditch, and that this one-eighth at no time exceeds 75 inches, she is awarded by the decree a right to carry her share of the water over the defendant's land through the ditches and waterways in which she has claimed a right to carry it. It is true that defendant is also permitted to use these waterways, but his use can never, under the terms of the decree, infringe upon her rights. He is restrained from reducing these ditches so that their carrying capacity will be less than 75 inches, or from diminishing the flow of waters to which plaintiff is entitled, and his right to use the ditches is expressly made subject to the proviso that he at no time prevents plaintiff's one-eighth of the waters of the Burgess ditch from flowing through the connecting ditches. There is no inconsistency between the portion of the decree declaring that plaintiff has an easement in these ditches, and that portion which grants to defendant the right to use the ditches jointly with plaintiff for the purpose of carrying his waters. The easement is a right to use the lands of the defendant for conducting her waters to her lands. It can coexist with a right in the defendant or any one else to use the same waterways, so long as such use does not restrict or interfere with the right owned by the plaintiff. It would not be claimed that merely because A. has a right of way over B.'s land, B. cannot, under any circumstances, use the portion of his land affected by the easement in a manner which does not infringe upon the exercise of such easement. It is well settled, as a general proposition, that the owner of the servient estate, may use his property in any manner and for any purpose consistent with the enjoyment of the easement. "Thus in a case of a way the owner of the servient estate may use the land over which it passes in any manner which does not materially impair or unreasonably interfere with its use as a way. He may himself use it as a way * * * unless the rights of the owner of the easement are exclusive." 14 Cyc. 1208, and cases cited. In the case at bar there is no allegation that the plaintiff's right was exclusive. The court found, and the evidence fully supported the finding, that for 40 years the defendant and his grantors had used these ditches as a portion of the irrigating system of the Hart lands. This finding, which was within the issues, necessarily called for the adjudication that Hart might continue to use these ditches, provided that he so used them as not to interfere with plaintiff's right. It is suggested that as defendant is permitted to reduce the capacity of the ditches to 75 inches, and to use them in common with plaintiff, the plaintiff may be restricted to one-half of the capacity of a ditch which, when full, is only large enough to accommodate the flow to which she is entitled, viz., 75 inches. In answer to this, it is sufficient to say that defendant's right to use the ditches is always subject to the proviso that he shall not interfere with the flow to which plaintiff is entitled. If the ditches be reduced to a capacity of 75 inches, defendant will be entitled to use them only when plaintiff's one-eighth share of the waters of the Burgess ditch amounts to less than 75 inches, and then only to such extent as will not prevent plaintiff from receiving her full one-eighth share.

There is no force in the contention that the court failed to find upon material issues. The issue raised by the allegation (and denial) that defendant trespassed upon plaintiff's easement, to her damage, is determined by the verdict of the jury, which, from the findings and the judgment, appears to have been adopted and accepted by the court. Such adoption obviated the necessity of any further finding. Goldman v. Rogers, 85 Cal. 578, 24 Pac. 782; Morrison v. Stone, 103 Cal. 94, 37 Pac. 142. There is no finding upon the issue tendered by the answer to the cross-complaint, alleging a former judgment in favor of plaintiff, but the absence of such finding is immaterial. Plaintiff relied upon this judgment merely for the purpose of establishing her right to an easement for conveying her water across defendant's land. She has been awarded the easement claimed, and would be entitled to no greater rights if the court had expressly found that such easement had been established in her favor by a prior judgment. As we have seen, plaintiff's ownership of an easement over defendant's land is in no degree inconsistent with the use, by defendant, of the servient tenement, so long as such use is subordinate to the easement and does not restrict or limit its exercise. The former judgment declaring plaintiff's title to such easement did not purport to determine whether or not defendant had a right to use the ditches. It merely determined that plaintiff had a certain right in them. This right is secured to her by the present decree. A finding that the former judgment was in force would not have entitled her to any greater relief than she received. The absence of such finding cannot therefore affect the judgment now complained of. Gould v. Adams, 108 Cal. 365, 41 Pac. 408; Blochman v. Spreckels, 135 Cal. 662, 67 Pac. 1061, 57 L. R. A. 213. In plaintiff's plea of former judgment the allegation is that it had been adjudicated that she was the owner of a "ditch and waterway" across the lands of defendant for the purpose of conveying waters. In the foregoing discussion we have treated this allegation as meaning no more than that she owned an easement or right to carry waters over his lands through a ditch or waterway, and such we think is the proper construction of the language quoted. For reasons above stated, it is of no importance that the court did not find that defendant threatened to continue to commit the acts complained of. The purpose of the allegation to this effect was to entitle plaintiff to an injunction restraining such acts, and this relief was granted her.

The appellant contends that the court erred in dividing the costs between the parties. The general rule is undoubtedly that in suits in equity the costs may be apportioned according to the discretion of the court. But the rule has been modified in this state by statutory provisions regulating the allowance of costs. Section 1022 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares that "costs are allowed, of course, to the plaintiff, upon a judgment in his favor, in the following cases: * * * (5) In an action which involves the title or possession of real estate. * * *" We think this action, in which the main issue was whether or not the plaintiff was the owner of an easement over defendant's land involved the "title or possession to real estate" within the meaning of this section. An easement is real estate; and its possession or title is involved in an action seeking damages for past trespasses and a restraint against future trespasses upon such easement, where the defendant puts in issue the existence of the easement. Many cases holding that such actions come within the terms of similar statutes are cited in 11 Cyc. 49, 50, and the same result must follow from the former adjudications of this court. Schmidt v. Klotz, 130 Cal. 224, 62 Pac. 470; Sierra Union, etc., Co. v. Wolff, 144 Cal. 430, 77 Pac. 1038; Gibson v. Hammang, 145 Cal. 454, 78 Pac. 953. See, also, Kelly v. Central Pac. R. R. Co., 74 Cal. 565, 16 Pac. 386, 5 Am. St. Rep. 470. And, if the action involves the title or possession of real estate, it is immaterial what the form of action may be, or whether the relief sought is, in whole or in part, equitable. If the plaintiff recovers, even though only as to a portion of the title or possession involved, the right to costs follows of course under the terms of the statute. Sierra Co. v. Wolff, supra; Gibson v. Hammang, supra. So far, therefore, as concerned the trial of the issues arising on the complaint and the answer thereto, the plaintiff, having prevailed, was entitled to costs. But there was also a cross-complaint, involving, in like manner, the title or possession of real estate. As to this, the defendant was plaintiff, and he succeeded in establishing, in part, the right claimed, and was granted relief. If the questions raised by the cross-complaint and the answer thereto had been litigated in a separate action, the defendant herein, who would have been plaintiff in such action, would have been entitled to his costs. We think his right thereto is not affected by the fact that he prosecuted his claim as plaintiff in a cross-complaint. On the record before us, it does not appear what portion of the total costs were properly attributable to the trial of the original action, and what portion to the trial of the cross-action. So far as we can see, the division of the costs made by the court may have resulted in giving to each of the parties the exact amount of costs which he or she had the right to recover. Error will never be presumed, but must be made to affirmatively appear, and this court cannot say that any right of the plaintiff was injuriously affected by the apportionment of costs directed by the judgment.

The decree, probably through inadvertence, omits to give plaintiff judgment for the $1 damages awarded her by the verdict of the jury. This oversight we regard as too trifling to require even a modification of the judgment.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

In re CAMPBELL'S ESTATE. (L. A. 1,791.)

CAMPBELL v. CAMPBELL et al.

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 21, 1906.)

1. WILLS—CREATION OF TRUST.

A will authorized the executrix to sell any property of the estate at public or private sale, with or without notice and without any order of court, but directed that different pieces of property should be held for certain prices, until the testator's daughter should arrive at the age of 21 years, or, in case of her death before that time, until she would have arrived at that age if she survived, unless said property were sold before that time at the prices stated. It further provided that when said daughter arrived at the age of 21 years, or would arrive at such age, then all of such properties that might be undisposed of at that time should be disposed of by the executrix for the best price obtainable, and the proceeds divided as specially directed. It further provided for the division of the proceeds of the property. Held, that the power to sell was a naked power, not coupled with an interest, and therefore no trust was created.

2. PERPETUITIES — POWER OF ALIENATION — SUSPENSION.

A will, authorizing the executrix to sell any of the property of the estate at public or private sale, with or without notice, and without any order from the court, but directing that different pieces of property should be held for certain prices until testator's daughter should arrive at the age of 21 years, or, in case of her death before that time, until she would have arrived at the age of 21 years if she had survived, merely enlarged the legal power of the executrix so that she could sell without previous authority, the condition being a limitation solely upon the express power of sale given by the will, and it did not apply to or restrict the statutory powers of the executrix to sell under an order of court whenever it should be necessary, and it was not in violation of Civ. Code, §§ 715, 716, prohibiting the suspension of the absolute power of alienation of property for a period longer than the lives of persons in being at the testator's death.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Perpetuities, § 45.]

3. SAME.

A will, authorizing the executrix to sell any of the property at public or private sale, with or without notice, and without any order of the court, and directing that the property should be held for a certain price until the testator's daughter should arrive at the age of 21 years, or, in case of her death, before that time, until she would have arrived at that age, unless the property was sold before that time at prices stated, did not suspend or affect the power of the legatees or beneficiaries to alienate their respective interests, within Civ. Code, §§ 715, 716, prohibiting the suspension of the absolute power of alienation of property for a period longer than the lives of persons in being at the testator's death.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Perpetuities, § 45.]

4. SAME.

Where no trust is created and the legal effect of a will is to vest the present title to the entire fee in persons ascertained and in being, although different interests or rights therein are given to each of such persons, the interest of each person can be conveyed immediately.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Perpetuities, § 45.]

5. SAME.

Civ. Code, §§ 715 and 716, prohibiting the suspension of the absolute power of alienation of property for a period longer than the lives of persons in being, relate to suspension of power by the terms of the instrument by which the estate is created, and the fact that some of the interested persons are minors, incapable of executing a valid conveyance, except by the intervention of the court, does not bring the case within the prohibition.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Perpetuities, § 45.]

6. WILLS — INTERESTS CREATED — VESTED ESTATES.

A will authorized the executrix to sell any of the property of the estate without any order from the court, but directed that it should be held for certain prices until the testator's daughter should arrive at the age of 21 years, or, in case of her death before that time, until she would have arrived at that age if she had survived. It further provided that the money received after the testator's death from each of the groups of properties mentioned, either from payments made after his death upon sales made by him before death or from sales made after his death should "be divided and paid over as follows:" Of the first $600,000, four-sixths to three of his children, one-sixth to another son, and one-sixth to his nephew; of the next $200,000, one-half to certain nephews and nieces, and one-half to a university; the next $100,000 was bequeathed to the testator's wife, and the remainder was given to his wife in trust for their three children. Held, that the interests created by the will were vested estates.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, §§ 1464, 1470, 1471.]

7. JUDGMENTS — FOREIGN JUDGMENTS — CONSTRUCTION OF WILL—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A judgment of a court of another state in ancillary administration proceedings, distributing the proceeds of property in that state, is of no binding force as a general judicial construction of the will to be applied and enforced in this state in the administration of assets within the jurisdiction of its courts.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Action by Charles Rufus Campbell against Eleanor Campbell, and others. From the judgment rendered, certain defendants appeal. Reversed.

Hayden & Hayden, Crane & Woodburn Bros., and Miguel Estudillo, for appellants. A. H. Stuttsman, Collier & Carnahan, and Purrington & Adair, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is a proceeding under section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure to obtain a decree declaring the succession to the estate of Allen G. Campbell, deceased. The court below held that certain provisions of the will of the deceased, purporting to dispose of a large part of the estate, operated to suspend the absolute power of alienation of the property for a period longer than the lives of persons in being at his death, that they were, therefore, contrary to sections 715 and 716 of the Civil Code and void, and that, in consequence, he died intestate as to this property and that it descended to his legal heirs. The soundness of this conclusion is the particular question in the case. The appellants are beneficiaries claiming under the provisions of the will thus declared to be inoperative. By the terms of the will the executrix was authorized to sell any property of the estate, at public or private sale, with or without notice, and without any order from the court. The provisions in controversy are as follows:

"Item 8. I hereby direct that all my coal and iron mines, situate in Iron county, Utah, shall be held for the price of $300,000: that all my lead, silver and gold mines, situate in Beaver county, Utah, shall be held for the price of $150,000; that all my now patented lead, silver, gold and copper mines, situate in Yellow Pine Mining District, Lincoln county, Nevada, be held for the price of $200,000, and my Brick Consolidated Gold Mines, situate in Vanderbilt Mining District, San Bernardino county, California, be held for the price of $500,000 until my said daughter Caroline Neil Campbell shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years, or in case of her death before that time, until she would have arrived at the age of twenty-one years if she had survived, unless said properties are sold before that time at the prices herein stipulated; and said properties as groups, shall be sold, separately or together, when the price herein mentioned or more can be obtained.

"Item 9. When my said daughter, Caroline, arrives at the age of twenty-one years, or would arrive at such age, then all of such properties that may be undisposed of at that time my said executrix shall dispose of, for the best price obtainable and divide the proceeds as hereinafter specially directed. In no case, however, shall such bequests be paid unless derived from the proceeds of such properties as herein mentioned, and the bequests shall be paid fully in the order herein mentioned."

It was further provided by item 12 that the money received after the testator's death from each of the groups of properties mentioned in item 8, either from payments made after his death upon sales made by him before death, or from sales made after his death, should "be divided and paid over as follows": of the first $600,000, four-sixths to his three children by his wife Eleanor, one-sixth to his son, Charles Rufus, and one-sixth to his nephew, William B. Stanley; of the next $200,000, one-half to certain nephews and nieces and one-half to Campbell University. By item 13 the next $100,000 of such money was bequeathed to his wife Eleanor, and by items 14 and 4, taken together, the remainder, and all other property not otherwise specifically disposed of, was given to his wife, in trust for their three children, to be held by her for their use until his daughter Caroline reached the age of 21 years. Caroline was born in October, 1898, and, hence, will not be 21 years of age until October 1919. It is claimed that the effect of these provisions of the will is to prevent an absolute disposition of the property until after the latter date, unless in the meantime, it can be sold at the prices fixed in the will. We cannot accede to this proposition.

The will does not devise the lands to the executrix in trust with power to sell in execution of such trust, nor create any trust in her, except such as pertains to her office as executrix (Bank v. Rice, 143 Cal. 272, 76 Pac. 1020), nor does it, with relation to the supposed suspension of power, create any trust in the land in question here. No estate or property whatever is given to the executrix, and without an estate as its subject there can be no trust. The power to sell is given to the executrix in her representative capacity, and is a naked power not coupled with an interest. Estate of Delany, 49 Cal. 85; Auguisola v. Arnaz, 51 Cal. 435; Estep v. Armstrong, 91 Cal. 659, 27 Pac. 1091; Bank v. Rice, supra; Chaplin on Suspension of Power of Alienation, § 96. The only effect of conferring such a power by will is to enlarge the legal power of the executrix so that she can sell without previous authority from the court, although not without subsequent confirmation. The condition that, prior to October 1919, such sales shall not be made unless certain prices are obtained, is a limitation solely upon the express power of sale given by the will to the executrix. It does not and could not apply to or restrict the statutory powers of the executrix to sell under an order of the court whenever it is shown to be necessary to sell, or beneficial to the persons interested in the estate to do so. Estate of Pforr, 144 Cal. 126, 77 Pac. 825. Nor does it suspend or affect the power of the legatees or beneficiaries of the fund to be created under the will, to alienate their respective interests in the fund. It does not purport to operate in any manner upon the interests of the beneficiaries and, therefore, they are left free to dispose of their rights and interests in any lawful mode. The giving of this power of sale with the limitation annexed suspending its full exercise for any period, is not that character of suspension of the absolute power of alienation which is forbidden by the Code. The prohibition of the Code is directed toward the suspension of the power when exercised by those who hold or control the estate, or some interest therein, and not to provisions limiting the naked power to sell given to one without any interest whatever, such as an executor or agent. The testator was at liberty to either give or withhold the special power to sell, and if given, to attach to it such limitations as he saw fit. But in whatever form he chose to leave it, it would not affect the general power of alienation of the estate, either by the executrix under order of the court, or by the persons to whom the property was given. If there is any infraction of the rule forbidding such suspension, it does not arise from the limitation upon the power of the executrix to sell.

The contention of the respondents appears to be that the disposition of the property made by the will, is of such a character that it of necessity prevents the alienation thereof by the persons interested, except for the fixed prices, until after October, 1919. This proposition assumes, either that, during this period, there can be no alienation except by the executrix under the power given in the will, or that the persons in whom the estate vests at the death of the testator are deprived of such power during the said period. We think this proposition is not maintainable. The property of a decedent vests immediately upon his death, either in his heirs, or in the devisees and legatees. Civ. Code, §§ 1341, 1384; Estep v. Armstrong, supra; Estate of Delany, supra. When property is vested, without valid limitations to the contrary, the power of alienation goes with it as a concomitant of ownership. Chaplin on Suspension, § 61, note 2; Williams v. Williams, 73 Cal. 102, 14 Pac. 394; Toland v. Toland, 123 Cal. 143, 55 Pac. 681; In re Winter, 114 Cal. 188, 45 Pac. 1063. If the will vests in any person the present title to any interest or estate, other than in trust, a provision directly or indirectly restraining such person from alienating it, would be repugnant to the particular interest created, and, consequently, void. Civ. Code, § 711. Hence, since there is no trust created, if the legal effect of the will is to vest the present title to the entire fee in persons ascertained and in being, although different interests or rights therein are given to each of such persons, the interest of each person can be conveyed immediately and the collective transfers of all the interested persons will convey the absolute fee. The power of alienation is not suspended, when there are persons in being by whom an absolute interest in possession can be conveyed. Civ. Code, § 716. Such conveyance may be consummated either by the joint act of all, or by the separate and independent conveyances of the several persons seised of the interests. "Whenever there is in being a representative for each estate, interest, right and possibility, present and future, vested and contingent, each capable of alienating—if he wishes—the estate or interest represented by him, there can be no suspension. For the various estates and interests constitute amongst them the makings of an absolute fee; and if by releases or conveyances to a common grantee, these can be consolidated in one, the consolidated estate thus formed is, of necessity, an absolute fee in possession." Chaplin on Suspension, § 64; Gray on Perpetuities, § 274. The limitation upon the power of sale given to the executrix does not affect this rule in the least, for the executrix, as we have seen, has not, in her representative capacity, any interest in the property, but only a naked power. The fact that some of the interested persons are minors, incapable of executing a valid conveyance except by the intervention of the court, does not bring the case within the prohibition. The suspension of power as to the minors' interests, in such a case, would not be made by the will, but by the law. The prohibition is against those limitations upon the power of alienation which may be imposed by dispositions of property, and not against limitations made by the law upon the capacity to convey. "The suspension of the power of alienation which is prohibited by statute is such as arises from the terms of the instrument by which the estate is created, and not such as exists outside of that instrument, as a disability of a person in whom an interest is vested, or the delay incident to procuring an order of court for the sale or its confirmation." Estate of Pforr, 144 Cal. 121, 77 Pac. 825. "The suspension must be by virtue of some provision in the instrument by which the limitation, condition, or estate is created, and the power is not suspended by a mere direction in the instrument to make a sale or other alienation of the land after a designated period of time." Toland v. Toland, 123 Cal. 143, 55 Pac. 681.

It cannot be doubted that the interests created by the will in the property of the estate are all vested interests. No specific disposition is made of the rents, issues, proceeds, or profits of the mines mentioned in item 8, which may accrue during the time between the death of the testator, and the sale of the property. The funds arising from these, therefore, fall into the residue disposed of by items 4 and 14, and the right thereto is thereby vested in the wife as trustee for the designated children. The respective rights of the several legatees in the proceeds of the lands when sold, although such shares of the proceeds cannot be received, nor the actual sum payable to each ascertained, until the sales are made, are nevertheless interests which vested upon the death of the testator, the enjoyment, only, being postponed until the fund out of which payment was to be made should be realized. The fact that as to those entitled after the legacies to the children and the nephew were satisfied, it could not be ascertained whether or not they would receive anything until sufficient sales should be made to satisfy the prior charges, does not prevent the vesting of those interests in like manner. The right to the shares vested immediately, subject only to be defeated by the failure of the property to produce sufficient funds wherewith to pay them. "It may be laid down as a general rule that where, by a will, shares or interests in real or personal estate, to be ascertained by a division, are given, or where the real estate is directed to be sold and the proceeds divided, the estate or interest of the devisee or legatee in the property to be divided or converted is a vested interest before the conversion or division, and that limitations over to take effect in case of the death of those first designated prior to the division or sale must be held to refer to the time appointed for the division or sale, and not to the period of their completion, unless the language of the will clearly and unequivocally expressed an intention that the vesting shall be postponed until such completion. * * *" "A similar rule is applied to gifts of shares or legacies to be paid out of a fund or surplus to be collected in or ascertained and divided; and in those cases the interests of the legatees are held to vest absolutely before the fund is collected, or the surplus ascertained, or division actually made. * * * The uncertainty as to the shares is no obstacle to such a vesting; a vested estate can exist in an undivided share, as well as in a specific piece of land; and it is not necessary that the share should be ascertained by separation, provided the rule for its ascertainment is established." Manice v. Manice, 43 N. Y. 303; Hone's Executrix v. Van Schaick, 20 Wend. (N. Y.) 564; Wetherhead v. Stoddard, 58 Vt. 632, 5 Atl. 517, 56 Am. Rep. 573; Robert v. Carning, 89 N. Y. 225; Henderson v. Henderson, 113 N. Y. 1, 20 N. E. 814; Millard's Appeal, 87 Pa. St. 457; In re Winter, 114 Cal. 188, 45 Pac. 1063.

The bequest of the six shares to the children and nephew is not made to them as a class, as was the case in Estate of Winter, 114 Cal. 186, 45 Pac. 1063, but to each severally. Nor is the right to share in the fund contingent, as in that case, upon survival until division take place. The language of the opinions in Estate of Walkerly, 108 Cal. 644, 41 Pac. 772, 49 Am. St. Rep. 97, and Estate of Caverly, 119 Cal. 409, 51 Pac. 629, was used with reference to the fact, apparent in those cases, that by the terms of the instruments there under consideration a trust was created in fee which was vested in trustees absolutely for that purpose, and such trustees were, by the terms of the trust, forbidden to convey within a certain prescribed period, and, consequently, during that time there were no persons who could convey the present estate. Those cases are distinguished from the present case by the fact that in this case no trust has been created, and the interests all vest in persons who can convey immediately. These respective interests in the proceeds of the contemplated sales, thus vested in the beneficiaries, coupled with the right vested in the wife as trustee to receive the intervening rents or mining proceeds, constitute the entire beneficial interest and estate in the lands. If there remains any other existing estate, right, title, or interest therein, legal or equitable, therein remaining, it is the barren, formal, legal title for so long a time as may elapse between the death of the testator and the sale. Bank v. Rice, 143 Cal. 271, 76 Pac. 1020. No disposition appears to have been made of this formal title, unless it is included in the residue given to the wife in trust. It is not necessary to determine what has become of it, for, in any case, it is vested, and the will does not directly or indirectly forbid or prevent a transfer of it by the persons in whom it is vested, whether it be in the wife as trustee, in the heirs at law, or in the beneficiaries. All the interests being vested, there being no valid attempt to forbid any persons seised of any particular interests or estates from conveying the same, and the persons in whom they are vested being ascertained, it follows, under the rules we have stated, that a present alienation of the absolute fee is at any time possible, and hence, that there is no invalidity in the portions of the will attacked.

We have, so far, treated the case upon the assumption that the disposition of the residue of the estate to the wife, in trust for the three designated children, is valid. It is contended that it is void because it leaves no power of disposition of the corpus of such residue in any person in being until the time when the child Caroline arrives at the age of 21 years. We do not wish to be understood as expressing any opinion upon the validity of this part of the will. The appellants herein are not interested in the residue, and the validity of the disposition made of it does not affect the validity of their specific legacies, and is not involved in the case as presented on this appeal. If it is invalid, the residue may go absolutely to the legal heirs, but whether so or not, the appellants will first be entitled to receive their respective special bequests or devises. What becomes of the residue after they are paid, is of no importance to them so far as the legacies are concerned.

In view of the necessity of reversing the judgment appealed from, and the possibility of another trial, we find it necessary to consider another point presented in the record. The testator was, at the time of his death, domiciled in Riverside county, in this state, and the will was there first probated. Subsequently, the will was admitted to probate in the state of Utah and ancillary administration was had there through an administrator with the will annexed, appointed by the courts of that state, in which a large part of the land involved in the controversy is situated. The administrator with the will annexed reported to the courts of that state a sale of some of the property there situated, made by him without any order of the court and at a price much less than that fixed by the will, and, of course, within the prohibited period. By regular proceedings for that purpose in the courts of that state, the sale was confirmed. Afterwards, under a decree of the Utah court, regularly made, a distribution was ordered to be made of the net proceeds of this sale to the three children, son and nephew, named in the first clause of item 12 of the will, and the sums distributed were paid to the several persons accordingly. It is now claimed by the appellants that this judgment of the Utah court is a conclusive adjudication of the validity of the provisions of the will here involved, binding not only upon the courts of Utah, but also upon the courts of this state and upon all the persons concerned in the estate anywhere, and that it determines, in effect, that the power of sale given to the executrix may be exercised by an administrator with the will annexed, and that it may be exercised by him without regard to the prices fixed in the will and at any time within the forbidden period. To this proposition we cannot agree. The judgment of the Utah court doubtless is conclusive as to the land sold, and as to the proceeds distributed under it. Possibly it may be binding as to future sales in that state, and as to the construction of the will with respect to property in that state, but upon this point we express no opinion. We are satisfied, however, that it is of no binding force as a general judicial construction of the will to be applied and enforced in this state in the administration of assets within the jurisdiction of the courts. It does not constitute an estoppel against the respondents in the case at bar.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; SHAW, J.

JONES et al. v. GUNN et al. (Sac. 1,261.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 17, 1906.)

1. Homestead—Acquisition—Declaration—Description of Property—Sufficiency.

Under Civ. Code, § 1263, providing that the declaration of homestead must contain a description of the premises, a declaration of homestead which describes the land as "lying in B. county * * * being with other land * * * [describing land in a designated township] and all lands owned by" the husband of the declarant "in said township" is insufficient for failing to describe all the land claimed as a homestead.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Homestead, § 61.]

2. Same—Allegation of Value.

Civ. Code, § 1263, provides that a declaration of homestead must contain an estimate of the actual cash value of the premises claimed. A declaration of homestead claimed as a homestead other lands than those definitely described. The declarant estimated the actual cash value of "said property" to be a specified sum. Held that, as the estimate of the value was, not of the premises described, but of the property claimed as a homestead, there was no estimate of value as required by statute.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Homestead, § 61.]

3. Process—Proof of Service—Parol Evidence—Admissibility.

Where a judgment roll containing an unsigned return of service on defendant in the suit is offered in evidence, parol evidence of actual service of process on defendant therein is admissible, for the court acquired jurisdiction of defendant therein by the service of process and did not lose it by a neglect to make proof of the same.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 40, Process, § 200.]

4. Judgment—Opening and Vacating—Irregularities.

Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 7, requiring the dismissal of an action on failure of plaintiff to cause the summons to be returned with proof of service within three years after the commencement of the action, etc., applies to actions which are untried, and not to actions which have gone to judgment, and a judgment rendered against a defendant regularly served with process will not be set aside because there is on file no proof of service.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, §§ 686, 697.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. M. Albery, Judge.

Action by T. B. Jones and another against E. Gunn and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Maguire & Gallagher, for appellants. Warren Sexton and F. C. Lusk, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought by plaintiff T. B. Jones and his wife, Mary Jones, to quiet title to certain lands described in their complaint. Defendants joined issue upon the allegations of the complaint, asserting title in themselves under mortgage foreclosure proceedings and by adverse possession. Judgment passed for them, and plaintiffs appeal.

The undisputed facts are that Jones executed a mortgage upon the land to secure the repayment of $1,950. The mortgage was foreclosed, judgment was entered in favor of the mortgagee, an order of sale issued, the property sold, a certificate of sale given, and the sheriff's deed of the property executed and delivered in due course on February 12, 1891. On August 20, 1891, the defendants, claiming under this deed, entered into possession of the property, and the court found that they had remained in adverse possession of it ever since. While the sufficiency of their adverse possession is disputed, it is not questioned that, during all the time subsequent to the date of the deed, they have paid all taxes levied and assessed on the land. In 1899 the plaintiff Mary Jones forcibly entered upon the possession of a dwelling house upon the premises, and immediately thereafter brought this action to quiet title. Her contention has its foundation in the following facts: That, subsequent to the giving of the mortgage, she filed a good and sufficient claim of homestead upon the land in question; that in the foreclosure proceedings she was not made a party defendant; and that her homestead claim is still valid and subsisting. To foreclose the homestead right of the wife it was, of course, necessary that she should have been made a party, and it is unquestioned that this was not done. If, however, her claim of homestead was itself invalid, this omission was without significance. The homestead claim filed by the wife was admitted in evidence, subject to the determination by the trial court of its legal sufficiency and validity, and the court decided that it was invalid. It expressed its views in an opinion, the clearness and cogency of which leave nothing to be desired, for which reason that opinion is here set forth at length and adopted.

"I also incline to the opinion that no valid declaration of homestead was filed by the plaintiff Mary J. Jones. While it is true that homestead and exemption laws are remedial, and, generally, must be liberally construed in order to effect the purposes intended thereby, yet it is equally true that homesteads and homestead exemptions are the creatures of statute, and that the failure to comply with any statutory requirement essential to a valid declaration of homestead cannot be supplied by liberal construction. Indeed, the Supreme Court of this state has generally held that homestead claimants must quite strictly comply with the statutory requirements as (formerly) to wife's acknowledgment (Beck v. Soward, 76 Cal. 530, 18 Pac. 650); as to head of family (Reid v. Englehart-Davidson Mercantile Co., 126 Cal. 527, 58 Pac. 1063, 77 Am. St. Rep. 206); as to residence on premises (Boreham v. Byrne, 83 Cal. 27, 23 Pac. 212); as to statement of husband's failure to make declaration (Cunha v. Hughes, 122 Cal. 113, 54 Pac. 535, 68 Am. St. Rep. 27) and as to estimate of the actual cash value of the premises, etc., Tappendorff v. Moranda, 134 Cal. 421, 66 Pac. 491. See, generally, cases cited in notes to sections 1237 and 1263, Civ. Code, Pomeroy's Edition. These requirements must all appear upon the face of the declaration, and the omission of any one of them from the declaration is fatal to the claim of homestead, and cannot be supplied by extraneous evidence. 126 Cal. 529. 58 Pac. 1063, 77 Am. St. Rep. 206.

"Section 1263, Civ. Code, by separate subdivision, provides that the declaration must contain a description of the premises, and this provision would seem to be as mandatory as any of the other provisions of said section. True, the declaration before us contains a description of premises, but does it contain a description of the premises claimed therein as a homestead? The declarant states that the land and premises on which she resided are described as follows: Lying in Butte county '* * * being with other land, * * * [describing land in sec. 30, tp. 22 N., R. 4 E.] and all lands owned by T. B. Jones in said township.' Is this not a statement that the declarent claims as homestead lands not specifically described? And is it a statement that she (declarant) claims the lands which are definitely described? The statement is, not that the described lands are claimed, but that they, with other lands, and all lands in said township owned by T. B. Jones, are claimed as a homestead. No authorities are cited by counsel on either side, and presumably none have been found on this question.

"It has been held that the description in a declaration of homestead need not be more particular than in a conveyance (Ornbaum v. Creditors, 61 Cal. 455); also that it may contain more than one lot (Id.). But will this meet the objection here made? The argument is made, and with a great deal of force, that the words in the attempted description above quoted are mere surplusage, and should be disregarded. But is the court at liberty to thus treat the matter? It would seem clear that the declarant claimed other lands than those specifically described, as the declaration claims as a homestead, 'with other lands,' the lands specifically described. This is emphasized by the concluding words, 'and all lands owned by T. B. Jones in said township.' These words cannot refer to the lands described as it is expressly stated that they are in said township, and it is also alleged in the complaint that they are owned by plaintiffs. This is not a case like In re Ogburn, 105 Cal. 97, 38 Pac. 498, in which the description clearly discloses the lands intended to be claimed, for, as stated, it is clear that the declarant intended to claim other lands, and it is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiffs in fact did own other lands in said township which are not specifically described in the declaration. The question is exasperating, for, if the claim of 'other lands' is void, and if the words 'with other lands, * * * and all lands in said township,' can be disregarded, and the declaration be read as if those words did not appear therein, then, as regards description, the declaration would seem to be sufficient to sustain the claim of homestead. But it does seem to me that the lands specifically described are not the lands claimed, but that they, with other lands, are claimed, and claimed in such a way that the court cannot say what lands are claimed in the declaration as a homestead. An examination of the homestead records would not disclose to a third party just what lands plaintiffs claim as a homestead.

"The question may also bear another aspect. Section 1263, Civ. Code, provides that the declaration must contain an estimate of the actual cash value of the premises claimed. As already shown other lands than those definitely described were claimed as a homestead. Now, if we omit the outside lands and disregard them under the objection to the descriptions, can we do so to the statutory requirement as to an estimate of the actual cash value of the premises? The declarant estimates the actual cash value of 'said property' to be $4,000. Can this be said to have reference exclusively to the land specifically described? Is this not an estimate of value upon all the property referred to in the declaration? T. B. Jones owned other lands in said township, and his wife claimed them, with the lands described, as a homestead. Can it be said, therefore, that the other lands did not enter into the estimate of value simply because they were not specifically described? It seems to me not. The estimate of value is not of said 'described premises,' but of 'said property.' It would seem that the words 'said property' have reference to all the property mentioned in the declaration, whether specifically described or not, and hence that there is no estimate of value of the lands definitely described. As the question involves statutory requirements, I do not believe that, in holding that the declaration of homestead is invalid, the court places too strict construction upon the provisions of our homestead laws."

Upon the trial the defendants offered the judgment roll in the foreclosure suit of Gunn et al. v. Jones et al., and, over the objection and exception of the plaintiffs, this judgment roll was admitted. The judgment roll contained an unsigned return of service upon the defendant T. B. Jones. Defendants, in offering the judgment roll, proposed to prove, and did prove, by the witness, who at the time was deputy sheriff of the county, that Jones actually had been served; that Jones had suffered default in the foreclosure action, and the judgment in foreclosure contained a recital that the default of the defendants was entered, it having been shown to the court that each of them had been regularly served by the process of the court. The date of service upon T. B. Jones was August 20, 1889. The summons, with the unsigned return indorsed thereon, was filed October 12, 1889. After proof of this actual service, which was not disputed, the court permitted the witness Patterson, who had been deputy sheriff at the time of the service, to complete the return of service by signing the name of his former principal as sheriff by himself as deputy, and, so corrected, admitted the judgment roll in evidence. As to this it is urged by appellants that such a correction was void; that the power of the deputy to bind his principal certainly ceased when that principal himself ceased to be sheriff; and that the signature of the deputy made some 12 years after was as meaningless as though the principal had been dead. Upon the part of respondent it is argued that the act was merely a correction of the judgment roll nunc pro tunc as of the time when the service was actually made, and of the time when the signature to the return should actually have been placed on the judgment roll, and that the proceeding was wholly in consonance with the powers of the court to correct its records nunc pro tunc at any time to make them speak the truth. We need not, however, pause to consider this proposition, for the reason that the court had the unquestioned right to take evidence upon the fact of the service, since upon this fact, and not upon the return, the jurisdiction of the court in foreclosure depended, and, if it found the fact of service to exist, as here it did, then to admit the judgment roll in evidence, regardless of the defective return of service. In Herman v. Santee, 103 Cal. 519, 37 Pac. 509, 42 Am. St. Rep. 145, this court said: "The question then arises, did the court err in allowing the proof of service to be amended and filed nunc pro tunc as of the date of the judgment? Upon this subject, Mr. Freeman, in his work on Judgments (4th Ed. § 89b) states the law as follows: 'If the return upon the summons or other writ designed to give the court jurisdiction over the person of the defendant is omitted or incorrectly made, but the facts really existed which were required to give the court jurisdiction, the weight of authority at the present time permits the officer to correct or supply his return until it states the truth, though by such correcion a judgment apparently void is made valid.'" And in Hibernia Sav. & L. Soc. v. Mathai, 116 Cal. 426, 48 Pac. 370, the same rule is announced in the following language: "The court acquired jurisdiction of the appellant by the service of its process, and did not lose it by neglecting to make the proof of such service a matter of record; Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 600, 29 Pac. 220, and a subsequent amendment of the record by supplying this proof of service is as effective to support the judgment as if it had been filed before its entry. Freeman on Judgments, 89b; Allison v. Thomas, 72 Cal. 562, 14 Pac. 309, 1 Am. St. Rep. 89; Perri v. Beaumont, 88 Cal. 108, 25 Pac. 1109; Herman v. Santee, 103 Cal. 519, 37 Pac. 509, 42 Am. St. Rep. 145. The evidence was before the court indisputably showing the fact of service. None of appellants' rights was impaired by the mode adopted by the court to show that such service was actually made. Whether the better procedure would have been to have cast the evidence of the deputy sheriff into the form of an affidavit, and to have attached that affidavit to the judgment roll as proof of service, as was done in Woodward v. Brown, 119 Cal. 299, 51 Pac. 2, 542, 63 Am. St. Rep. 108, cannot matter to appellants, since, in the course pursued by the court, there was no invasion of any of their rights. And this is so because, when we come to consider the next proposition which they advance, namely, the applicability of section 581, Code of Civil Procedure, to the case before us, the judgment roll will be treated as though proof of service did not appear upon it.

Section 581, subdivision 7, of the Code of Civil Procedure requires a court to dismiss an action upon failure of the plantiff to cause the summons to be returned with proof of service within three years after the commencement of the action, and this, although the summons may have been actually served, and although the lapse of time until the return may be but a few days after the expiration of the three years. Herein appellants place reliance upon Modoc Land Co. v. Superior Court, 128 Cal. 255, 60 Pac. 848; Siskiyou County Bank v. Hoyt, 132 Cal. 81, 64 Pac. 118; Vrooman v. Li Po Tai, 113 Cal. 302, 45 Pac. 470; White v. Superior Court, 126 Cal. 245, 58 Pac. 450. That such is the law as established by these cases there is no question. Previous to the enactment of subdivision 7 of section 581 an action could be dismissed if not prosecuted by the plaintiff with reasonable dispatch. It being thought that in its operation this law was unsatisfactory, as leaving too large a play for discretion in the minds of judges, the law as it now exists was enacted. Its very clear design, therefore, was to enable defendants to remove by dismissal, and to make it compulsory upon courts to dismiss, actions which, by the long delay in their prosecution, were thus to be conclusively presumed to have been brought and to have been left pending for purposes of vexation and harassment. Such was the condition presented in each of the above-enumerated cases. The motions were addressed to pending actions which had never been brought to trial. Entirely different is the case at bar, where, after commencement of the action, service of summons was made, the trial had, and a judgment, which has long since become final, was rendered within a year after the commencement of the action. That subdivision 7 of section 581, Code of Civil Procedure, must be construed to apply to pending actions which are untried, and not to actions which have gone to judgment, is a conclusion demanded, not only by the reasons which called the law into being, but by the extraordinary and absurd anomalies which would result from any other construction. Thus, A. commences his action against B., causes summons to be regularly served upon B., the summons is returned and filed, but without proof of service. B. makes default, proof of service and of the default is made before the court and A. obtains his judgment; all within 60 days after the commencement of his action. For 2 years and 10 months thereafter that judgment is perfectly valid and enforceable, but, at the expiration of 2 years and 10 months, under appellants' contention, it would become ipso facto void, and without the power of the court to do aught but dismiss the proceedings, notwithstanding the fact that there is no law which limits the time when a court may, by nunc pro tunc order, correct its judgment. Such a construction was as surely not within the contemplation of the lawmakers, as it is clearly not within the reason which called section 581 into being.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Ex parte CLARY. (Cr. 1,339.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 25, 1906. Rehearing Denied Oct. 23, 1906.)

1. HABEAS CORPUS—GROUNDS—WANT OF JURISDICTION—EFFECT OF RECITALS IN COMMITMENT OF INSANE PERSON.

On habeas corpus to procure petitioner's discharge from custody in the state hospital for the insane, it appeared that the commitment under which he was detained stated that it concerned an application for the commitment of Dennis C., and that on the petition of Paul C. and a certificate of lunacy made by two duly qualified medical examiners in lunacy, and upon such other facts and information as were produced before the court, "at a hearing in open court in the presence of said C. duly had, and being satisfied that the alleged insane person is insane, and a proper subject for custody and treatment, within the meaning of the statute," his commitment was ordered. Held, that the commitment was sufficient to show jurisdiction as "said C." must be construed as referring to the alleged insane person, and a finding that he was insane and a proper subject for custody and treatment, within the meaning of the statute, was sufficient to include the findings required by Pol. Code, § 2217, as amended by St. 1881, p. 7, c. 9, that he was "so far disordered in his mind as to endanger health, person, or property," and the recital that the hearing was "duly had" implied that due and lawful notice was given to the alleged insane person and proved to the satisfaction of the court, and it was not necessary that the record should on its face expressly state the particular statute under which the tribunal assumed to act.

2. STATUTES — REPEAL — INVALIDITY OF REPEALING ACT—INSANE PERSONS.

Pol. Code, §§ 2210-2218, provide for the preferring of a charge of insanity against a person, and for the issuance and service of a warrant for his arrest for a trial of the charge, and an adjudication as to his sanity, and similar provisions are found in St. 1875-76, p. 137, c. 135. Act 1897, art. 3, § 8 (St. 1897, p. 329, c. 227), in relation to commitment of insane persons to a hospital, was void as authorizing a deprivation of liberty without due process of law, but contained no express repeal of the provisions of any other statute on the subject, merely repealing all acts or parts of acts in conflict with the same. Held, that the statute of 1897 did not operate to repeal any of the prior provisions relative to the commitment of insane persons.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Statutes, § 244.]

3. HABEAS CORPUS—HEARING—JURISDICTION.

Pen. Code, § 1475, as amended in 1905 (St. & Amend. to Code 1905, p. 706), gives the Supreme Court power to make a writ of habeas corpus returnable before any superior judge for determination by him, and Act 1897, art. 3, § 8 (St. 1897, p. 329, c. 227), and the act of 1903 (St. & Amend. to Code 1903, p. 485, c. 364), provide that any patient committed as an insane person who has become sane while confined in the hospital may be discharged from further custody after examination on habeas corpus proceedings. Held, that on application to the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain the applicant's release from confinement in the state hospital for the insane, on the ground that the applicant was not insane, a writ would issue for the production of the applicant before the judge of a certain superior court for a hearing as to applicant's sanity on proper evidence.

In bank. Habeas corpus by Dennis G. Clary to obtain petitioner's discharge from custody in the Mendocino State Hospital for the Insane. Ordered that a writ issue for the production of petitioner before the judge of the superior court of Sonoma county for a hearing on the question of petitioner's sanity, and his discharge or remand, according to the determination of such question.

C. W. Eastin, for petitioner.

SHAW, J. The petitioner, a patient confined in the Mendocino State Hospital for the Insane, applies for his discharge by habeas corpus on two grounds: First, that the commitment under which he is confined is void; second, that he is not insane.

1. The petition avers that he has applied on the same grounds to the superior court of Mendocino county and to the District Court of Appeal for the Second District for discharge on habeas corpus; that the superior court, after a hearing, denied the same; and that the District Court of Appeal, after a hearing, was unable to agree as to whether or not the court which committed him had jurisdiction to commit him, and thereupon dismissed the proceedings. A copy of the commitment is made part of the petition, but no other part of the record is exhibited. The commitment is as follows: "In the Matter of the Application for the Commitment of Dennis G. Clary, an Alleged Insane Person. Upon the petition of Paul Clary, dated Oct. 31, 1902, and a certificate of lunacy made by two duly qualified medical examiners in lunacy, which certificate is dated on the 6th day of November, 1902, and which is annexed hereto, and upon such other facts and information as were produced before me at a hearing in open court in the presence of said Clary duly had, and being satisfied that the above alleged insane person is insane and a proper subject for custody and treatment in an institution for the insane within the meaning of the statute, it is therefore hereby ordered that the said Dennis G. Clary be and hereby is adjudged insane, and that he be committed to the Mendocino State Hospital." The recital that the hearing was "in the presence of said Clary" must be taken to mean that it was had in the presence of Dennis G. Clary, the alleged insane person, and not as referring to the Paul Clary, who happened to prefer the charge of lunacy. The contrary is not alleged or claimed. The language of judgments and orders is not chosen by the adverse party, but is official and presumably fair and impartial. It is not subject to the common-law rules of pleadings made to secure to the opposite party precise information of the facts alleged against him. Where it has been considered necessary or proper, in framing a judgment or order, to recite the facts conferring jurisdiction to make it, it has been the custom, from time immemorial, to do so by a very brief statement of the general facts which give jurisdiction to act in the particular matter, and over the particular person affected. These statements are mere general conclusions of fact. From the nature and purpose of such recitals it follows that they must be given the utmost force and effect which the language employed will warrant. This rule must be observed in considering the effect of the commitment in the present case; it being, in effect, also an adjudication that Dennis G. Clary was then insane. When its recitals are so construed, the objections of the present petitioner are all refuted. The recital that the hearing was duly had in open court, in the presence of the person alleged to be insane, implies that everything was done which the law requires as essential to give jurisdiction to hear and determine the matter. Otherwise it would not be "duly had," and the recital would be untrue.

Taking up the objections more in detail, they are each untenable. The record, by virtue of this recital, affirmatively shows jurisdiction. Upon a collateral attack, and in the absence of any specific averment that any other part of the record is inconsistent therewith, this is a sufficient showing of jurisdiction, even in the case of the judgment of an inferior tribunal, or a superior court or judge acting in a special statutory proceeding. The finding that Clary was "insane and a proper subject for custody and treatment in an institution for the insane within the meaning of the statute" is sufficient to include the findings required by section 2217 of the Political Code, as amended in 1881 (St. 1881, p. 7, c. 9), that he was "so far disordered in his mind as to endanger health, person, or property." We do not mean to intimate, however, that upon a collateral attack the absence of the statement of a proper finding in the record would be fatal to the validity of the judgment in an insanity proceeding, where the court had jurisdiction of the person adjudged insane. The recital that the hearing was "duly had" implies that due and lawful notice was given thereof to the alleged insane person, and that such giving of notice was proven to the satisfaction of the court, and is equivalent to a finding to that effect. It was not necessary that the record should, on its face, expressly state the particular statute under which the tribunal assumed to act. It is sufficient if there was legal authority under any statute in force at the time for the proceeding actually had, and no reference to the statute was necessary.

It is contended, under the authority of In re Lambert, 134 Cal. 626, 66 Pac. 851, 55 L. R. A. 856, 86 Am. St. Rep. 296, that at the time this commitment was made there was no valid statute in force authorizing the commitment of insane persons to state hospitals for the insane, and hence that the proceedings are necessarily void. It is said that that decision held the act of 1897 wholly void in that respect, and that the act expressly repealed all prior statutes, thus leaving in force no law on the subject. If this is true, then all of the hundreds of inmates of the state insane hospitals, committed thereto during the six years from 1897 until the passage of the act of 1903 (St. & Amend. to Code 1903, p. 485, c. 364), are held without authority. A result so grave demands close scrutiny of the propositions on which it depends. The act of 1897 provided, or attempted to provide, that any judge of the superior court of a county could adjudge any person insane and commit him to a state hospital for the insane, without any process of law upon, or notice to, such person, without trial or hearing, and even without his presence or knowledge, upon the mere certificate of two physicians who had been authorized under the statute to act as "medical examiners in lunacy," to the effect that they had made inquiry into the facts and had sufficiently examined such person, and that in their opinion, after such inquiry and examination, such person was insane. It was an arbitrary proceeding under this provision which was considered and held void in the Lambert Case above cited. No just criticism can be made of the decision upon that point. Such a procedure would clearly allow a person to be deprived of his liberty without notice or trial; that is, without due process of law. It does not follow, however, that there was no other method authorized by the act of 1897 by which an insane person could legally be committed to a hospital, nor, if the act provided no other legal mode, does it follow that previous laws were thereby repealed so that no statute on the subject remained in force. The decision intimates that in special cases, as under section 8 of article 3 (St. 1897, p. 329, c. 227), in which notice is provided by means of an arrest, the act may authorize commitments which would be lawful and valid. On that subject, the opinion in the Lambert Case contains the following expression: "The case before us does not involve the right of the state to provide for the summary arrest of a person against whom a charge of insanity is made, and his temporary detention until the truth of the charge can be investigated. Such arrest would itself be a notice to him of the charge, under which he would be afforded an opportunity for a hearing thereon." If the act does authorize a valid commitment under any proceeding, we should have to presume, under the case as presented to us, that the authorized proceeding was duly followed.

But we need not inquire whether or not it does so provide. It may be conceded that no valid commitment can be made under the act of 1897, and that the reason is that the procedure therein prescribed does not provide for any notice to the person charged, nor for any trial upon which he would have a right to be heard, and that all the provisions of that act relating to the arrest and commitment of insane persons are unconstitutional and void. In that case the former law on the subject is not repealed by the act, and is still in force. There is no express repeal of the provisions of the Political Code on the subject. The act merely repeals "all acts or parts of acts in conflict with this act." Such a repealing clause has no greater force than a repeal by implication. Every valid statute repeals by implication all prior statutes in conflict with it. "No repeal by implication can result from a provision in a subsequent statute, when that provision is itself devoid of constitutional force." Endlich on Statutes, § 192; McAllister v. Hamlin, 83 Cal. 365, 23 Pac. 357; Ex parte Sohncke (Cal. Sup.) 82 Pac. 957, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 813. And the rule is the same where the subsequent unconstitutional act declares the repeal of all acts or parts of acts inconsistent therewith. County of Orange v. Harris, 97 Cal. 600, 32 Pac. 594; Santa Cruz R. P. Co. v. Lyons, 133 Cal. 116, 65 Pac. 329. Sections 2210 to 2218, inclusive, of the Political Code, contain provisions for the preferring of a charge of insanity against a person, for the issuance and service of a warrant for his arrest, for the regular trial of the charge in the usual manner, and for the adjudication as to his sanity, and his commitment, if found insane. Similar provisions are found in section 17 of the act of March 6, 1876, relating to the Napa Asylum. St. 1875–76, p. 137, c. 135. If the provisions of these statutes are not in conflict with those of the act of 1897, then they were not repealed and the proceeding here attacked was in full compliance with the two statutes mentioned and is valid. The same result follows if they do conflict with the invalid parts of the act of 1897; for, in that case also, the prior statutes are not repealed. In any possible alternative shown by the petition for the writ, the commitment is valid. So far, therefore, as the petition is based on the ground that the commitment is void, it is insufficient and must be denied.

2. The commitment of a person to a state hospital for the insane does not authorize his confinement after he is permanently restored to sanity. The act of 1897 and the act of 1903 both recognize this, and provide that any patient who has become sane may be discharged from further custody after examination on habeas corpus proceedings. The petition alleges that the petitioner is not insane. Upon that allegation he is entitled to a preliminary writ, in order to inquire into its truth and discharge him if he is found to be sane. This court does not usually issue writs to try and determine such questions of fact. Under the present law (Pen. Code, § 1475, as amended in 1905; St. & Amend. to Code 1905, p. 706, c. 544) the Supreme Court has power to make the writ returnable before any superior judge for determination by him, and we think this is the proper disposition of the present case.

It is ordered that a writ of habeas corpus issue herein for the production of the petitioner before Hon. Emmett Seawell, judge of the superior court of Sonoma county, that he may receive the return thereto, and thereupon hear such proper evidence as may be offered upon the question of the sanity of petitioner, and discharge or remand the petitioner as he may determine such question.

DOLLENMAYER et al. v. PRYOR (CÆSAR, Intervener.) (Sac. 1,460.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 2, 1906.)

1. Appeal—Decision Reviewable—Form of Judgment—Order Denying Intervention.

An order clearly showing a denial of a right of intervention, and forbidding the filing of a complaint, is sufficient to form the basis of an appeal without any more formal verbose judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, § 876.]

2. Same—Final Judgment.

An order, denying a right of intervention, is final as to the right of intervener, and justifies an appeal without waiting for judgment between the other parties.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, § 368.]

3. Public Lands—Disposal of State Lands—Grant to Individual—Right to Protest.

One not claiming any right, title, or interest, in land filed on for purchase from the state as not suitable for cultivation, and who does not himself propose to purchase such land, cannot initiate a contest before the surveyor general against the proposed sale on the ground that the land is suitable for cultivation.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Public Lands, § 394.]

4. Same—Jurisdiction of Court.

Pol. Code, § 3414, authorizing the surveyor general on demand, or when he believes a question of law is involved, to submit to the district court contests arising before him, as to locations on public lands, does not give the court jurisdiction of a purported contest so referred, in which the one, objecting to the proposed sale of the land, claims no right, title, or interest therein, and does not himself propose to purchase the land.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Public Lands, § 394.]

5. Appeal — Review — Intervention—Lack of Jurisdiction.

Where the court has no jurisdiction of a proceeding as to the purchase of public land referred to it by the surveyor general, under Pol. Code, § 3414, its order, denying a right of intervention, must be sustained on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3406.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by Mattie Y. Dollenmayer and another against John S. Pryor, James Cæsar praying to be allowed to intervene. From an order, denying such right of intervention, Cæsar appeals. Affirmed.

Robt. W. Miller, for appellant. Chas. G. Lamberson and H. P. Brown, for respondents. John S. Pryor, in pro. per.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by James Cæsar from an order of the superior court denying his application to be allowed to intervene in an action between Dollenmayer and Mellen as plaintiffs, and Pryor as defendant.

The action was a land contest begun in pursuance of an order of reference from the surveyor general, under section 3414 of the Political Code. Dollenmayer filed his application, on November 28, 1903, to purchase an entire section as land not suitable for cultivation. His application was approved May 18, 1904, and a certificate of purchase was issued to him on June 18, 1904, and was thereafter assigned to plaintiff Mellen. Afterward on July 26, 1905, Pryor filed a verified protest against the issuance of any further evidence of title under the Dollenmayer certificate, on the ground that the land was suitable for cultivation, that Dollenmayer was not a settler thereon, and that he did not make the application in good faith. Pryor demanded a trial in the courts. The order of reference was thereupon made on the day the protest was filed, and the action was begun September 24, 1905.

On August 10, 1905, after the order was made, but before suit was begun, Cæsar settled on the north half of the section, which was then unoccupied, and on August 14, 1905, offered to the surveyor general for filing, his application to purchase the same, including therein a protest against the Dollenmayer purchase on the ground that the land was suitable for cultivation and that Dollenmayer was not an actual settler, and demanded a trial in the courts. The surveyor general refused to receive or file the application on the ground that he had previously made an order of reference of the contest arising upon Pryor's protest. The complaint in intervention was presented, and leave asked to intervene, a few days after the action was begun. It alleged, in addition to a statement of Cæsar's rights, that Dollenmayer did not apply to purchase in good faith, but for the benefit of Mellen, to whom he had previously agreed to sell the land, that Pryor's protest was filed in collusion with Dollenmayer and Mellen, in pursuance of an agreement that Pryor should not appear in the action, and for the purpose of forestalling other applicants who might apply to purchase after the order of reference was made on the protest. The court refused to allow the complaint to be filed.

The respondent objects to the consideration of the appeal, contending that it is premature, and that the party asking to appeal from such an order must await final judgment between the original parties, and appeal from that judgment, or, at all events, must procure the entry of a more formal judgment denying his motion, and appeal after such entry. We can perceive no merit in this objection. The record shows that the order, or judgment, denying the application to intervene was entered before the appeal was taken. It clearly shows that the court had determined the right of the intervener and declared that Cæsar should not intervene in the action, and that his proposed complaint should not be filed therein. The most verbose statement could not state the determination more accurately or effectually. So far as the intervener and his rights in that action were concerned, it was final. We see no good end to be secured by requiring him to await judgment between the other parties, after a trial in which he could not participate. It ended the litigation as to him, and he should be allowed an immediate appeal. Stich v. Goldner, 38 Cal. 610; People v. Pfeiffer, 59 Cal. 90; Donner v. Palmer, 45 Cal. 180. Anything in Wenborn v. Boston, 23 Cal. 321, contrary to this rule, must be considered as overruled by these later decisions. Upon the merits of the appeal we are of the opinion that the action of the court below must be sustained, but for reasons different from those presented by respondent. It appears from the record that Pryor, upon whose protest the order of reference was made, did not therein claim to be a settler upon or occupant of the land, or any part thereof, that he made no application to purchase the same and did not claim any right, title, or interest therein. In the absence of statutory authority, one who does not himself claim a paramount title or right of possession to the land, or apply to purchase the same from the state, but merely protests against a proposed purchase by another, cannot, by such protest, initiate a contest before the surveyor general against the right of the other person to purchase. Such a person has no interest to protect and no right to interfere between the proposed purchaser and the state. A mere sentimental interest, or a general interest as a citizen in the protection of state property, or in the enforcement of the state policy of selling its arable land only to actual settlers and in limited quantities, or even the particular interest which a qualified person, privileged to purchase state lands and expecting at some future time to apply for the particular tract in question, but who is not a settler thereon, might have in preventing or delaying a prior applicant, would not be a sufficient interest to authorize such a contest. Such interests as these are not property rights. The party who raises such a contest must be one who has some proprietary interest or right of possession, an interest which he would be entitled to protect in some action or proceeding. There are some expressions in the opinion in Tyler v. Houghton, 25 Cal. 26; Higgins v. Houghton, 25 Cal. 259; Thompson v. True, 48 Cal. 606; Cadierque v. Duran, 49 Cal. 357, and Cunningham v. Crowley, 51 Cal. 131, which might seem to announce a rule contrary to this conclusion. But when considered in connection with the context and the facts of the respective cases, it will be seen that they simply lay down the rule that where one claims an interest or right of possession under the United States, or some right under the state law superior to that of the prior applicant, he may contest such proposed sale for the purpose of protecting his superior or paramount right, and that in such a case he may do so by filing a mere protest without himself applying to purchase the land from the state. The only case in which a different proposition from this could be claimed to have been asserted is the Higgins Case above cited. In that case, however, the protesting persons were said to be "dwellers" upon a mining claim upon which active mining operations were going on, and upon which a large amount of money had been expended, and although it did not appear that these parties themselves were personally asserting a claim to the mine, it was said that they had a sufficient interest to entitle them to raise the contest. This, however, was done upon the authority of Tyler v. Houghton, which decides nothing more than that one having a paramount title under the United States, may contest a purchase, proposed to be made from the state, without himself applying to purchase. The cases cannot be taken as a precedent for the right of Pryor, who had neither possession, interest, or claim, to inaugurate a contest before the surveyor general.

The result is that the surveyor general had no authority to entertain the protest of Pryor. There was, in fact, no contest in his office arising upon that protest and, hence, the order of reference was null and gave the superior court no jurisdiction of the action. Jurisdiction in such cases exists only by virtue of a lawful order of reference, issued upon a real contest, by a party whose protest shows himself entitled to oppose the purchase. Parties cannot give jurisdiction by filing a complaint in a case where there has been no valid order of reference, nor where a reference, has been made without there having been any contest to refer. The court below, therefore, had no jurisdiction of the action, no authority to render judgment of any force for or against either party, and its order denying the right to intervene must be sustained on the ground that it had no jurisdiction either of the action or the intervention. The intervener's attention is called to the amendment of 1899 (St. 1899, p. 182, c. 149) by which lands of this class, suitable for cultivation without reclamation, can be sold only to actual settlers in tracts of 160 acres.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

WATERS v. POOL et al. (Sac. 1,324.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 2, 1906.)

1. Public Lands—Swamp Lands—Sale by State—Affidavit of Purchase.

One seeking to purchase state swamp lands must aver in his affidavit that he does not know of any legal or equitable claim to the lands other than his own, as required by Act March 28. 1868 (St. 1867–68, p. 507, c. 415).

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Public Lands, §§ 199, 392.]

2. SAME.

Evidence in a suit to determine the rights to swamp lands examined, and held to warrant a finding that one who sought to purchase the lands truthfully averred in his affidavit, as required by Act March 28, 1868 (St. 1867–68, p. 507, c. 415), that he did not know of any claim to the lands other than his own, so that he and his successors in title acquired title thereto.

3. SAME—WAIVER OF PREFERENCE RIGHT OF PURCHASE.

In an action to determine rights to swamp lands, it appeared that the lands were segregated December, 1870, and that plaintiff had been in possession since 1863. In 1871 a survey was made at the instance of defendants' grantor, who made application to purchase the lands. Held, that plaintiff as actual settler had under the express provision of the act of 1870 (St. 1869–70, p. 878, c. 575), the preference right to purchase, which he lost by failing to make application therefor within 90 days after the filing of affidavits showing that the lands had been segregated, so that the lands could be sold to another.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Public Lands, §§ 200, 394.]

4. SAME—AFFIDAVIT OF PURCHASE.

A survey of swamp lands was made in 1871 at the instance of one who applied for the purchase thereof. The affidavit of purchase was in its essence true, but, after the survey was made, it was found that it conflicted with another survey previously made, and approval thereof was refused. Two years thereafter a new survey was made, removing the conflict, to which the original affidavit was attached. Payment was made and a certificate was issued. Held, that the affidavit must be treated as a new application made subsequent to the time of the rejection of the first survey, and must be tested as if made subsequent to that time.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by James Waters against D. C. Pool and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Hudson Grant, for appellants. R. Clark, L. Schillig, and G. Clark, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to determine the respective rights of plaintiff and defendants to certain swamp and overflowed land on reference by the surveyor general to the superior court of Sutter county. Plaintiff had judgment for the entire tract in controversy from which defendants appeal on bill of exceptions.

It appears that one Lars Johnson, on October 10, 1870, made affidavit before the county surveyor of Sutter county and filed the same with said surveyor, declaring his desire "to purchase, under the provisions of an act to provide for the sale of certain lands belonging to the state, approved March 28, 1868 (St. 1867–68, p. 507, c. 415), and the several acts mandatory thereof, and supplemental thereto a certain tract of swamp and overflowed land, lying and situate on the left bank of the Sacramento river, it being the fractional N. W. ¼ of section 19, township 11 N., range 3 E. * * * and that he does not know of any legal or equitable claim, other than his own to the said lands." The court found on sufficient evidence that on July 18, 1871, at the request of said Johnson, said county surveyor surveyed said land, platted the same and recorded said plat and filed notes of said survey in the records of swamp land surveys in his office and numbered said survey No. 609 of Sutter county; on July 21, 1871, a copy of Johnson's application of said survey was filed in the office of the surveyor general of the state, attached to a copy of Johnson's said affidavit; said plat, survey and field notes conflicted with the plat, survey and field notes of swamp land survey No. 548 of Sutter county, namely, the N. W. ¼ of the N. W. ¼ of said section applied for by one McGriff, and Johnson's survey was not then approved, but was subsequently by the surveyor general, returned to the county surveyor of Sutter county, who by his then deputy (formerly the county surveyor) altered and changed said plat and field notes so that the same were made a plat and field notes for a survey of the E. ½ and fractional S. W. ¼ of the fractional N. W. ¼ of said section 19, omitting the McGriff 40-acre tract, and thereafter the said plat and field notes so altered and attached to a copy of said affidavit of Johnson, were received by the surveyor general, who, on September 9, 1873, indorsed the same: "Approved Sept. 9th, 1873. Robert Gardner, Surveyor General;" that on October 20, 1873, said Johnson paid to the then county treasurer of said county, $24.56, being 20 per cent. of the price of the land embraced in said survey No. 609, and also paid interest on the unpaid balance for one year (it appears by the evidence, however, that interest was paid to September 9, 1876); on November 13, 1873, the register of the state land office issued and delivered to Johnson Certificate of Purchase No. 3,924 for the lands contained in said survey No. 609, as altered and changed, and no patent has ever been issued to Johnson or any other person for the lands in controversy.

It appears that plaintiff made application to purchase the land described in the Johnson certificate of purchase, on June 7, 1901, in which he made oath, among other things, that he "is and has been an actual settler and is now such actual settler on said lands, for upwards of 35 years; that during all said time he has actually resided on said lands with his wife and family or children; that he has improved the same by clearing about 25 acres and has at all times maintained his home on said lands since 1863; that there are adverse occupants of said land adverse to affiant (naming some of defendants), but they have been occupants of a portion of the land for more than 60 days since the plat of said lands was filed in the United States Land Office; that he knows the land applied for and its exterior boundaries and knows that there are settlers thereon other than himself, but the whole of said lands have been segregated for more than six months prior to making this application and filing this affidavit;" that said lands are suitable for cultivation and that affiant is an actual settler thereon. The court found the substantial averments of the affidavit to be true. The reference to the court was made July 11, 1901, and the complaint was filed September 7, 1901. The court found that the land was, on December 1, 1870, segregated by the United States, and that the plats showing the line of segregation were filed in the Marysville land office on that day and the land was listed to the state as swamp and overflowed land on April 11, 1871, and on August 30, 1871, was patented to the state and that said land was sectionized and the plats filed in the said land office prior to October 10, 1870. It was alleged in the complaint and found by the court that the Johnson affidavit was defective and void, in this, that the statement therein as follows: "He does not know of 'any legal or equitable claim other than his own to the said land' was, is and at all times has been wholly false"; that plaintiff was at the filing of said affidavit in possession and occupancy as his home of a certain portion of the land known as "The Island," situated in the southwesterly portion of the N. W. ¼ of said section and that plaintiff occupied and had cultivated about seven acres and had his dwelling on the southerly portion of "The Island" and had an equitable claim to said island under the act of April 4, 1870, supplemental to the act of March 28, 1868 (St. 1869–70, pp. 878–879, c. 575); and that said Johnson knew at the time he filed his said affidavits, of plaintiff's said possession and claim and knew that plaintiff had a preferred right to purchase said tract known as "The Island", on which plaintiff now resides and ever since 1856 has resided, using the same for farming purposes. It appeared that the island was at that date formed by the river surrounding it. Johnson died in 1880, after having conveyed his claim to an interest in said land and his certificate of purchase, and one Griggs and one Hawk as tenants in common succeeded to Johnson's rights through whom defendants claim by mesne conveyances. The evidence was that Johnson lived on the portion across the river east of the island and was farming the land, as did his successors also, and the relations of plaintiff to these people and the situation of the land leaves no doubt that plaintiff knew of the occupancy by Johnson, and defendants after him, of the lands not in his own possession. The court found that plaintiff was not a trespasser upon any part of the lands and that, at the time of his application in 1901, he "was an actual settler upon and claimed the whole of the land applied for and since said application has resided upon and claimed the whole of said lands applied for, and that plaintiff in good faith sought to purchase the lands described in his said affidavit, that he had substantial improvements upon said lands * * * and made said application to said lands in good faith." The court did not find directly on the issues as to the alleged knowledge of plaintiff, when he filed his application, that he, plaintiff, knew of Johnson's prior application and knew that defendants were in good faith claiming the lands as successors of Johnson. The evidence showed that plaintiff must have known that defendants as successors of Johnson were claiming the lands now occupied by the plaintiff, namely, the lands not embraced in the island tract and plaintiff's application states that there were other occupants of the land beside himself.

The court found that the land had been segregated at the time alleged in the answer, to wit, December 1, 1870, and that the approval of Johnson's said application by the surveyor general and the issuance of said certificate of purchase to Johnson were in fact not done, given or made within six months after the lands were so segregated. But the court found "that it is not true that plaintiff has lost his right to purchase said lands by any laches or by reason of not having made application to purchase the same from the state within 90 days of the filing of the said plats in the Marysville land office, showing the said line of segregation." As conclusions of law the court found that the Johnson application and the approval thereof were void, and that the certificate issued to Johnson be annulled, and that plaintiff's application be approved and he be permitted to purchase the lands described therein, and judgment passed for plaintiff in accordance therewith.

The statutes in force when Johnson made his application were the act of March 28, 1868 (St. 1867–68, p. 507, c. 415, pt. 2, §§ 28, 29, p. 514) and the act of April 4, 1870, supplementary thereto (St. 1869–70, p. 878, c. 575). The act of 1868 required the person making application to purchase swamp and overflowed land to state in an affidavit among other things, "that he does not know of any legal or equitable claim to said lands other than his own; * * * which application and affdavit shall be filed in the office of the surveyor of the country in which said lands * * * are situate, who shall make survey of the land as required by section 18 of the act." The act of 1870 provides that "all settlers upon swamp and overflowed lands belonging to the state, whose settlement is evidenced by actual inclosure, or by ditches, plow furrows, or monuments, showing clearly the metes and bounds of their possessory claim, and the same are occupied for purposes of tillage or grazing, are hereby recognized as possessing an equitable claim to the land so inclosed or occupied by them, within the true intent and meaning of the act to which this is supplementary; and are declared preferred purchasers for such lands to the extent of such inclosure or occupancy." It is made the duty of the county surveyor to return surveys of such settlers to connect with the United States surveys. The act also provides that "the Surveyor General of the state shall not approve, nor the register of the state land office issue, title for any swamp and overflowed land, until six months after the same shall have been segregated by authority of the United States or of the state by legislative enactment; and for ninety days after the filing of plats showing said line of segregation in the United States Land Office for the district in which the land is situate, the settlers possessing equitable claims under section one of this act shall be deemed preferred purchasers and shall file their applications for surveys of their possessory claim with the county surveyor * * * within ninety days."

It is well settled that in the purchase of state lands the requisites of the statute must be stated in the affidavit and must be true, and that the hearing of a contest as to such lands must be shown to be true, or no right to the land can be awarded by the court. McKenzie v. Brandon, 71 Cal. 209, 12 Pac. 428; Harbin v. Burghart, 76 Cal. 119, 18 Pac. 127; Davidson v. Cucamonga Fruit Co., 78 Cal. 4, 20 Pac. 152, and many other cases. At no time have defendants been entitled to patent, not having paid the purchase money and interest. The legal title to the land has at all times been and now is in the state. If Johnson acquired no right to any part of the land under his certificate of purchase the land was open to location in 1901, when plaintiff made application to purchase. Johnson's successors in interest stood in his shoes and occupied no better or different relation to the land or to the state than did Johnson. When this cause was submitted for decision to the appellate court of the third appellate district Justice McLaughlin delivered the following opinion: "On October 10, 1870, nearly two months prior to the segregation of the land in controversy by the United States government, the predecessor in interest of the defendants made an affidavit stating his desire to purchase lands lying on the left bank of the Sacramento river, and being the fractional N. W. ¼ of section 19. This affidavit also contained the statement that he did not know of any legal or equitable claim to the land other than his own. The land was segregated from the public domain of the United States on December 1, 1870, and at that time the plaintiff was occupying an island which was entirely surrounded by the waters of the Sacramento river. The island was originally a peninsula connected with the main land by a narrow strip or neck of land, but the river cut through this neck a few years prior to plaintiff's entry upon the land. The exact date of this severance does not definitely appear, but I regard this as unimportant, in view of the uncontradicted testimony of the plaintiff to the effect that 'The old river channel is deep and has always run all the way around the island.' Transcript, fol. 167. This testimony was designed to show that the land was so surrounded that an actual inclosure was unnecessary, but to my mind it convincingly demonstrates that Johnson, the mesne grantor of defendants not only intended to but that he did actually state the truth when he expressed his desire to purchase land on the left bank of the river, and stated that he knew of no legal or equitable claim thereto other than his own. The main, central, controlling description of the land affiant had in mind when making his application and oath, and which he expressed a desire to purchase, was 'a certain tract of swamp and overflowed land on the left bank of the Sacramento river.' The subsidiary description 'it being the fractional N. W. ¼ of section 19' should not be given undue weight. Testing the truth of the statements made by the affiant 36 years ago, by the then existing conditions, it may reasonably be assumed that he knew little, if anything about government subdivisions or the line of public surveys, but he did know of that island in the river which could not be said to be on either bank thereof. In order to convict this affiant —long since dead—of an untruth, we must not only disregard the general description in the affidavit, but must also place a technical meaning on the word 'fractional' as used in the subsidiary description. Thirty-six years have elapsed since the affidavit was made; the affiant's lips cannot speak his defense or explanation of the statements made; the land has passed through mesne conveyances to others; the plaintiff has slept for many years on rights he now asserts, and if there ever could be a case where rules of construction should be invoked in favor of innocence of untruth or crime, or wrong, it is this. And it seems to me that the affidavit is reasonably susceptible of an interpretation which would acquit the affiant of perjury and relieve his successors from the results flowing from a contrary construction.

"But conceding that the statements in the affidavit were false, when it was made, there are cogent reasons for measuring their truth or falsity by conditions existing when it was used as the basis for the claim of title upon which appellants rely. Admitting that the plaintiff had a legal or equitable claim as a preferred purchaser to the land occupied by him, when the affidavit was made and the land was segregated, such claim was forfeited before any action was had upon the false affidavit. The land was segregated on December 1, 1870, and the plaintiff was by law given 90 days from that date to make his application. After March 1, 1871, he could assert no lawful or superior right to this land as against any applicant having the necessary qualifications. On June 1st, 1871, the Surveyor General could approve any survey and issue evidence of title thereto to any person applying to purchase the same. It results, that when the survey was made at Johnson's instance, on July 18, 1871, the plaintiff had, by lack of diligence in the assertion of rights reserved to him for a limited period, lost his claim or right to preference, and any person could then assert that he had no preferred legal or equitable claim to the land he occupied. On that date it might be said that he had no legal or equitable claim to such land. On July 21, 1871, when the survey made at Johnson's request was received at the state land office, the affidavit to which such survey was attached was in its essence true. But at that time, the survey was found to conflict with another survey made by the same official, and approval was refused and the papers were returned. This was, to all intents and purposes, the end of the matter, and the finale of all proceedings initiated by the affidavit. Strictly speaking, and the plaintiff invokes and relies upon strict construction of rules and papers, Johnson's application had failed, and proven abortive, and he, too, had lost his preferential rights. In strictness, a new application and survey were necessary. Matters were allowed to rest as they were when the papers were returned, for more than two years. The approval of a new survey on September 9, 1873, shows that during this time no application for purchase or survey of this land was made by any person. On that date a new survey attached to the old affidavit was filed by Johnson, and approved. Payment was made and a certificate was issued. Had Johnson made another affidavit as of any date subsequent to July 21, 1871, and attached it to the new survey, there could hardly be a question touching the validity of the title evidenced by the certificate of purchase. But, unfortunately, the old affidavit was used in making the second application, and the question arises whether the mere use of the old instead of a new certificate, will destroy the effect of the certificate. In my opinion, the truth of the statements in the affidavit accompanying the record survey, upon which the certificate rests, must be tested by the conditions existing after the rejection of the first application and survey. In other words, the affidavit which was used on both applications, must be treated as a new application made subsequent to the time of such rejection. It should be measured by the same standard, and tested in the same crucible as if it was an entirely new affidavit bearing date subsequent to July 21, 1871. In fact it must be viewed as having been made on September 9, 1873, when the Surveyor General sealed it with his approval, notwithstanding his knowledge of the original conflict with the McGriff survey and application. It was so treated and tested by the Surveyor General, and I cannot see why this or any court should adopt another rule of interpretation, harsh in its rigidity, and unjust and inequitable in its effect on the rights of persons who were lulled into fancied security by the muniment of title granted by an agent of the state. I am aware that equitable considerations cannot be invoked to avoid the consequences of willful perjury committed by an applicant to purchase state lands. I am fully cognizant of rules which place subsequent purchasers in the shoes of the applicant with no greater modicum of equitable or legal rights than he possessed. But the law 'respects form less than substance,' and, in my opinion, it is only by a rigid adherence to form, and by making all subsequent proceedings relate back to the time the affidavit was made, that the plaintiff, who slept the sleep of indifference, carelessness, and negligence for 30 years, can now be permitted to take not only what he then claimed, but also that which Johnson admittedly possessed and which others have innocently acquired. The conduct of Johnson in failing to make any claim to the island or any effort to oust Waters from his island home may have induced the latter's slumbers, but such conduct most eloquently attests that Johnson meant to tell the truth in 1870 and in 1873 and his constant belief that he had done so. The penalties of perjury are entailed only by those who intentionally swear to an untruth, and the circumstances of this case would certainly acquit Johnson of intentional wrong. The earmarks of fraud are evidenced by acts indicating a willful intent to profit by its perpetration. Looking at the substance of things, and brushing aside all films and cobwebs of technical construction, the conduct of the affiant clearly demonstrates that he neither intended to defraud the state or deprive the plaintiff of his land. If he ever entertained such intention his conduct was incomprehensible, for, during the subsequent years of his life he made no attempt to profit by his fraud or reap the reward of his perjury. Under these conditions it is indeed a harsh construction which results in reproach to his memory and spoliation to his successors. In my opinion such construction is unnecessary, and the more charitable and equitable interpretation is most reasonable, and hence I am firmly convinced that rules of law as well as considerations of justice demand the reversal of the judgment."

We are of opinion that the construction which is thus placed upon the Johnson certificate is as reasonable as it certainly is equitable. It leaves to plaintiffs and defendants their possessory rights to the lands which they were actually occupying. For which reason the foregoing opinion is adopted and approved as the opinion of this court, and the judgment appealed from is reversed.

BUNDY v. SIERRA LUMBER CO.

(Sac. 1,274.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 1, 1906.)

1. APPEAL—VERDICT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A verdict on conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal.

2. SAME — ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE — OBJECTIONS—CHANGING GROUND.

A party objecting to the testimony of a witness on the ground that it was immaterial, incompetent, and irrelevant, cannot on appeal urge that the subject to which the testimony related was not a subject for expert testimony, and that the witness had not qualified as an expert.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, § 1430.]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

An employé suing for injuries received, while operating a train over a trestle, in consequence of the fall of the trestle, who alleges as a ground of recovery that the employer negligently permitted the trestle to become defective, must show that the employer had knowledge of the defective condition, or could, by reasonable inspection, have discovered it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 243–251.]

4. EVIDENCE — DECLARATIONS OF EMPLOYÉ—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where, in an action for injuries received by an employé in consequence of the fall of a trestle while running a train over it, a right of recovery was based on the employer's negligence in permitting the trestle to become defective, it was shown that it was the duty of the section foreman to look after the trestle and require a trestleman to repair it, evidence that the foreman, a short time before the accident, requested a third person to tell the trestleman to go to work on the trestle and repair it, that the trestle was going down and that it was in bad shape, was admissible as showing knowledge on the part of the employer that the trestle was defective.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 887, 898.]

5. SAME—RES GESTÆ—DECLARATIONS OF EMPLOYÉ.

The declaration of the foreman, being illustrative of his act in sending notice to the trestleman to repair the trestle, was admissible as a part of the res gestæ.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 297, 308, 331.]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO SERVANT — NEGLIGENCE — EVIDENCE — ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action for injuries to an employé in consequence of the fall of a trestle while running a train over it, evidence that an expert trestle builder had, prior to the accident, called the attention of the manager of the road to defects in the trestles on the road, and to the trestle that fell, was admissible as bearing on the question of the negligence of the employer in failing to obviate the defect.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 923.]

7. EVIDENCE — SUBJECTS OF EXPERT TESTIMONY—CONSTRUCTION OF RAILROAD TRESTLES.

An expert trestle and bridge builder is competent to testify as to how a trestle in a logging railroad should be constructed, considering the purposes for which it was intended to be used.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 2349–2352.]

8. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

That an employé, injured by the fall of a trestle while operating a train over it, sought to recover on the theory, either that the trestle was not properly constructed originally, or that it had been suffered to go to decay, did not preclude proof as to how the trestle in its entirety, including guard rails, should have been properly constructed, it appearing that the guard rails, though primarily intended to prevent derailment, strengthened the trestle.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 920, 921.]

9. EVIDENCE—EXPERT TESTIMONY.

An expert railroad trestle and bridge builder may testify that trains running over a trestle have a tendency, in consequence of the vibration caused thereby, to loosen spikes driven in the bracing, and thus shake loose the bracing itself.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 2356.]

10. SAME.

An expert railroad trestle and bridge builder may testify that a trestle is more securely constructed by the use of bolts through the bracing rather than by the use of spikes.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20. Evidence, §§ 2349–2352.]

11. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action for injuries to an employé while running a logging train over a trestle in a logging road in consequence of the fall of the trestle, the court properly sustained objections to questions on cross-examination asked an expert trestle builder as to whether the trestle, as he had testified it should have been constructed, would bring absolute safety to the employés of the road, and whether it would be sufficiently safe for a passenger train to run over, the question being simply whether the trestle as constructed or maintained by the employer was a reasonably safe one for the uses to which it was subjected.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 172, 865, 872.]

12. APPEAL—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

The error, if any, in sustaining objections to questions asked a witness is harmless where the witness has fully testified on the subject.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4194–4199.]

13. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO SERVANT — CARE REQUIRED OF EMPLOYER — INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action for injuries to an employé while operating a logging train over a logging road in consequence of the fall of the trestle therein, the court gave as requested a part of an instruction correctly stating the rule as to the degree of care necessary to be exercised by the employer in constructing and maintaining the trestle, it was not error to refuse the other part of the instruction asserting that the employer was not required to use the degree of care in the construction of a trestle that would be required of a railroad company in the performance of its duty toward passengers.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 1148–1161.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by George Bundy against the Sierra Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Morrison & Cope, C. H. Wilson, and A. M. McCoy, for appellant. J. T. Matlock and W. P. Johnson, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This action is brought by plaintiff to recover damages for personal injuries sustained in the discharge of his duty while in the employment of defendant. Plaintiff on September 23, 1901, was an engineer engaged in operating a "logging train" over the railroad of defendant in hauling logs from Beale Camp to its mill at Lyonsville, a distance of about 15 miles. The railroad of defendant between these points crossed a high trestle known as the "Big Wible Trestle," which, while the plaintiff was passing over it, on the date mentioned, with a logging train, went down with the engine and cars, and plaintiff was severely injured. The complaint alleged that the fall of the trestle was occasioned through defects in the construction, care, and preservation of said trestle, and through the negligence of defendant in allowing the timbers of which said trestle was constructed to become worn, rotten, and decayed, and, without any fault of plaintiff, the said trestle gave way and the said track, locomotive, and train were precipitated to the ground below and demolished. The case was tried by a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $2,500. Defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is taken from such order of denial.

As grounds for a reversal, it is urged that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, and that certain errors were committed by the court during the trial.

The claim that the evidence was insufficient is untenable. The evidence in the case was mainly directed on both sides to showing the character of the trestle as originally constructed, and the condition it was in at the time it fell. The evidence upon the subject, it may be said, was conflicting, but in this conflict there certainly was sufficient evidence produced by plaintiff to warrant the jury in finding, not only that the trestle was defectively constructed originally, but also to warrant a finding that at the time it fell—some 12 years after its construction—its timbers had become rotten, loose, and insecure to such an extent as to render the trestle unfited for the purpose for which it was constructed and was being used. And, the evidence being so conflicting, the finding of the jury under the conflict is conclusive, and not subject to review here.

Now, as to the errors of law complained of which we deem merit consideration.

Richard Gernon, a surveyor and civil engineer, skilled in bridge and trestle building, was called as a witness for plaintiff, and testified, both from observation and as an expert, to the manner in which the trestle in question was originally constructed, the defects in such construction, and how it should have been reconstructed to have been reasonably safe for the purposes for which it was designed. During his direct examination he testified as to the kind of stringers used, the manner in which they were placed on the trestle, and their effect, and was then asked: "Q. And you knew the manner that the stringers were placed upon the trestle? A. I did. Q. Now I ask you whether that was the safe way for the construction of a trestle or bridge of that kind, considering the purpose for which it was used?" to which the witness responded in the negative. To the latter inquiry defendant interposed an objection on the ground that it was "immaterial, incompetent, and irrelevant," which being overruled he excepted, and now claims that the court erred in its ruling.

In this court he insists that the objection should have been sustained for two reasons: First, because the matter was not a subject for expert testimony; and secondly, because, if it was, the witness had not qualified as an expert. There is no merit whatever in the second ground of objection. The evidence shows beyond question that the witness qualified as an expert. But, even if it did not, we think, under the general objection made by appellant, it cannot now, for the first time in this court, on account of both or either of the specific reasons, or particular ground of objection that it urges here, but which it did not directly present to the lower court, be heard to question the accuracy of the ruling. Without passing on the point whether or not the matter involved in the question was the subject of expert testimony, we do not think that, under the general objection presented, the appellant can now specifically raise it on this appeal. If the objection was intended to raise that question, it should have been directly made. Certainly it was proper for the plaintiff to prove that the stringers, as placed upon the trestle, and their number, were insufficient to render it a safe structure. If the method adopted to do so was not proper it should have been directly pointed out in the objection. To require this is simply a matter of fairness and justice in order that cases may be tried on their merits. Had attention been called directly in the court below to the particular objection which it is now claimed the general objection of appellant presented, that court would have had a concrete legal proposition to pass on, and counsel for plaintiff would have been advised directly what the particular complaint against the question was, and, if he deemed it tenable, could have withdrawn the inquiry, or reframed his question to obviate the particular objection. Trial judges are not supposed to have the numerous, varied, and complex rules governing the admissibility of evidence so completely in mind and of such ready application, that, under an omnivagant objection to a question, they can apply with legal accuracy some particular principle of law, which the objection does not specifically present. Counsel for appellant could just as readily have directly presented to the lower court the particular objections which he urges now, instead of objecting generally, and we think that, in order to support any complaint on this appeal relative to the ruling, he should have done so. As was said by the Supreme Court of Arizona in Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 124, 25 Pac. 816. and quoted approvingly by this court in Crocker v. Carpenter, 98 Cal. 418, 33 Pac. 271: "The object of requiring the grounds of objection to be stated, which may seem to be a technical rule, is really to avoid technicalities and prevent delay in the administration of justice. When evidence is offered to which there is some objection, substantial justice requires that the objection be specified so that the party offering the evidence can remove it, if possible, and let the case be tried on its merits."

It is further insisted that the court erred in admitting in evidence, over defendant's objection, the testimony of the witness Homer Harvey, as to a conversation had with him by James Lucas relative to the condition of the Big Wible trestle. Harvey was a brakeman in the employ of defendant, assisting in operating its logging trains over this trestle. James Lucas was one of the section foremen in the service of defendant. The evidence shows that it was the duty of Lucas to look in general after that part of defendant's road embracing the Big Wible trestle. He was to look after the groundwork entirely and report anything that was necessary in the way of repairs, or to see that the matter was repaired, and as to trestles, if there was one that needed fixing or repairing, it was his duty to tell the trestleman to repair it. Now, as to the conversation in question. Harvey testified that he had seen Mr. Lucas a short time before the accident, and then proceeded: "Well, I was sitting in front of my house one evening, and Mr. Lucas had been out to feed his horse, I think, and he stopped there and said: 'I wish you would tell Paul to go over and get to work on Big Wible trestle.' He says, 'That trestle is going down and will kill the whole outfit of you.' He says, 'It is in bad shape.' This was some time before the accident. I don't remember just how long. Three weeks or a month. No repairs were made to my knowledge on that trestle after that time before the accident. * * * He [Lucas] didn't speak any more as to that one trestle. I saw Mr. Paul and gave him the message. I don't remember whether it was the next day; it was in a day or two." This conversation was admitted over a general objection of appellant, and the particular objection that the defendant could not be bound by any statements which Mr. Lucas might have made. The Mr. Paul referred to in the conversation was in the employment of defendant as foreman, having in charge a crew of men engaged in the work of repairing the trestles on defendant's road.

We perceive no error in the admission of this testimony. As one of the grounds upon which plaintiff based his right of recovery was that the defendant had negligently permitted the trestle to become defective, it was incumbent on him to show that the defendant had knowledge of such defective condition, or that, by a reasonable inspection, it could have been discovered. Brymer v. Southern Pacific Co., 90 Cal. 496, 27 Pac. 371; Sappenfield v. Main St., etc., Co., 91 Cal. 48, 27 Pac. 590. It was the duty of Lucas to examine that portion of the groundwork and the general condition of the Big Wible trestle. He was the agent of the company for that purpose. It was his duty to ascertain whether repairs were necessary, and to inform the other agent of the company—the foreman of the trestle-repairing crew—of their existence so that the repairs might be made. His conversation with Harvey was in the line of a proper performance of his duty. He sent him to inform Paul, the trestle repairer, that the trestle was in bad condition and to make the necessary repairs. As tending itself to show that the defendant had knowledge through its agents of the defects in the trestle, this evidence was relative. Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269, 29 Pac. 481, 18 L. R. A. 124; Elledge v. Railway Co., 100 Cal. 282, 34 Pac. 720, 38 Am. St. Rep. 290. As to the language used by Lucas, it was illustrative of his act in sending notice to the trestle repairer; it was used in the discharge of his duty to the company and was part of the res gestæ—a declaration made dum fervet opus. It was certainly admissible to prove generally that Lucas notified Paul, the trestle foreman, that the trestle was in a defective condition, and when what he did in that regard is admissible, it is equally competent to prove what was said by him about these defects while he was doing so. It was a declaration made during the continuance of the agency in regard to a matter concerning which it was the duty of the agent to act, and as part of the res gestæ was admissible. Beasley v. San José Fruit Packing Co., 92 Cal. 392, 28 Pac. 485; Birch v. Hale, 99 Cal. 301, 33 Pac. 1088; Silveira v. Iversen, 128 Cal. 187, 60 Pac. 687; Krogg v. Atlanta, etc., Co., 77 Ga. 202, 4 Am. St. Rep. 79. The cases cited by appellant against the admission of the declarations of Lucas are not in point. They apply to declarations of an agent made after the accident—declarations which are not part of the res gestæ, and which are universally held to be inadmissible. The distinction between these cases and the case at bar is that in this case the declarations were not made subsequent to the accident, but prior to and relative to a matter concerning which the agent was acting within the scope of his employment; a matter depending at the very time and arising from his duty under the agency, to examine the trestle for the purpose of discovering the defects, and to notify the trestle foreman of them and of the immediate necessity for repair.

In connection with the alleged inadmissibility of the conversation between Harvey and Lucas may be considered the further claim made by defendant that it was improper for the court to permit the witness Richard Gernon, heretofore referred to, to testify that he had, prior to the accident, called the attention of J. C. Turner, manager of defendant's road, to certain defects in the trestles and bridges on that road. This defect was with reference to the system of stringers used. This evidence was, we think, admissible as showing that the attention of the defendant, prior to the accident, had been called to what was claimed to be a defect in the original construction, as bearing on the question of negligence in failing to obviate the defect. It is true that the inquiry, in as far as it applied generally to the trestles and bridges on the defendant's road, was too broad. Defendant, however, did not object on that account. If, in fact, the particular defect as to these stringers was common to all the trestles on the road, no harm resulted to the defendant from the admission of the evidence as to them in the aggregate, because it is quite apparent from the testimony of Gernon, given prior and subsequent to the evidence objected to, that he had in mind, and was applying his testimony particularly to, the defects existing in his judgment in the Big Wible trestle. This same witness Gernon, as an expert trestle and bridge builder, testified for plaintiff as to how the Big Wible trestle should have been constructed, considering the purposes for which it was intended to be used. He went into details as to these matters, and testified, among other things, that there should have been additional and perpendicular posts inside the bents of the trestle as originally constructed, and also that the caps should have been longer, and should have had pieces of timber firmly bolted on them so as to hold the cars or train from going over the trestle in case of derailment. Defendant objected to this evidence, but we think it was admissible. In fact we can see no pertinent objection to it. This witness was testifying as to how the trestle should have been properly constructed, and if, in a proper construction, for the purpose intended, it should have had these bents, caps, and bolted timbers, it was proper to show it. It is claimed that the question of guard rails and derailment of the logging train was not involved in the case; that the plaintiff's right of recovery proceeded upon the theory, either that the trestle was not properly constructed originally, or that it had been suffered to go to decay, and that the plaintiff's injury occurred through the fault of the trestle for either or both of those reasons. This is true, but did not preclude proof as to how the trestle in its entirety should have been properly constructed, and it is further apparent from the testimony that, while these guard rails were primarily to prevent derailment, they tended also to strengthen the trestle.

This witness also testified, over defendant's objection, as to the effect that running trains over the trestle would have upon the diagonal timbers used in its construction; that the jar of the train in running over them—the vibration—would have a tendency to loosen the nails or spikes driven in the bracing, and thus shake loose the bracing itself; that, instead of nailing these timbers, they and all parts of the trestle should have been fastened with bolts. There was nothing improper in admitting this testimony. It is not such a matter of common knowledge whether vibration occasioned by the passing of a logging train over a trestle will or will not loosen spikes in its timbers that the testimony of one conversant with such matters from experience is inadmissible. Neither is it a matter of such common knowledge that a trestle is more securely constructed, for the purpose the one in question here was built, by the use of bolts rather than of nails or spikes. Hence it was entirely proper to admit the evidence of the witness on both matters, as a proper subject for expert testimony.

The appellant further complains because the court sustained objections of the plaintiff to interrogatories made by defendant's counsel of the witness Gernon on cross-examintain as to whether the trestle, as he testified it should have been constructed, would "bring absolute safety to the employés of the road," and whether it would "be sufficiently safe for a passenger train to run over." The objection was properly sustained. It was not a question in the case whether "absolute safety" would be secured, or whether a passenger train could safely be operated on the trestle in question, but simply whether the trestle as constructed or maintained by defendant was a reasonably safe trestle for the uses to which is was subjected. Aside from this, it is apparent, from the narrative of the testimony of this witness in the record, that, prior to the particular inquiries complained of here, appellant had endeavored to show by the witness that, in describing how the Big Wible trestle should have been built, he had in contemplation a stronger one than the logging purposes of defendant required, because, in response to an inquiry on cross-examination in that direction, the witness had answered: "I mean to say that it is necessary to have a trestle constructed in the way I have described in order with reasonable safety to carry such loads as they were accustomed to carry over those trestles." Hence, assuming that the questions objected to were permissible, the witness having already been examined by appellant, and having testified on the subject, no harm was committed in precluding further inquiry.

Complaint is made because the court modified one of the instructions asked on behalf of the defendant. The modification consisted in striking out the first sentence thereof, as follows: "The defendant was not required to use the degree of care in the construction of this trestle in satisfying the demands of the law as to its duty towards its employé, as would be required of a railroad company in the performance of its duty towards passengers upon its trains." The court gave the rest of the instruction which correctly stated the rule of law as to the degree of care necessary to be exercised by the defendant in constructing and maintaining the trestle in question for the purpose for which it was actually intended and used. We perceive no error committed by the court in modifying the instruction. Counsel for appellant insists that the instruction as tendered was in the language of this court as expressed in Dolan v. Sierra Ry. Co., 135 Cal. 436, 67 Pac. 686. This is true, but for that reason it was not error to refuse it. It does not follow, because a trial court does not give an instruction in the language employed by an appellate court in reasoning out a proposition of law or elaborating upon it, that error is thus committed. The most that the trial court is required to do is to give instructions which will embody clearly the principles of law under which the jury is to apply the evidence in the case before them. There was nothing in the case at bar involving any question of the degree of care due from a railroad company in relation to its passengers. The question actually before the jury was whether the defendant performed its duty by the exercise of ordinary care in the construction and maintenance of this trestle for the purpose for which its servant (the plaintiff) was required to use it. The trial court in several instructions clearly instructed the jury on that point, which was all it was required to do, or to which either of the parties was entitled. Some other points are presented on this appeal, but we do not think they merit particular discussion.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

SCHINDLER v. GREEN et al. (Sac. 1,260.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 1, 1906.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—RIGHT TO LIEN—PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT—SUBSTANTIAL PERFORMANCE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, in relation to mechanics' liens, provides that any trivial imperfection in the work shall not prevent a lien. The contract for the making of an addition to a house contained no plans or specifications where windows were to be placed, and the contractor placed two windows in the basement, so that they were not directly under windows in the first story of the house, and the contractor testified in an action to enforce a mechanic's lien that he placed the windows in such a manner in order to give the largest amount of furniture room in the basement, and that no request was made to him to have the windows changed until after the plastering had been put on around them, when he refused unless he should be paid additional for it, whereupon defendant made the change. The cost of placing the windows in alignment was $7.50. Held, that the facts warranted a finding that the contractor acted in good faith, and that the failure to place the windows in alignment was a trivial imperfection.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter F. Shields, Judge.

Action by C. Schindler against Thomas Green and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John D. Moynahan and Hinkson & Elliott (C. A. Elliott, of counsel), for appellants. R. Platnauer, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This action is brought by an original contractor against defendants as owners of a lot in the city of Sacramento, to foreclose a mechanic's lien: A written contract was made by plaintiff with Annie and Maggie Green, daughters of defendants in the action, who lived on the premises with their parents, said defendants, to do the carpenter work in making alterations and adding two rooms to the house in which defendants lived. The plastering of the rooms was to be done by another person under a separate contract, with which plaintiff had nothing to do. There were no regular plans or specifications as to where the doors or windows in the rooms should be placed, the contract providing generally that there should be not to exceed six doors and not to exceed ten windows, and that the new addition should be built uniformly. The contract price was $403.50 for all materials and carpenter work, of which plaintiff was paid $100 during the progress of the work. Defendants refusing payment after the plaintiff claimed his contract was completed, the latter filed a lien on the premises and in due time brought this action to foreclose it in the amount of $326.50; the $23.00, over the unpaid contract price of $303.50, being claimed for extra work and material furnished beyond that provided for in the written contract. At the trial plaintiff had judgment as prayed for and this appeal is taken by defendants from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

There are many specifications of error in the transcript relative to the admission of evidence. We have given all of them careful consideration, and do not think any of them are well taken, or that particular reference to them is required. Aside from such alleged errors, the main point made by appellants for a reversal is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a finding of the lower court relative to two windows placed in the basement story of the house as built by plaintiff and the effect of such finding. The court found as to the windows: "That the two windows placed by plaintiff in the front portion of the basement story of said house were not directly beneath the two front windows of the upper portion of said house, which upper portion consisted of the old house after the same had been raised, and that the placing of such windows in this manner was not workmanlike; and the court finds that the failure of plaintiff to place said windows in the basement in a direct line underneath the two windows of the upper portion of said house is a trivial imperfection." The only complaint made relative to the two windows so referred to was that they were not in alignment with the two front windows in the upper story. No other defect relative to them was complained of. This was what the lower court found to be a trivial imperfection, and relative to it further found that after the work had been completed by plaintiff defendants caused the position of said two front windows to be changed, and had said windows placed directly underneath the two windows in the upper portion of said house for which they paid the sum of $7.50, which the court finds was a reasonable amount to allow the defendants for making such change and which it deducted from the amount for which the plaintiff sued. It is insisted by appellants that the evidence does not support that portion of the finding that the failure of plaintiff to place said windows in a direct line with the windows in the upper portion of the house was a trivial imperfection. We do not think this point is well taken. In the last clause of section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is provided that any trivial imperfection in the work shall not prevent a lien. Whether an imperfection in the work for which a lien is sought is a trivial one or not is to be determined from the facts and circumstances of each particular case. No fixed or inflexible rule upon the point can be laid down. Upon this subject it is said in Bianchi v. Hughes, 124 Cal. 27, 56 Pac. 610: "'Trivial imperfection,' as used in the Code, relates to the question whether or not there has been an actual completion of the building. Marble Lime Co. v. Lordsburg Hotel Co., 96 Cal. 332, 31 Pac. 164. 'What constitutes a "trivial imperfection" is a question of fact in each instance' (Willamette, etc., Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., 94 Cal. 229, 29 Pac. 629); and the decision of the trial court thereon cannot be disregarded, unless the party complaining makes it clearly appear to be without any evidence in its support. Harlan v. Stufflebeem, 87 Cal. 508, 25 Pac. 686. The 'trivial imperfections' mentioned in the above section (section 1187, Code Civ. Proc.) refer to imperfect or defective performance of the work upon a building which is claimed to have been completed, and not to a case in which the building is admittedly uncompleted, and workmen are still engaged in constructing substantial portions thereof." See Santa Monica, etc., Co. v. Hege, 119 Cal. 376, 51 Pac. 555. And in Harlan v. Stufflebeem, 87 Cal. 511, 25 Pac. 687: "The performance of a contract need not in all cases be literal and exact, in order to entitle a party to compensation therefor. Especially is this the rule in contracts for labor by mechanics or artisans, where the quality of the work done, or the manner of its performance, is the sole matter in dispute, and is to be decided upon conflicting testimony. In contracts for the construction or repair of buildings, a substantial performance of his contract is sufficient to entitle the contractor to compensation for the work done by him under the contract. If there has been no willful departure from its provisions, and no omission of any of its essential parts, and the contractor has in good faith performed all of its substantive terms, he will not be held to have forfeited his right to a recovery by reason of trivial defects or imperfections in the work performed. If the omission or imperfection is so slight that it cannot be regarded as an integral or substantive part of the original contract, and the other party can be compensated therefor by a recoupment for damages, the contractor does not lose his right of action. * * * Whether the contract has been substantially performed is a question of fact, which must be determined by the trial court in each instance from the facts and circumstances in that case, and the finding of the trial court upon that point is as conclusive as is its finding of any other fact."

Now applying these rules to the matter under review: It is not contended that the plaintiff omitted to put in any windows, which he agreed to place in the basement story, but only that they were placed some inches out of alignment with the windows in the upper story. The court found that this was unworkmanlike. This, however, was not a finding that the plaintiff had failed to substantially perform his contract, but only that the manner of its performance was not workmanlike, with the additional finding, bearing upon such defective alignment of the windows, that it constituted but a trivial imperfection. And the facts and circumstances in the case warranted the court in so finding, as was the court also warranted in finding (as is implied in the finding that the imperfection was trivial) that in placing the windows where he did plaintiff acted in good faith with the intention of complying fully with his contract. As we have said, there were no plans or specifications showing where the windows were to be placed, and as testified to by Devine (who drew the contract and was acting as agent for the Green sisters in supervising the building) the plaintiff had to use his best judgment in the construction of the house, and plaintiff testified that in his opinion the placing of the windows was workmanlike, and that he placed them, though not in alignment, so as to give the most furniture space in the room; that he understood when placing them there that he was following directions given him by Devine and Maggie Green; that during the progress of the work on the house Devine and Maggie Green, who lived in the house with her parents, were about the premises frequently giving orders how the addition thereto should be constructed and directing changes to be made; that at their direction plaintiff changed the windows on the west side of the building, one of them three times; that no request was made to change the windows in dispute until after they had been put in and the plastering done around them, and only then when the plaintiff demanded payment of what he claimed was due him; that the evidence in the case was in fact conflicting as to whether it was or was not good workmanship to place the windows as plaintiff had placed them. The evidence further shows, as found by the court, that the cost of placing the windows in alignment was $7.50, and there is no pretense that in remedying this deviation by resetting the windows in proper alignment any damage or disfigurement to the building, either from a material or æsthetical point of view, was occasioned. We think these facts warranted the court in finding that the defect complained of was but a trivial imperfection, readily remedied and compensated for out of the contract price, and that such imperfection in the work arose in an attempt in good faith by plaintiff to substantially perform his contract. As against the good faith of the plaintiff relative to the placing of these windows it is claimed the evidence shows that he refused to change them when demand was made on him to do so, and that he stated, upon refusal of Devine, as agent of the Greens, to pay him until he did, that he could do better in a law suit. It is true the plaintiff refused to change the windows after he had, as he claimed, finished the work according to his contract, and the plastering had been put on around them, unless paid additional for it, but this fact would not affect the implied finding of the court that the plaintiff was acting in good faith in claiming that he finished the work as agreed to. This was his claim all along, and if he was mistaken in it, as the imperfection was trivial, his right to a lien was not forfeited thereby. Upon his refusal the defendants had a month before the lien was filed within which they could have had the change in the windows made by another carpenter, or have ascertained what it would cost to do so, and could have tendered the plaintiff what was due him less such expense. As to the statement that plaintiff said he could do better in a law suit: This was testified to by Devine, but it is quite evident from all his testimony that this statement was made by plaintiff while he and Devine were disputing over the claim of plaintiff for extra labor. Devine and the Greens claimed that plaintiff had performed no extra labor and refused to pay him anything on that account. Devine offered to pay him the balance of the contract price, $303.50, only, and charged him with trying to get by his claim for extra work more than belonged to him. Plaintiff refused to forego his claim for the extra labor, and it was in this connection that the remark about doing better in court was made. The defendants in their answer in this case denied any liability to the plaintiff for such extra work, but the lower court found that his claim for it was just and allowed it to him, which makes further comment upon his remark about doing better by litigation unnecessary.

We have discussed what we deem the principal point upon this appeal. Other claims are made for a reversal, but we do not think any of them tenable.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PLACER COUNTY v. FREEMAN.

(Sac. 1,352.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 25, 1906.)

1. APPEAL — JUDGMENTS APPEALABLE — CONSENT JUDGMENT.

After the lower court on defendant's motion, struck out several items sued on, to which plaintiff excepted, and the amount remaining being less than $300, plaintiff and defendant both entertained a view that the court had no jurisdiction of the action. A judgment of dismissal followed in the following language: "Both plaintiff and defendant having admitted in open court that the court has no jurisdiction in this action, it is therefore ordered * * * that the same be and is hereby dismissed." Held, that plantiff did not consent to the judgment in such sense that it was deprived of the right to appeal.

2. COUNTIES—ROAD COMMISSIONER—COMPENSATION—EXPENSES.

County Government Act, § 228, subd. 8, St. 1897, p. 576, c. 277, declaring that county charges shall include "the contingent expenses necessarily incurred for the use and benefit of the county" does not entitle the supervisors as ex officio road commissioners to repayment of their traveling and personal expenses incurred as road commissioners in view of section 215 (page 572) which provides that the salaries and fees provided for shall be in full compensation for all services rendered the county as officer or ex officio officer.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 13, Counties, § 54.]

3. HIGHWAYS — ROAD OVERSEERS' COMPENSATION—STATUTES—CHANGE DURING TERM.

Act March 23, 1901 (St. 1901, p. 752, c. 234, § 185, subd. 15), providing for the repayment to road commissioners of such expenses as they actually incur cannot be construed to apply to officers who went into office before and retained office after the enactment of the law.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by the county of Placer against W. A. Freeman. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. K. Robinson, Dist. Atty., and F. P. Tuttle, for appellant. L. L. Chamberlain and J. E. Marks, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought by the district attorney of the county of Placer in the name of the county, against the defendant, who was a member of the board of supervisors of the county. As such supervisor he was ex officio a road commissioner of the county. Pol. Code, § 2641. As road commissioner he presented for payment claims against the county aggregating the sum of $458.10. These claims were for traveling and personal expenses incurred as road commissioner. The action by the county was to recover back these moneys, and was prosecuted under the provisions of the county government act of 1897. St. 1897, p. 452, c. 277, § 8. The constitutionality of this section has been upheld in Burr v. Board of Supervisors, 138 Cal. 57. By the provisions of the county government act, each member of the board of supervisors of Placer county became ex officio a road commissioner of the county. At the time when the defendant, as road commissioner, paid out the several sums of money for traveling and personal expenses and these claims were ordered paid by the board of supervisors, the warrant drawn by the auditor and paid by the treasurer, there was nothing in the law making special provision for the repayment of the money so expended. To the contrary, section 215 (page 572) of the county government act provided that the salaries and fees provided for should be in full compensation for all services rendered the county as such officer or ex officio officer. To this complaint was interposed a demurrer and a motion to dismiss. The motion was overruled. The court, in an opinion overruling the demurrer suggested to the attorney for the respondent that it would entertain a motion to strike out from the complaint many of the items charged upon, as having been illegally collected, and the defendant, following this suggestion with a motion to strike out, the motion was granted under opposition and objection by the plaintiff. To the granting of the motion plaintiff reserved its exception. The granting of this motion left the complaint as charging upon a few items, trifling in amount, not exceeding in the aggregate $20. The complaint thus charging for the recovery of a sum less than $300, plaintiff and defendant both appear to have entertained the view that the court had no jurisdiction of such an action. A judgment of dismissal followed, which judgment is in the following language: "Both plaintiff and defendant having admitted in open court that the court has no jurisdiction of this action, it is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that the same be and is hereby dismissed."

From this judgment of dismissal plaintiff promptly appealed, causing a bill of exceptions to be settled, upon which it sought to review the soundness of the order of the trial court striking out portions of the complaint. Upon this appeal respondent urges a preliminary objection that the judgment of dismissal was a "consent judgment"; that being such a judgment, plaintiff is bound by its terms, and no appeal from it will, therefore, be considered. Much authority is cited as to the meaning, force, effect, and finality of a consent judgment. These authorities are unimpeachable in point of law, but do not call for consideration, because the judgment here appealed from is in no legal sense a judgment by consent. If plaintiff had assented to the order of court striking out the items and allegations of the complaint, some force might attach to the argument that plaintiff's concurrence in the judgment which it was believed necessarily followed, was a consent judgment. But the facts are that plaintiff was strenuously opposing the motion to strike out, and reserved its exception to the order which was given. The order having been made against its objection and exception, it was the conviction of plaintiff that, by the order striking out, the court had stripped itself of jurisdiction to proceed further with the action. Whether plaintiff was correct in this view of the law or not is quite immaterial. It assented to the judgment only in the sense that one assents who, protesting against a given course of conduct or procedure, agrees with his adversary that but one consequence can follow the adoption of that course of procedure or conduct. Thus a man who is told that he is going to be executed, but may have his choice of modes of execution between shooting and hanging, can scarcely be said to have consented to his execution if he express a preference for being shot. An attorney, against whose complaint a general demurrer has been sustained without leave to amend, and who thereupon states to the court that, under his view of the law, nothing remains but to give judgment for the defendant, would hardly be said to have assented to the order sustaining the demurrer and to have bound himself through his declaration to a consent judgment. An attorney who objects to a question propounded of a witness, and who reserves his exception to the order of the court overruling his objection, can scarcely be said to have waived his objection and exception if thereupon he should turn to the witness and say "proceed with your answer." This proposition seems so plain as not to require the citation of authority, but reference may be made to Mecham v. McKay, 37 Cal. 154; Harvey v. Bunker Hill Co., 2 Idaho, 765, 24 Pac. 30; Smith v. Dittman, 16 Daly (N. Y.) 427.

Coming thus to consider the ruling of the court in striking out the allegations in the complaint as to the claims, it appears, as has been said, that there is no warrant in the law for their collection by the road commissioner, unless it is found in subdivision 8 of section 228 (page 576) of the county government act, which declares the following to be county charges: "Section 228, subd. 8. The contingent expenses necessarily incurred for the use and benefit of the county." It is a forced construction to hold that this provision contemplated the repayment of the personal expenses of the road commissioners, particularly in view of the fact that it makes no reference to these expenses, whereas, subdivision 2 of the same section expressly makes a county charge of "the traveling and other personal expenses of the district attorney," etc. The county government act, as to many officers, makes express provision as to repayment of their personal and traveling expenses, and in the case of Placer county it is provided that (besides the clause touching the district attorney) the superintendent of schools shall be allowed his actual traveling expenses, not to exceed $500 per annum. County Gov. Act, St. 1897, p. 539, c. 277, § 185, subd. 11. If the law, therefore, contemplated that the supervisors should receive repayment of such traveling expenses it would have said so. Whereas, in fact, what it does say in section 215 is that the salaries and fees provided for shall be in full compensation for all services rendered the county as such officer or ex officio officer. That this language is in absolute repugnancy and hostility to the idea that where compensation for all services is fixed by statute, personal and traveling expenses may still be allowed, is well expounded in the case of Albright v. County of Bedford, 106 Pa. 582, and State v. Trousdale, 16 Nev. 357, where it is held, as indeed it must be, that a statute providing in terms or in effect that the compensation fixed "shall be in full for all services" excludes the idea that the Legislature intended to allow extra compensation for traveling and like expenses. In the case at bar, if subdivision 8 of section 228, in providing that contingent expenses necessarily incurred for the use and benefit of the county are county charges, contemplated such expenses as are here in suit, it must necessarily include the traveling and personal expenses of every county officer, so that judges, sheriffs, county clerks, one and all, without any express provision of the law to that effect, would be entitled to recover their traveling expenses incurred in the performance of their duties. This certainly is not the construction of the section.

At a later session, in 1901, the Legislature seems to have considered it a hardship that road commissioners should be compelled to bear the cost of their traveling expenses, and made provision by act adopted March 23, 1901 (St. 1901, p. 752, c. 234, § 185, subd. 15) for the repayment to them of such itemized expenses as they had actually incurred, the result being that supervisors elected after the law of 1901 went into effect became clearly entitled to such reimbursement, while the supervisors who went into office before and retained office after the enactment of that law did not come within the scope of its liberality. But notwithstanding the fact that the result is as in this case, that certain members of the board of supervisors are entitled to reimbursement for their expenses as road commissioners, while other members of the board are not, the inequality and individual hardship which thus results cannot be permitted to overthrow, or even modify, the rule that the compensation of a public officer may not be increased during the term for which he is elected. This complaint, as has been said, was framed under the provisions of section 8 of the county government act (St. 1897, p. 452, c. 277) and under section 53 (page 473) of the same statute. The complaint was certainly sufficient in form. Solano County v. McCudden, 120 Cal. 648, 53 Pac. 213. It was, therefore, error for the court to strike out the allegations of the complaint.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to deny the motion to strike out, and to allow defendant a reasonable time in which to answer to the merits of the complaint.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 18, 1906. Rehearing Denied Oct. 16, 1906; Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 15, 1906.)

CORPORATIONS — STOCKHOLDERS—LIABILITIES FOR DEBTS—ACTION—PLEADING.

Const. art. 12, § 3, provides that each stockholder of a corporation shall be individually liable for such portion of the debts incurred while he was a stockholder as the amount of stock owned by him bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock. Held, that a complaint to enforce stockholders' liability under such section, alleging that the whole capital of the corporation was divided into 60,000 shares, of which about 37,735 shares were "issued" was not equivalent to an allegation that only that number of shares were "subscribed," and that the complaint was, therefore, fatally defective for failure to allege the whole number of shares subscribed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by San Francisco Commercial Agency against M. K. Miller and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants William H. and Charles Dunphy appeal. Reversed.

W. J. Bartnett, for appellants. P. A. Bergerot and G. H. Perry, for respondent.

McLAUGHLIN, J. This is an action against certain stockholders of the Eureka Consolidated Oil Company to recover their proportionate share of the indebtedness of said corporation.

The only question presented for decision involves the sufficiency of an allegation in the complaint, which reads as follows: "That the capital stock of said Eureka Consolidated Oil Company now is, and at all the times hereinafter mentioned was, the sum of $60,000, divided into 60,000 shares of the par value of $1 each; that at all said times there had been issued by said company 37,735 shares of its capital stock, and no more, which shares were duly subscribed for, owned, and held by the shareholders of said company; and that there are now owned and held, and at all the times hereinafter mentioned there were owned and held, by the defendants above named the number of shares set after their respective names," etc. The appellants demurred to the complaint on the ground that no cause of action was stated. The demurrer was overruled, and the appeal is taken from the judgment thereupon entered in favor of plaintiff.

Section 3 of article 12 of the Constitution provides that "each stockholder of a corporation or joint-stock association shall be individually and personally liable for such proportion of all of its debts and liabilities contracted or incurred during the time he was a stockholder, as the amount of stock or shares owned by him bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock or shares of the corporation or association." In the complaint before us the number of shares issued and the number of shares subscribed for and owned by the defendants is stated, but we are left groping as to the number of shares constituting the whole of the "subscribed capital stock." It is contended that the averment that but 37,735 shares were issued is equivalent to a statement that only that number of shares were subscribed. With this contention we cannot agree. In the case at bar the averment in question might be absolutely true, and yet the remaining number of shares might have been subscribed by one or more persons not made defendants in this action. "To constitute the subscribers stockholders, it was not necessary that the certificates of stock should have issued to them." S. J. L. & W. Co. v. Beecher, 101 Cal. 79, 35 Pac. 349; Cal. S. H. Co. v. Callender, 94 Cal. 127, 29 Pac. 859, 28 Am. St. Rep. 99; Mitchell v. Beckman, 64 Cal. 121, 28 Pac. 110. The averment that stock has been issued amounts to no more than a statement that the stock certificates have issued. Tulare Sav. Bank v. Talbot, 131 Cal. 49, 63 Pac. 172. And it is a matter of common knowledge that stock is invariably subscribed for before it is issued. From this it follows that one element necessary to fix the proportion of the indebtedness for which appellants were liable is entirely wanting. We know the amount of stock issued and the number of shares owned by appellants, but we are not informed as to the total number of shares subscribed.

It has been held repeatedly that a complaint failing to state the whole number of shares subscribed is fatally defective, and we have neither the inclination nor the right to depart from a rule so well settled and sound. John A. Roebling's Sons Co. v. Butler, 112 Cal. 678, 45 Pac. 6; Bidwell v. Babcock, 87 Cal. 32, 25 Pac. 752; Const. art. 12, § 3; Civ. Code, § 322.

SIERRA COUNTY v. FLANIGAN. (Sac. 1,219.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 1, 1906. Rehearing Denied Oct. 31, 1906.)

LICENSE—ORDINANCE—REPEAL—EFFECT.

Where a license tax accrued after the passage of Pol. Code, § 3366 (St. 1901, p. 635, c. 209) authorizing the imposition of a business license, which operated to repeal the ordinance under which the license was levied, the county had no right to recover the same.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sierra County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by Sierra county against P. L. Flanigan. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., W. I. Redding, Dist. Atty., and Frank R. Wehe, for appellant. A. E. Cheney and Campbell, Metson & Campbell (Thomas H. Breeze, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action to recover of the defendant certain license taxes alleged to have accrued and to be due and owing from him to the county of Sierra, under an ordinance adopted by the board of supervisors of the county on May 31, 1900.

Precisely the same ordinance was under consideration by the Supreme Court of the United States in Flanigan v. County of Sierra, 196 U. S. 557, 25 Sup. Ct. 314, 49 L. Ed. 597. It was held by the Supreme Court of the United States in that case that the ordinance in question was repealed by the act of the Legislature of California of March 23, 1901, adding section 3366 to the Political Code (St. 1901, p. 635, c. 209), and that the repeal operated to prevent further collection of taxes previously accrued under the ordinance. The taxes for which this suit was begun accrued after the passage of the act of 1901, and there can be no doubt but that, under the decision, the right of action for the tax was terminated by the passage of the statute. The Supreme Court of the United States, upon this point, followed the decisions of this court in Sonora v. Curtin, 137 Cal. 583, 70 Pac. 674, and Santa Monica v. Guidinger, 137 Cal. 658, 70 Pac. 732.

Following the decisions in these cases, we hold that the plaintiff had no right of action to collect the tax sued for. The court below took the same view, sustained a demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend, and rendered judgment for the defendant thereon, and this action was correct.

The judgment is affirmed.

WHEELER et al. v. PLUMAS COUNTY.

(Sac. 1,341.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 2, 1906.)

1. LICENSES—REVENUE—STATUTES—REPEAL.

County Government Act 1897, p. 465, c. 277, § 25, subd. 25, conferred on boards of supervisors power to license, for the purpose of regulation and revenue, every kind of business not prohibited by law, transacted and carried on within the county. Under such authority the supervisors of P. county passed an ordinance entitled "An ordinance levying a license tax on persons, firms, copartnerships and corporations, carrying on the business of grazing, herding or pasturing sheep or lambs within the county," which provided that all persons so engaged in such business should pay an annual license equal to $10 for every 100 sheep and lambs owned and controlled by them, etc. Held, that such ordinance was a measure passed for the purpose of revenue, and not for the regulation of sheep raising, and was, therefore, repealed by Pol. Code, § 3366, amending the county government act and restricting the power of counties to license to matters of regulation only.

2. SAME—EFFECT OF REPEAL—PRIOR TAXES.

The repeal of a county's power to levy a license tax for revenue by Pol. Code, § 3366, was to destroy all the county's right to collect a license tax under an existing revenue ordinance, though the tax was due before the repeal took effect.

3. SAME—RECOVERY OF PAYMENT—DURESS—PROTEST.

After a statute granting counties the right to levy license taxes for revenue purposes had been repealed, the county claimed the right to collect a license tax from plaintiffs under an ordinance taxing sheep raisers, and procured the arrest of R., one of the plaintiffs, for engaging in such business without procuring a license. While R. was in the custody of the sheriff, and in order to procure his release from custody, he was required to, and did, deposit the alleged amount of the license tax with C., who thereafter paid over the money to the county under protest in order to prevent R.'s rearrest. Held, that neither the payment made to C. nor to the county were voluntary, but under duress, and, the county not being entitled to collect such tax, plaintiffs were entitled to recover the same.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; C. E. McLaughlin, Judge.

Action by D. C. Wheeler and another against Plumas county. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Campbell, Metson & Campbell and Cheney, Massay & Smith, for appellants. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and L. N. Peter, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendant entered against plaintiffs after they had declined to amend upon demurrer sustained to their first amended complaint, and the only question presented is as to the validity of the order sustaining such demurrer.

The facts as gathered from the amended complaint are as follows: The board of supervisors of Plumas county on the 9th of January, 1900, enacted an ordinance entitled "An ordinance levying a license tax on persons, firms, copartnerships and corporations carrying on the business of raising, grazing, herding or pasturing sheep or lambs within the county of Plumas, * * *" wherein it was provided that all persons engaged in such business within the county of Plumas must annually procure a license therefor from the license collector of the county, and pay therefor $10 for each 100 sheep and lambs owned by and under the control of such persons. It further provided that the license collector should have the collection of the license tax provided for by the ordinance, and should direct the district attorney to bring suit in the name of the county to recover such license where any person required by the ordinance to take out a license failed to do so. The ordinance made the license a debt due the county, and provided that the money collected for the license should be paid over to the county treasurer and placed to the credit of the general fund of the county. In August, 1901, plaintiffs, as copartners, were engaged in the business of raising and grazing sheep, and had in their possession and were grazing within the county of Plumas 13,000 sheep and lambs, and had failed to take out a license for such business. During that month the plaintiff D. W. Ridenour was arrested, taken many miles to Quincy, the county seat of Plumas county, and was there held in the custody of the sheriff under a warrant of arrest issued by the justice of the peace of Plumas township in Plumas county, based upon a complaint of the license collector, which charged said Ridenour with the commission of a misdemeanor in the carrying on of a business for which a license was required without first procuring a license. While said Ridenour was in the custody of said sheriff, in order to procure, and as a condition for, his release from custody, he was required to, and did, deposit with one C. C. Clough $1,301, which was the amount claimed by the license collector as the amount of the license under the ordinance. The money so deposited was the money of the plaintiffs, and, as alleged in the complaint, it was agreed between the plaintiffs and defendant that the money was deposited and paid under protest, and that it should be held by the said Clough until the protest was prepared. Upon deposit of this money, the said Ridenour was released from custody, and the case against him in the justice court continued. On April 3, 1902, while the criminal case against said Ridenour was still pending, the plaintiffs prepared and served on the license collector of the county their protest in writing against the payment of the license tax. Thereafter, upon the demand of the defendant, in order to prevent said Ridenour from being again taken into custody under said warrant of arrest and prosecuted for carrying on said business without a license, said $1,301 was paid and delivered to said defendant under protest by said C. C. Clough. The plaintiffs then presented their claim in writing to the board of supervisors of the county, praying for the repayment of the said money, which claim was rejected. Upon the rejection of said claim, the plaintiffs commenced this action, resulting in the judgment appealed from. Upon this appeal, the argument in the briefs upon both sides is devoted principally to questions as to the validity of such ordinance, and whether, at the time of the arrest of Ridenour, and the payment under protest of the license demanded of him, said ordinance and license tax imposed thereby had not been repealed, and the right of the county to collect any tax under the ordinance extinguished and gone.

It will be unnecessary to consider the constitutional objections urged by appellant against the validity of the ordinance, because it is settled by the authorities, not only that, by legislation of the state subsequent to the enactment of the ordinance, it was repealed, but also that the effect of such repeal was to extinguish any right to collect a license tax previous to such appeal. It will be observed that the ordinance in question was passed by the board of supervisors of Plumas county in 1900, at a time when, by subdivision 25 of section 25 of the county government act (St. 1897, p. 465, c. 277) power was conferred upon boards of supervisors of the several counties "to license for purposes of regulation and revenue of every kind of business not prohibited by law and transacted and carried on in such county." When the ordinance in question was passed this law was in force, but before the arrest of the appellant Ridenour or any proceedings taken to enforce the collection of the license tax imposed by defendant, the Legislature, by the act of March 23, 1901 (St. 1901, p. 635, c. 209; section 3366, Pol. Code), repealed by implication said subdivision 25 of section 25 of the county government act, as far as it conferred power to license for purposes of revenue, and restricted the power to matters of regulation alone. Ex parte Pfirmann, 134 Cal. 148, 66 Pac. 205; City of Sonora v. Curtin, 137 Cal. 583, 70 Pac. 674; Town of Santa Monica v. Guidinger, 137 Cal. 658, 70 Pac. 732; Ex parte Braun, 141 Cal. 204, 74 Pac. 780. The effect of the act of March 23, 1901, was to repeal the ordinance of 1900 if the ordinance was a measure passed for the purpose of revenue and not for regulation, and that it is of the former character alone is not, we think, open to question. It is apparent from the title of the act itself, and the entire absence of any regulatory provisions, that it was intended as a revenue measure, and comes within the scope of the rulings in City of Sonora v. Curtin and Town of Santa Monica v. Guidinger, supra, and the cases of Flanigan v. County of Sierra, 196 U. S. 553, 25 Sup. Ct. 314, 49 L. Ed. 597; Wheeler & Ridenour v. County of Plumas, 196 U. S. 562, 25 Sup. Ct. 316, 49 L. Ed. 599. See, also, County of Sierra v. Flanigan (Sac. No. 1,219) 87 Pac. 801, written and decided by this court since this portion of this opinion was prepared.

The cases in the Supreme Court of the United States were decided since the appeal in this case was taken, and involved the construction of ordinances practically identical with the one here in question, one of which was a controversy between these same parties. It was there held, following the California cases immediately above cited, that the ordinances there in question were enacted for the purpose of revenue and not for regulation. Equally so is the one under consideration here a revenue measure only, and, under the act of March 23, 1901, adopted after its passage was repealed, and the effect of the repeal of the power to levy the license tax for revenue was to destroy all right to collect a license tax under the ordinance, even though due before the repeal took effect. The repeal of the power repealed the ordinance, and destroyed, also, all right to collect any tax thereunder. Napa State Hospital v. Flaherty, 134 Cal. 315, 66 Pac. 322; City of Sonora v. Curtin, supra; Town of Santa Monica v. Guidinger, supra. And that this was the effect of such repeal of the power upon the right to collect was also declared in the Flanigan and the Wheeler & Ridenour Cases in the United States Supreme Court, above referred to. See, also, on both the above points, the case of Sierra Co. v. Flanigan (Sac. No. 1,219, decided by this court and above referred to) 87 Pac. 801.

In passing from this branch of the case it is well to say that the ordinances embraced in the above cases, passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States, are entirely different in their terms from the ordinance under consideration in the case of County of Plumas v. Wheeler et al. (No. 1,361) 87 Pac. 909, and County of Sierra v. Flanigan (No. 1,305) 87 Pac. 913, pending in this court, and the decisions in which cases were filed yesterday—October 1, 1906. These latter ordinances were passed subsequent to March 23, 1901, and purported, by their title, and from their provisions, to be for the purpose solely of regulating the business of raising, grazing, herding, and pasturing sheep or lambs in the respective counties where they were enacted. We have, however, nothing to do with those cases in the consideration of this appeal, and simply refer to them as involving ordinances passed at a different time and containing different provisions.

Recurring now to the matter under consideration: As the ordinance here in question was a revenue measure, and it, together with any right to collect a license under it, became inoperative upon the passage of the act of March 23, 1901, it necessarily follows that the claim made by the respondent, and sought to be enforced by the criminal prosecution taken against said Ridenour, was unauthorized and invalid, and, if payment of such illegal demand was compelled by duress, and paid under protest, the plaintiffs have a right to recover it back.

This brings us to the last point made on the appeal—an inquiry as to whether the payment made was a payment under duress, or, as contended by respondent, a voluntary payment. Under the facts alleged in the complaint, the payment was unquestionably compulsory and involuntary, and we cannot perceive the slightest basis for the contention that it was otherwise. Laying down the general rule as to what constitutes an involuntary payment, it is said: "The authorities are unanimous to the effect that where one is compelled by duress of his person to pay an unjust or illegal demand, and he makes the payment under protest, such payment is compulsory and can be recovered back." 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 613. "In the absence of specific statutory provision the general doctrines as to the recovery of payments apply to the payment of taxes. Hence, taxes voluntarily paid, without legal duress or coercion, cannot be recovered back, but, when a person is called upon peremptorily to pay a tax to which he is not liable, and he can save himself or his property in no other way than by paying the illegal demand, he may recover the money so paid as money had and received." 27 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 757, 758. In Osborn v. Robbins, 36 N. Y. 371, the Court of Appeals says: "When a party is arrested without just cause, and from motives which the law does not sanction, any contract into which he may enter with the authors of the wrong, to procure his liberation from restraint, is imputed to illegal duress. It is corrupt in its origin, and the wrongdoer can take no benefit from its execution. In such a case, the element of voluntary assent is wanting. The parties do not meet on equal terms. The authority of the courts is perverted to unworthy uses. The instrumentalities employed to produce a consenting will are force and fraud, agencies which the law abhors. The prisoner is at the mercy of the accuser, and he submits to extortion, as the means of deliverance from oppression under the forms of law." And in this state in Brumagin v. Tillinghast, 18 Cal. 272, 79 Am. Dec. 176, involuntary payment is thus defined: "It may be said in general that there must be some actual or threatened exercise of power possessed, or supposed to be possessed, by the party exacting or receiving the payment, over the person or property of the party making the payment, from which the latter has no other means of immediate relief than by advancing the money."

Now, from the facts alleged in the complaint, it appears that the respondent, the county of Plumas, was asserting against these plaintiffs an illegal and unjust claim for conducting a lawful business. In the enforcement of that claim the agents of the county caused the arrest of one of these plaintiffs, against whom this claim was made, charged him with a criminal offense with a view of enforcing its demand, took him into actual custody, and, as a condition precedent to his obtaining release from the custody of the sheriff under such criminal proceedings, and to avoid imprisonment, compelled him to pay the amount of the license tax which it unjustly asserted was due. The obvious purpose of the criminal prosecution was to attain this end. The process of the criminal court of the county was invoked to accomplish it; the plaintiff Ridenour was, under its process, in duress of imprisonment, and, to procure his liberation from such imprisonment—from a danger urgent and immediate—paid under protest the license tax illegally demanded of him. That the payment by the appellant Ridenour of the amount demanded by respondent under this ordinance was unlawfully exacted has been heretofore determined, and that the payment itself was compulsory and involuntary, the recital of the above facts from the complaint, and the application to them of the rules of law above cited, makes it so apparent that further discussion of the proposition would be useless.

It is insisted, however, that, if Ridenour was arrested and charged with a misdemeanor in conducting a business for which he had not paid a license, he would have been entitled to acquittal on a trial, upon the ground that the ordinance involved in the criminal prosecution was void, and that the proper place to have made that defense was in the criminal case; that, if the ordinance was invalid, that finding would have been sufficient to secure his release, and, if he saw fit to pay the license, rather than make a defense against the criminal charge, his act was the result of a choice between a trial of the criminal case and the payment of the money to avoid it, and hence, was voluntary. We are not able to grasp the force of this reasoning as applied to the case at bar. It might have more merit if there was not present here the fact that Ridenour was in duress, and could only obtain his release upon payment of the illegal charge. He was not required to pay a fine under the criminal accusation, but, as a condition precedent to his release, required to pay the illegally exacted amount of the license tax, and could not procure his release from custody otherwise. To this contention of respondent may be aptly applied the language of the Supreme Court of Illinois, used in Harvey v. Olney, 42 Ill. 336: "It would be a reproach to our law if these municipal corporations should be permitted to assume the right to pass ordinances threatening people with heavy fines and a long imprisonment for carrying on a lawful business, and, after extorting a large sum of money for a pretended license by threats of a prosecution, be allowed to come into court and resist repayment by saying, 'Although we did this thing, we had no right to do it, and the ordinance that we pretended was a law was really no law, and these persons should have known better than to have paid us the money.' It is only necessary to say that the town cannot be permitted to defend its wrong by this species of self-stultification. A person to whom a town offers the alternative of paying for a license or undergoing a prosecution before the police magistrate, which would result in fine and imprisonment if the ordinance should be held valid, may certainly pay his money under protest, without losing his rights, and cannot be required to incur the hazard of the magistrate's decision upon the validity of the ordinance, and possibly be driven to a writ of habeas corpus, to relieve himself from imprisonment. Such payment would not be voluntary."

It is further claimed that, whatever the effect of the original payment to Clough was, the final payment to the county was different. We think not. The payment to Clough was, as we have seen, made under duress and to effect Ridenour's release from custody, and was made under protest. The final payment to the county was made on demand of the respondent doubtless so as to have the money claimed to be due for the license actually paid into the county treasury. It was paid by Clough upon its demand and under protest, and so paid for the purpose of preventing Ridenour from being again taken into custody under the warrant of arrest issued in the criminal proceeding, and to be relieved from which the original payment had been made. The same compulsion which had required the original payment to Clough operated as a continuous compulsion on the part of respondent, and eventuated in the payment of the money into the county treasury, and worked no change in the conditions under which Ridenour paid it, and did not render it the less involuntary or compulsory.

There are no further points made in the appeal which we think merit attention.

The judgment of the lower court is reversed, with directions to set aside the judgment entered, overrule the demurrer, and grant leave to the defendant to answer.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; HENSHAW, J.

BANCROFT v. RANDALL et al. (Civ. 268.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District. California. Sept. 26, 1906. Rehearing Denied Nov. 22, 1906.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS — HIGH SCHOOLS—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.
Pol. Code, §§ 1669–1674, regulating the government of high schools are not to be controlled by the provisions of the Code applicable to common schools.

2. SAME—SCHOOLS—ESTIMATE—VOTE.
Pol. Code, § 1670, subd. 4, requires high school boards to furnish to the authorities, whose duties it is to levy taxes, estimates of the cost of a suitable building, and that, when such estimate shall have been submitted, it shall be the duty of the authorities authorized to levy taxes in the high school district to levy a special tax sufficient in amount to erect a high school building, and subdivision 15 declares that the tax shall be computed and entered on the tax roll and collected in the same manner as other taxes. Held, that no vote of the people of a high school district was necessary to authorize a board of supervisors to levy a tax on a proper estimate being made and presented as provided by such section.

3. SAME—ESTIMATE—PRESENTATION—TIME.
Pol. Code, § 1670, subd. 14, makes it the duty of a high school board on or before the 1st day of September in each year to send to the proper authorities an estimate of the amount of money required for conducting the school, for the school year, etc. Held that, where an estimate was presented and filed in August and a levy based thereon was made September 21st, there was a sufficient compliance with the statute as to time.

4. SAME—FORM OF ESTIMATE.
An estimate in the form of a letter signed by the secretary of the board of trustees of a high school district reciting that, at a meeting of the trustees, etc., the board estimated that

$4,100 additional to the amount on hand would be necessary to the maintenance of the high school for the succeeding year, and that the sum of $10,000 additional to the building fund was necessary to the erection of the proposed high school, wherefore the board requested the board of supervisors of the county to levy a tax for such amounts, was sufficiently formal to warrant the exercise of jurisdiction by the board of supervisors though it was without seal or authenticated otherwise than by the secretary's signature.

5. SAME—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

Pol. Code, § 1670, subd. 6, provides for an election of representatives for the establishment of a high school, which representatives are required to meet to determine the location of the school, and, in case they fail to unanimously agree, provides for an election to determine the site, at which only such sites as have been named by the representatives and certified to the superintendent shall be voted on; that the location receiving the largest number of votes shall be chosen as the location of the high school; and that the representatives may arrange for temporary quarters in some suitable location. Held, that such section referred to the general location of the school as distinguished from the particular lot at the place where the school was located, and therefore did not preclude the levy of a tax for the construction and maintenance of a high school until a suitable lot had been acquired.

6. SAME—VOTE OF DISTRICT.

Pol. Code, § 1670, subd. 14, requires high school district trustees to furnish the board of supervisors with an estimate of the cost of purchasing a suitable lot as a location for such school, and subdivision 15, gives the supervisors authority to levy the necessary tax to purchase the site. Held, that no vote of the district was necessary to authorize the levy of a tax for the purchase of a high school site.

7. SAME — SECURING SITE — INJUNCTION — PLEADING—PRESUMPTIONS.

In a suit to restrain county supervisors from levying a tax for the construction of a high school building, an allegation that the trustees of the high school district did not, and never had, owned any lot on which to erect a building, was not equivalent to an allegation that no provision had been made for the acquisition of a lot, or that such provision would not be made before the erection of a building.

8. SAME—SEPARATE ESTIMATES—TAX LEVY.

Where a tax levy made by a board of supervisors on an estimate submitted by a board of high school trustees for the construction of a school building was found to be inadequate, the supervisors were not precluded by such levy from making a further levy on a new additional estimate submitted by the school board.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

Suit by Fannie W. Bancroft against E. J. Randall and others, as members of the board of supervisors of Contra Costa county. From a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying an injunction, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. S. Reid and Curtis Hillyer, for appellant. W. S. Tinning and A. B. McKenzie, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The action is to enjoin defendants from levying any special tax upon the taxable property within the Mt. Diablo union high school district, Contra Costa county, "for erecting any building for said district or for any purpose or purposes kindred thereto." A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained without leave to amend and judgment passed for defendants. The appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying an injunction.

It is alleged in the complaint: That plaintiff is the owner of real estate, as her separate property, situated in said union high school district. That the board of trustees of said district have made what purports to be an estimate of the cost of constructing a building for the use of said district, estimated to cost $10,000, which estimate has been presented to defendants with request that they levy a special tax upon the taxable property of said district sufficient in amount to erect said building. That the estimate so furnished was as follows: "At a meeting of the trustees of the Mt. Diablo union high school held August 20, 1904, the board estimated that the sum of four thousand one hundred dollars ($4,100.00), additional to the amount on hand, would be necessary to the maintenance of the Mt. Diablo union high school for the school year 1904–1905; and also, that the sum of ten thousand dollars ($10,000.00), additional to the building fund already on hand, will be necessary to erect the proposed high school in said district. Therefore, we, the board of trustees of Mt. Diablo union high school ask the Hon. board of supervisors of Contra Costa county to levy such a tax as will raise the aforesaid amounts. Annie Loucks, Sec. Board of Trustees." Indorsed: "Filed Aug. 24, 1904. J. E. Rodgers, Clerk. By J. H. Wells, Deputy Clerk." That said district "does not now, never did, own any lot upon which the, or any, proposed building might be erected." That the said trustees have never been directed by any vote of said district "to purchase, or receive, or select or accept or otherwise acquire, any school lot, or to build any schoolhouse, and no such vote for any purpose has ever been had at all." That about September 1, 1903, said trustees furnished to said board of supervisors what said trustees pretended and what purported "to be an estimate of the construction of a building for the use of said" district, as follows: "The sum of four thousand dollars being necessary to maintain Mt. Diablo union high school for the present school year 1903–1904, the board of trustees of said school ask that your Hon. board levy such a tax as will produce the said sum of four thousand dollars ($4,000.00). They also find that, it being necessary to erect a high school building and improving grounds, erecting windmill, tank, etc., the sum of twenty thousand dollars ($20,000.00) will be necessary to complete the above work, and therefore ask your honorable board to levy such a tax as will produce the said sum of twenty thousand dollars ($20,000.00). Annie Loucks, Secretary Board of Trustees of Mount Diablo Union High School. Indorsed: "In the matter of Mt. Diablo union high school. Estimate of amount of money required to maintain Mt. Diablo union high school for fiscal year 1903–4 and to erect building. J. E. Rodgers, Clerk, by J. H. Wells, Deputy Clerk." That, pursuant to said estimate, said trustees procured defendants, on or about September 21, 1903, to levy a special tax upon all the property in said district. That the tax so levied, "in the judgment of the said board of supervisors, was for an amount sufficient to build the said proposed new high school building, aggregating the sum of $5,016.53, according to the report of the county auditor of said Contra Costa county, filed on the 21st day of September, 1903." That "almost all of the aforesaid special tax levied in the year 1903 has been paid to the tax collector of said Contra Costa county * * * and is now in the custody of the county treasurer to the credit of said * * * district.' That plaintiff has protested to the defendants against the levy of any special tax for the erection of any building for said district, on the ground, among others, that said defendants have "no jurisdiction to entertain any such application, * * * but said board of supervisors, acting by the defendants herein, threaten to, and unless restrained * * * by this honorable court, will levy another special tax upon all the taxable property of said * * * district for such amount as in the judgment of the said board of supervisors will be sufficient to erect the said proposed school building," to the injury of plaintiff and other taxpayers of said district: Wherefore, etc. Plaintiff urges want of jurisdiction in defendants to act in the premises, on the grounds, to wit: (1) That the trustees of the high school had never been directed by any vote of the district to purchase, receive, select, accept, or otherwise acquire any school lot or to build any schoolhouse. (2) That no estimate was ever presented for such purposes. (3) That no school site had been selected. (4) That the district owned no lot on which to erect a building. (5) That the first levy was void, and the moneys thus collected cannot be used for the purposes named. (6) That, if the defendants ever had jurisdiction to levy any tax, it was exhausted by the making of the first levy.

It is urged that the board of supervisors have no power to levy special taxes for school purposes except such as are conferred by statute; that it can levy such taxes for a union high school only upon an estimate made by the school trustees. Pol. Code, § 1670, subd. 14. It is next contended that these trustees have only such powers as are conferred by the same Code, section 1670, subdivision 11, which, it is claimed, are the same as those of boards of common school trustees; that such latter school trustees can build school houses or purchase or sell school lots only "when directed by a vote of their district." Pol. Code, § 1617, subd. 5. It is hence argued that, as by no vote were the trustees ever directed to build a schoolhouse, no authority rests in the board of supervisors to levy the tax. Many of the provisions of the high school acts, as set forth in sections 1669 to 1674 inclusive of the Political Code were given careful and somewhat extended examination and construction in People v. Lodi High School District, 124 Cal. 694, 57 Pac. 660. It would be useless repetition to again explain the scope and meaning of the provisions which established our high school system of education. The authority there given to levy taxes for the maintenance of these schools flows from the same source as the authority to levy taxes for constructing buildings in which the schools are to be held, and the latter power is co-extensive with the former. Subdivision 14 of section 1670 makes it the duty of the high school board "to furnish to the authorities whose duty it is to levy taxes * * * an estimate of the cost of * * * erecting a suitable building, * * *" and to furnish such estimate to such authorities (the board of supervisors here). "When such estimate shall have been made and submitted it shall be the duty of the authorities whose duty it is to levy taxes in said * * * high school district to levy a special tax upon all the taxable property of said * * * high school district, sufficient in amount to * * * erect the building. * * * Said tax shall be computed, entered upon the tax roll, and collected, in the same manner as other taxes are computed, entered and collected." Subd. 15, § 1670, Pol. Code. In speaking of the scheme of taxation provided by these sections to maintain high schools, the court said in the Lodi High School District Case, supra: "It is within the power of the Legislature to constitute these schools and to provide for their support by methods different from those adopted for like purposes as to other schools." It is true the point under discussion was whether the law is obnoxious to constitutional objection as being special legislation. But the reasoning leads also to the conclusion that the provisions of the high school acts are not to be controlled by the provisions relating to the common schools. See, also, Brown v. City of Visalia, 141 Cal. at p. 382, 74 Pac. 1042. In our opinion no vote of the people of the district was necessary to authorize the defendants to act, upon a proper estimate being made and presented as provided in the act.

Objection is raised to the sufficiency of the estimate in matter of form and substance. It is claimed that subdivision 14, § 1670 requires the estimate to be presented on September 1st. It was filed in August and the defendants made the levy, as alleged in the complaint, on September 21st. This was a sufficient compliance with the law as to time.

The objection that the document is not an estimate but a mere letter, without seal or other authentication, and is but "the conclusions of the so-called secretary" is without merit. The section prescribes no particular form for the estimate, nor does it call for details. If the supervisors should deem it insufficient they could call for specifications or refuse to act upon it. The estimate was sufficient as a basis for the exercise of jurisdiction by the board of supervisors who act in a quasi judicial capacity in the matter; (Lodi High School Case, supra). We think the estimate sufficiently shows the source whence it emanated and is sufficiently authenticated. It was not necessary that all the trustees should attach their names to it.

It is alleged in the complaint "that the said trustees have never been directed by any vote of the said * * * district to purchase, or receive, or select or accept or otherwise acquire, any school lot, or to build any schoolhouse." It is argued first, that subdivision 6 of section 1670 refers to the lot on which the building is to be erected; and, second, that the district must own the lot before the supervisors can make the levy for the schoolhouse and that the lot must be selected by vote of the district. The meaning of subdivision 6 is not entirely clear, but we think it refers to the general location of the school and not to the particular lot at the place where the school is to be located. The union high school district is made up of several common school districts, and, before it can be known upon what particular lot of ground the schoolhouse is to be erected, the general locality or town within some one of the common school districts must be determined. The act provides that the district may maintain the school without owning any building by leasing suitable premises (subd. 6, § 1670). No lot could have been purchased until the general location of the school had been decided upon. The clause of the complaint above quoted is not inconsistent with the existence of the fact that the district either owns a lot by gift or has made provision for so or otherwise acquiring one. The averment is that the trustees have never been "directed by any vote to purchase a lot." The statute points out the method of purchasing or acquiring the lot. Subdivision 14 requires the trustees to furnish the board of supervisors "an estimate of the cost of purchasing a suitable lot," and subdivision 15 gives the supervisors authority to levy the necessary tax "to purchase the site," when such estimate is made. It is not necessary that there should be a vote of the district as in the case of purchasing a lot for a common schoolhouse. The authority to purchase the lot is the same as the authority to provide for the maintenance of the school or the erection of a suitable building or the leasing of a suitable building. These are to be accomplished by an estimate of the cost, presented by the trustees to the supervisors to be followed by the necessary tax levy. It might be more satisfactory to the supervisors to know, when the estimate for a building is presented, that the lot has been provided for, or that, if not, the estimate included the cost of the lot also. But it must be presumed that both the trustees and the supervisors will discharge their duties in accordance with law and it cannot be assumed in this action that the supervisors will act improvidently or in violation of law. Besides, we do not think that there is anything in the statute to prevent the trustees and the supervisors from making provision for the building before a lot is provided for.

It appears from the complaint that the estimate made in 1903 for a building, improvements, etc., was $20,000 and that the levy made realized only something over $5,000, most of which is now in the treasury to the credit of the building fund; that the estimate of 1904 calls for $10,000 "additional to the building fund now on hand." It is not alleged that the amount raised by the first levy was sufficient to build the schoolhouse, nor does it appear that that amount was the amount which the supervisors intended to raise by the levy. The averment is that the supervisors will, unless restrained, "levy another special tax * * * for such an amount as * * * will be sufficient to erect the said proposed building." It is claimed, under Martin v. Board of Supervisors, 103 Cal. 668, 37 Pac. 758, that there is no power given to levy the tax for a building unless the district has a lot; that estimates cannot be made separately, for the site only or the building only. In the Martin Case cited, the action was mandamus to compel the supervisors to estimate the cost of a county high school building. No legal provision had been made for the purchase of a lot and presumably the supervisors were unwilling to proceed until this was done. All that the court was called upon to decide was whether their judgment could be controlled to provide for a building when the statute gave them the power to provide for acquiring a lot and erecting a building by the same estimate. It was not necessary to the decision that before they could estimate for a building they must have first become the owner of a lot. However this may be, the complaint here avers only that the trustees do not now, and never did, own any lot. But they may have made provision for a lot, and we must assume if they have not that they will do so before erecting any building.

There seems to be no special provision for estimating the cost of the building and making levies of taxes by installments or for making additional levies of taxes to complete unfinished work. A reasonable construction should be put upon the statute such as would effectuate its main object if it can be done without violating settled principles of construction. Here the first estimate was for $20,000, of which only $5,000 was raised by the levy. The second estimate is for $10,000 additional to the fund on hand, alleged to be $5,000, or about that sum. We are not told why the first money raised was not expended, or why an additional amount became necessary, or why the supervisors failed to make the levy large enough to raise the requisite amount estimated by the trustees. All we know is that the first estimate was for $20,000, and only $5,000 was raised, and that an amount of $10,000 additional to the $5,000 was estimated as necessary to erect the proposed building. If it be true, as claimed by appellant, that the supervisors exhausted their power to make a levy under the first estimate (which we do not decide), we see no reason why, when it was found that the building fund was inadequate, the trustees might not make a further estimate or that the supervisors might not on such estimate make a further levy.

We can discover no infirmity in the first levy. The money raised by it belongs now to the building fund and in making the second estimate the end is reached by estimating the requisite additional amount quite as definitely as by making the estimate $15,000, as is claimed it should have been. The suggestion that this view leaves the supervisors with unrestricted powers to keep on from year to year adding to the cost of the building, presupposes that both the trustees and the supervisors will proceed recklessly and without regard to the welfare of the property holders. On the other hand we must presume official duty regularly performed, and, if the power here sought to be restrained is denied, the district might find itself seriously embarrassed.

It seems to us that the statute is sufficiently broad to justify the course being taken to secure a building for the school. Respondents make the point, not raised in the lower court, that injunction will not lie in anticipation of the action of a judicial body; citing Barto v. Board of Supervisors, 135 Cal. 494, 67 Pac. 758. We have thought it more satisfactory to dispose of the questions raised by appellant without considering the point suggested by respondents.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

WRIGHT v. COULES et al. (Civ. 257.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 16, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 13, 1906.)

1. LIBEL—SLANDER OF PROPERTY—PUBLICATION RELATING TO CHANGE IN HOTEL BUILDING—LIABILITY.

A complaint, which alleges that plaintiff was engaged in the hotel business; that at the date of the publication complained of designated persons had notified him that they were about to come to the hotel; that defendants maliciously and falsely published in a newspaper an article averring that the hotel had been purchased by a club and would be remodeled into a clubhouse, and that the specified persons read the article, and, by reason thereof, they were dissuaded from going to the hotel; and that such persons would have paid plaintiff a large sum of money from which he would have derived a specified profit—sufficiently states a cause of action for injury to plaintiff's business.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Libel and Slander, §§ 386-390.]

2. SAME — ALLEGATION OF DAMAGES — SUFFICIENCY.

A complaint in an action by the proprietor of a hotel for injury to his business caused by a newspaper publication, which alleges that, by reason of the publication, a large number of persons who were negotiating for board at the hotel were dissuaded from making any contract in relation thereto, and were dissuaded from going to the hotel, and from paying to the proprietor for board at least a designated sum, is demurrable, because of the uncertainty of the allegation with reference to the damage.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Libel and Slander, § 389.]

3. SAME—PROOF OF DAMAGES.

The damages to a hotel business resulting from a false newspaper publication may be proved by showing the existence of facts which would naturally tend to diminish the business, followed by evidence that it was actually diminished thereby, which may be shown without showing the specific name or giving the personal description of each guest driven away from the hotel by reason of the publication.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by A. D. Wright against J. C. Coules and others. From a judgment of dismissal on sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Tanner, Taft & Odell, for appellant. James P. Clark, M. M. Meyers, and M. J. McGarry, for respondents.

GRAY, P. J. This is an action for injury to the plaintiff's hotel business alleged to have been caused by publications made by defendants in several newspapers. A demurrer to the amended complaint as amended was sustained and the appeal from the judgment is by plaintiff.

The questions presented relate to the sufficiency of the complaint. The amended complaint as amended purports to set out three several and distinct causes of action. In the first cause of action it is alleged in substance that plaintiff was engaged in the business of an innkeeper at the Hotel Arcadia in Santa Monica, in the county of Los Angeles, on the 27th day of August, 1904, and for that purpose had a lease of the premises extending from a date at least two years prior to said date and up to and including the date of the filing of this suit, and that such business was popular and the income therefrom was about the sum of $2,000; that at the date of the publication complained of several persons, Young, Paine, Mrs. Paine, Wilsely, and Lawrence had notified the plaintiff that they were about to come to the said Hotel Arcadia and lodge or room in the said inn. It is further alleged that on said 27th day of August, 1904, the defendants maliciously and without reason caused to be published in the Los Angeles Examiner, a public newspaper printed in the city of Los Angeles and state of California, and widely distributed, etc., among the numerous customers, boarders, lodgers and transients of said hotel, a false and injurious article. We quote from said article, as set out in the complaint, as follows: "The famous Hotel Arcadia at Santa Monica has been purchased by the Occidental Club, and will be remodeled into a colossal country clubhouse, the largest in the world, for the use of the members and their families. The deal was accomplished by a double sale, O. B. Steen, an Arizona mining man, purchasing from the Pacific Improvement and transferring the property to the Angeles Investment Company, the parent corporation of the Occidental Club. The price was well into six figures. The new owners will proceed at once to enter upon the privileges of the spacious quarters they have acquired by the sea. They do not take possession until the close of the present season, but a series of balls, planned to occur twice a week, will soon commence. In the meantime, extensive alterations and repairs will go on without interruption. * * * As to the new seaside home which has formerly been the aristocratic Hotel Arcadia, it is already in high favor with the members of the organization. A big bathing party which will wind up with a dinner and dance is planned to take place in about two weeks." The complaint then alleges that the said article was false in this, that the said Hotel Arcadia had not been purchased by the said Occidental Club, was not to be remodeled, and there had been no double sale by O. B. Steen, an Arizona mining man, nor had the property been purchased from the Pacific Improvement Company, nor had it been transferred to the Angeles Investment Company, nor had there been any new owners thereby placed in possession of the title, nor did they make or begin to make any extensive improvements or alterations therein. It is further alleged that the parties above specifically named read this article, and that by reason thereof were dissuaded from coming to the hotel and did not come at all, and that these persons would have paid the plaintiff as proprietor of said Hotel Arcadia, as roomers, lodgers, boarders, or transients, a large sum of money had they so come, from which the plaintiff would have derived a profit of $1,000, and that by reason whereof plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $1,000.

We are clearly of the opinion that the first count of the complaint, the substance of which only is stated above, states a cause of action; that it is so free from uncertainty and ambiguity that the defendants will not be misled to their prejudice for want of any necessary allegation. If the facts as alleged are proved on the trial, we think there can be no question as to the plaintiff's right to recover the damages proven. The second cause of action alleged is the same as the first, except that it is based upon a different publication, claimed to have been made September 15, 1904, in the Daily Outlook, a public newspaper printed at Santa Monica, Cal. The same persons as stated in the first cause of action are alleged in the second cause of action to have been kept away from the hotel by the latter publication and the same damages are alleged to have accrued. We think, also, the allegations of this cause of action are sufficient as against both the general and the numerous special demurrers. The third cause of action is based upon the said publication in the Los Angeles Examiner on the 27th day of August, 1904. It also contains allegations similar to the first count of the complaint touching the ownership and conduct of the Hotel Arcadia and as to the printing and distribution of the paper containing the article; but the allegation of damage differs from that of the other two counts of the complaint. It reads as follows: "That by reason of the said publication, a large number of persons who were then and there negotiating for rooms in said Hotel Arcadia and for board and lodging, were dissuaded from making any contract in relation thereto and were dissuaded from coming to said Hotel Arcadia and from paying to plaintiff for board and lodging at least the sum of $3,000. Wherefore, plaintiff prays judgment against the defendants for the sum of $4,000 damages, and for costs of suit."

It appears from the order sustaining the demurrer and judgment of dismissal of the action that the several demurrers to the third cause of action were sustained without leave to amend. We think that for the uncertainty of the allegation with reference to the damage, quoted above from the third cause of action, the demurrer was perhaps properly sustained, but are of opinion that it should not have been sustained without leave to amend. To be sure, we find no record of any request in the transcript to amend this complaint further, and ordinarily this would be a sufficient answer to the plaintiff's appeal from the judgment following the order sustaining the demurrer. But as this case must go back to the trial court for further proceedings, we deem it fair and just that the plaintiff should be permitted by the court below, on the return of the case, to amend this allegation as to his damage so as to include a specific allegation that he was damaged by the facts alleged in that count of his complaint in a specific sum, whatever that sum may be. We are of opinion that damages to a hotel business may be proven by showing the existence of facts which would naturally tend to diminish and tear down that business followed by evidence showing that it was actually diminished and impaired thereby, and that this may be shown without showing the specific name or giving the personal description of each guest who was driven away from the place or prevented from coming there by reason of the acts complained of. A general allegation such as indicated above of people being dissuaded by reason of a publication from making any contract with or coming to the hotel or giving it their patronage, is sufficient.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the lower court to permit plaintiff to amend his third cause of action, as herein indicated.

I concur: ALLEN, J.

SMITH, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment and in what is said in the opinion as to the first and second causes of action set out in the complaint. I am also of the opinion that the demurrer to the third cause of action was rightly sustained, for the reasons stated in the opinion.

OSTROM et al. v. DE YOE et al. (Civ. 208.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 26, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 22, 1906.)

1. TRIAL—SUBMISSION OF ISSUES TO JURY—SPECIAL VERDICT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

An action for specific performance of an alleged oral contract of a decedent to make a will, and to set aside certain deeds, being an equity action, the court may disregard a special verdict of the jury and make its own findings of fact and conclusions of law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 884; vol. 19, Equity, §§ 815, 816.]

2. DEEDS — DELIVERY — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

Certain deeds to a wife were found in a bank among the grantor's papers after his death. There was testimony that the grantee during her life stated that she never saw the deeds until they were found after his death. The scrivener delivered the deeds to the grantor, and the banker could not remember the circumstances of their deposit. Held insufficient to show a delivery.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 16, Deeds, §§ 625–634.]

3. WILLS — CONSTRUCTION — RESIDUARY DEVISE — LANDS SUPPOSED TO HAVE BEEN DEEDED.

Certain deeds to a wife, signed by a decedent but never delivered, were found among his papers after his death, and the property covered thereby was not specifically mentioned in his will. Held to pass to the grantee under a devise to her of the "residue of my estate both real and personal of whatever kind, whether * * * chattels, lands," etc.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, §§ 1279–1291.]

4. SAME—RESIDUARY CLAUSE.

Certain deeds, executed by a testator but undelivered during his life, having been discovered after his death, the lands covered thereby were not returned in the inventory. The decree of distribution under the will, which did not mention the lands, but contained a sweeping residuary clause, gave the residue of the estate in the hands of the executrix "and any other property" belonging to the estate, "not now known or discovered," to the residuary devisee who was also grantee in the deed. Held, that such lands passed under the residuary decree.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, §§ 1279–1291.]

5. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE — CONTRACT TO MAKE WILL.

In an action for specific performance of an alleged oral contract of a decedent to make a will, the only evidence as to such contract was evidence of decedent's statements that she was not to make a will, that there was no agreement to that effect, and that decedent never told the witness that there was any agreement as to her disposition of the property before or upon her death. Held sufficient to support a finding of no contract.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Specific Performance, §§ 387–395.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by Vincent R. Ostrom and others against N. E. De Yoe and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants and an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

L. J. Maddux, for appellants. P. J. Hazen and Wm. O. Minor, for respondents.

BUCKLES, J. This is an action to enforce a trust in certain real and personal property, based on a supposed verbal contract, made by Caroline De Yoe, under whom defendants claim, with Stephen Rogers, her then husband, under whom plaintiffs claim—by which contract appellants claim said Caroline obligated herself to make a will, which is admitted she never made. The action was tried by the court; certain special issues were submitted to a jury which answered the same adversely to the defendants; the court reserved the action for further consideration, heard further testimony, and, when the case was argued and submitted, made and filed its findings and decision, rendering judgment thereon in favor of defendants. The plaintiffs appeal from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial. Stephen Rogers and Caroline Rogers were husband and wife, and, during their married life, had accumulated a large amount of property. In January, 1885, Stephen Rogers made several deeds of gift to his said wife of 1,524.06 acres of his land and numerous town lots, and on December 18, 1886, he made another deed of gift to the said wife of 3,967.34 acres, generally known as the "Oak Flat." These deeds were found after Stephen Rogers' death in a tin box in which he kept his papers, deposited in the First National Bank of Modesto, and were recorded March 26, 1888, at the request of Ora McHenry. Stephen Rogers died testate March 21, 1888. On December 31, 1886, he made his will. The property described in the said deeds was not described in the will nor returned in the inventory in the probating of said will and settlement of his estate. The will was admitted to probate April 21, 1888, and the said Caroline Rogers appointed executrix. The devises in said will over which this controversy arises are as follows:

"Third. I give and bequeath to my grandson, Stephen Roy Rogers, son of Stimpson P. Rogers and Ella Rogers, the sum of ten thousand ($10,000) dollars, to be paid to him as hereinafter directed, and only after the death of my said wife Caroline if she survive me; the income from the said ten thousand dollars to be paid to said Stephen Roy Rogers personally for his own private use from the time he be fifteen years old till he be twenty-one years old; and then when he be twenty-one years old, I direct that he be paid five thousand dollars, being half of the above-named bequest, and that from the time he is twenty-one till he be twenty-five (25) years old, I direct that the income from the remaining five thousand dollars be paid him annually for his private use. And then, when he the said Stephen Roy Rogers be twenty-five years old, I direct the remaining five thousand dollars paid to him personally, for his own exclusive and private use. If my said grandson die before arriving at the ages herein named, then the remaining or unpaid amounts of said bequest, together with the income thereon, I direct shall be distributed as the other portion of my estate shall be or shall have been distributed, namely, to the brothers and sisters of myself and wife Caroline, share and share alike.

"Fourth. The residue of my estate, both real and personal, of whatever kind, whether money, credits, chattels, lands, houses or shares in corporations, and wheresoever situated, I give, bequeath, and devise to my beloved wife, Caroline Rogers, if she survive me. And it is my will and I so direct, that my said wife also have the exclusive and absolute control, during her life, of that part of my estate hereinbefore devised to Lizzie Kay and Stephen Roy Rogers.

"Fifth. If I survive my said wife Caroline, then I give, bequeath, and devise all the residue of my estate, both real and personal, and wheresoever situated, share and share alike, to my grandson, the said Stephen Roy Rogers, if he be then living, and to my brothers and sisters, and to the brothers and sisters of my said wife Caroline; or if any of the said brothers and sisters be dead, and their children shall take the share of their parent, respectively, save and except only Gilbert P. Ostrom, son of Jemima Ostrom, and also Clarence Cotton, son of Jacob Cotton, to whom I bequeath nothing; and I will and bequeath, in case I survive their parents, or either of them, the share of my estate hereinbefore given to said Jemima Ostrom and Jacob Cotton, to the remaining brother and sister of said G. P. Ostrom and Clarence Cotton, respectively."

Stephen R. Rogers died May 15, 1899. The court made and entered its decree of distribution of said estate, and was in accordance with said will. The decree contained the following clause: "And the residue of said estate of Stephen Rogers, deceased, hereinafter particularly described and now remaining in the hands of said executrix, and any other property not now known or discovered which may belong to the said estate, or in which the said estate may have any interest, be and the same is hereby distributed as follows, to wit:" To Lizzie Kay, $1,000 if she survive Caroline Rogers. The remainder to Caroline Rogers. No objection is made to the decree. On April 25, 1894, Caroline Rogers married N. E. De Yoe, who is a defendant in this action. She died February 29, 1904. The plaintiffs in their complaint allege as follows: "That prior to, and at the time of, the making and execution of the said will hereinbefore set forth by the said Stephen Rogers, it was mutually understood and agreed by and between the said Stephen Rogers and the said Caroline De Yoe, then Caroline Rogers, and the said Caroline Rogers promised and agreed to and with the said Stephen Rogers that, if the said Stephen Rogers would make and execute the will hereinbefore set forth, the said Caroline Rogers would make and execute her will, and upon her death give and bequeath all of the property owned and possessed by the said Caroline Rogers and Stephen Rogers at the time of his death, and all the property possessed by her at her death, and all the proceeds of such property, in equal shares to Stephen Roy Rogers, if he then be living, and to the brothers and sisters of the said Stephen Rogers and brothers and sisters of said Caroline Rogers, or, if any of the said brothers and sisters be dead, then to their children, said children to take the share of the parent, respectively, save and except Gilbert P. Ostrom and Clarence Cotton, and, in case of the death of Stephen Roy Rogers, then to be willed to the brothers and sisters of Steven Rogers and Caroline Rogers, and their children, as aforesaid. That, pursuant to said agreement, and being induced by said agreement and promise of said Caroline Rogers and relying thereon, said Stephen Rogers made and executed the will and testament hereinbefore fully set forth."

The complaint prays for a specific performance of the alleged agreement and that the said deeds of Stephen Rogers to Caroline Rogers be set aside. The answer denies that there ever was such a contract, admits the making and execution of said deeds, and alleges that such deeds were delivered to Caroline Rogers and were for good and valid considerations and conveyed all the interest of Stephen Rogers in said land to Caroline Rogers. After denying fully the allegations of the complaint the defendants for a separate defense plead laches on the part of plaintiffs, and that they should be estopped from asserting and claiming any right to the lands by reason of allowing the rights of defendants to accrue without any knowledge of plaintiffs' claim; pleads the statute of limitations; also that plaintiffs' alleged claim is based upon an alleged agreement which is void and cannot be enforced because not in writing; also that said claim cannot be enforced because an attempt is made to create a trust to hold real estate and suspend the power of alienation; also that, if said agreement was made, it is void because made by Caroline Rogers, a married woman. This being an equity case, the special verdict of the jury was but advisory, and the court had a right to disregard it, which the court did by saying: "And the court, being fully advised in the premises, does not approve of said verdict, but now makes and files its findings of fact and conclusions of law." Galvin v. Palmer, 113 Cal. 50, 45 Pac. 172.

The testimony in the case as to the deeds was as follows: O. McHenry testified that he had seen the said deeds (Stephen Rogers to Caroline Rogers) in the First National Bank of Modesto; that they were recorded by him at his father's request and that his father was the custodian thereof; and that they were recorded on the dates shown on the deeds, to wit, March 26, 1888. The deeds were introduced in evidence and the witness Miss Jennie Broughton said that Mrs. Caroline Rogers had "discovered some deeds made by Stephen Rogers with me. She said she found them in a little brown box—tin box, I think it was—that she said to me, she says, 'you know that Stephen always kept his business papers in.' He had that little box on the ranch, and after he died she found the deed, she said, when she opened that box. If I remember right, she said, 'The box was in the First National Bank,' and said, 'The first time she saw the deeds was after he died, and she went and opened his box.'" L. B. Walthal testified that he drew the deeds at the request of Stephen Rogers and delivered them to him. He also drew the will. J. E. Ward, cashier of the First National Bank of Modesto, testified: "I remember the deeds introduced in evidence being left in the bank, but do not remember the circumstances." This is all the evidence in relation to the deeds.

The court found as follows: "Each and all of the deeds referred to in said complaint were made, executed, and delivered, at the times of their respective dates, for good and sufficient considerations, and were valid conveyances of the property therein described, and conveyed title thereto to said Caroline Rogers as of the dates of said deeds, and she and her successors have been, since the death of Stephen Rogers, the owners in fee simple thereof, claiming title and asserting such ownership against all the world." The delivery of the deeds before the death of Stephen Rogers is not shown to have taken place. But the finding is immaterial. The deeds not having been delivered, no title to the lands mentioned therein passed under said deeds to Caroline Rogers, and said lands remained a part of said estate and would be and were included in the residue of the estate devised to Caroline Rogers. The making of the deeds furnished sufficient reason for omitting any mention in the will of the lands attempted to be conveyed by said deeds, for the deeds had been drawn and executed prior to making the will. Evidently the testator did not realize, when he made his will, that these lands were still a part of his estate. However, the decree of distribution herein referred to distributed these lands to Caroline Rogers under that clause "and any other property not now known or discovered which may belong to the said estate or in which the said estate may have any interest."

Irrespective of the will, one-half of these lands belonged to the widow at the death of Stephen Rogers, because they were community property. The widow went into possession of all the property devised to her including these lands, under the decree of distribution in the Stephen Rogers estate, made October 9, 1890, and held the same as her own, farmed and controlled the lands and managed the same, and her holding was open and notorious to all the world from that date until her death in 1904. The court found there was no contract or agreement between Stephen Rogers and Caroline Rogers; that she did not promise or agree with Stephen Rogers, if he would make and execute his said will as he did or for any other consideration, that she would make her will, or upon her death give or bequeath the property, or any part thereof, as alleged in said complaint, nor did said Caroline Rogers at any time make any such contract or agreement; that the will of Stephen Rogers was not made pursuant to any agreement such as is alleged in the complaint, and he did not rely upon any such agreement or promise when he made his will. The only witness who gives any testimony at all concerning the contract or agreement between Stephen Rogers and his wife was that of Miss Broughton, who said Mrs. Rogers would tell her that she was not to make a will, that there was no agreement that she was to make a will, and, when finally the court asked this witness, "Did she ever tell you at any time she had agreed, or made a contract, with Stephen Rogers that she was to do anything with the property upon her death or prior to her death?" She answered, "I don't think so."

There is testimony supporting every material finding the trial court made, and these findings warrant the judgment "that plaintiffs have no right, title, interest, or claim in or to any of the property described in the complaint, and that defendants are the owners of, and entitled to, the whole thereof, freed of any claim of plaintiffs thereto, etc."

Judgment and order affirmed.

FLEMING v. HOWARD et al. (Sac. 1,358.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 11, 1906.)

1. APPEAL—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—FINDINGS—REVIEW.

A finding of the trial court based on conflicting evidence will not be reversed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3983.]

2. EASEMENTS—ADVERSE USE—PRESUMPTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Open, visible, continuous, and unmolested use of a way for more than 30 years prior to the commencement of an action with reference thereto is sufficient to raise a presumption that the use was under an adverse claim of right sufficient to establish a prima facie title by prescription, and the burden of proof is on the party alleging that the use was permissive to prove such fact by affirmative evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, Easements, § 89.]

3. EVIDENCE—WEIGHT.

Where a hostile witness uses expressions favorable to the side he opposes, the court may properly attach more importance thereto than to the main purport of his narrative.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by David M. Fleming against Annie Howard and others. From an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

Sullivan & Sullivan, Theo. J. Roche, and H. D. Gill, for appellants. Frank R. Devlin, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The sole question presented in this case is the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding that the plaintiff's predecessors in interest acquired by prescription the private right of way involved.

The case comes within the well-known rule that this court is bound by a decision of the lower court upon conflicting evidence. There was evidence to the effect that the road, or way, across the defendants' land, had been used in connection with, and for the benefit of, plaintiff's land, continuously and without interruption, from the year 1871 down to 1902, immediately before the action was begun. There was no dispute over the fact that the use was continuous during this period. It was also shown that during at least the last 27 years of the time gates were maintained and kept in repair by the owners of plaintiff's land at each end of the way; one of them being placed in the fence belonging to the defendants. The testimony on behalf of the plaintiff was to the effect that the use, during the entire period, was undisturbed. That it was adverse in its inception is not denied. Casey, who was the owner of the plaintiff's land from 1875 until June, 1902, testifying for the defendants, said, in substance, that during the first three years of his ownership he used the way under a claim of right. If the testimony on behalf of the defendants is disregarded, or only those parts are accepted which tend to confirm the plaintiff's case, as some parts of it do, the fact is clearly established that there was an open, visible, continuous, and unmolested use of the way for more than 30 years prior to the beginning of the action. Under these circumstances it will be presumed that the use was under a claim of right, and adverse and a prima facie title by prescription is thereby established. Washburn on Easements (4th Ed.) 156; 14 Cyc. 1147; Kripp v. Curtis, 71 Cal. 66, 11 Pac. 879; Franz v. Mendonca, 131 Cal. 209, 63 Pac. 361. "A presumption that the use was under a claim of right and adverse arises from an undisputed use of an easement for the established period of prescription; and the burden is upon the party alleging that the use has been by virtue of a license or permission to prove that fact by affirmative evidence. * * * Where an open and uninterrupted use of an easement for a sufficient length of time to create the presumption of a grant is shown, if the other party relies on the fact that these acts or any part of them were permissive, it is incumbent on such party, by sufficient proof, to rebut such presumption on a non-appearing grant; otherwise the presumption stands as sufficient proof, and establishes the right." Jones on Easements, § 186.

It is claimed that the testimony of the defendants, and of Casey in their behalf, satisfactorily explains this use, and conclusively shows that it was by permission, and therefore not adverse; but this testimony as to permission, though not directly contradicted, was, in its most important part, inherently improbable, or at least it might reasonably have been so considered by the court below. It was, to some extent, equivocal in the use of terms. The defendants themselves were interested witnesses, and their testimony was contradictory to each other and of that of Casey in important details. Casey's testimony was, to some extent, impeached by proof of inconsistent statements and conduct, and he appears to have been somewhat interested in favor of the defendants. Some parts of his testimony slightly corroborated the plaintiff's case, as also do parts of the testimony of the defendants. Where a hostile witness uses expressions favorable to the side he opposes, a court may properly attach more importancce thereto than to the main purport of his narrative. The combined effect of all these circumstances may have so impaired the credit of these witnesses in the mind of the court below that it may have disbelieved them entirely, or regarded only those parts of their testimony which were favorable to the plaintiff. Upon this ground it may have considered their attempted explanation of the character of the use of the way as unreliable, unsatisfactory, and insufficient to prove permissive use. In view of the findings, we are bound to presume that it did so consider it. Its conclusions as to the credibility of the testimony in this respect cannot, under the circumstances stated, be overturned or changed by the Supreme Court. Anglo-California Bank v. Cerf, 147 Cal. 396, 81 Pac. 1081.

The order denying the defendants' motion for a new trial is affirmed.

PLUMAS COUNTY v. WHEELER et al.

(Sac. 1,361.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 1, 1906. Rehearing Denied Oct. 31, 1906.)

1. LICENSES—TAXATION FOR REVENUE—POWER OF COUNTY—STATUTES.

Under Const, art. 11, § 11, providing that any county may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with General Laws, and Pol. Code, § 3366, declaring that boards of supervisors shall, in the exercise of their police powers, and for the purpose of regulation, and not otherwise, have power to license all and every kind of business not prohibited by law, etc., boards of supervisors are precluded from issuing business licenses for revenue, as previously authorized by county government act (St. 1897, p. 465, c. 277, § 25, subd. 25).

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Licenses, § 6.]

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — POLICE POWER — SCOPE.

It is within the legislative discretion to place such restrictions on the use of any property or the conduct of any business as may be reasonably necessary for the protection of the public safety, comfort, or health.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 10, Constitutional Law, § 148.]

3. LICENSES — REGULATION OF BUSINESS — FEES.

The power to regulate a business may be exercised by means of a license fee or charge, the amount of which is not greater than is reasonably necessary to pay for such regulation.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Licenses, § 15.]

4. SAME—SHEEP RAISING.

A county authorized to regulate every kind of business passed an ordinance for the regulation of sheep raising within the county, prohibiting the bringing of sheep or lambs within the county infected with certain diseases, and the grazing of sheep or lambs on public roads or trails, the dipping thereof near public highways or buildings, and requiring that every sheep herder should procure a license and pay a license fee of 10 cents for each sheep or lamb owned by or under his control. Held, that the license fee was not so excessive that it could be said, as a matter of law, that the ordinance was a revenue measure, but that whether it was so or not, should be determined from the conditions existing in the particular county when the ordinance was passed.

5. SAME.

Under Pol. Code, § 3366, restricting the licensing power of county supervisors to licensing for regulation, in the exercise of their police powers, and authorizing them to fix rates of license tax, and providing for the collection thereof by suit or otherwise, the fact that an ordinance imposing a license tax on sheep grazing authorized a suit by the county to recover the license fee did not indicate that the tax was exacted for revenue.

6. SAME—STATUTES.

A county ordinance regulating sheep grazing, and imposing a license tax thereon "is a law of this state" within Pen. Code, § 435, providing that every person commencing or carrying on any business for which a license is required by any "law of this state," without taking out or procuring the license prescribed, is guilty of a misdemeanor.

7. SAME—PENALTIES—COUNTY ORDINANCES—GENERAL LAW.

Under Pen. Code, § 435, providing that every person who commences or carries on any business for which a license is required by any law of the state, without procuring such license, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, a county ordinance regulating sheep raising, and imposing a license on such business, was sufficient to prohibit the doing of such business without a license and to attach a penalty thereto, though the ordinance in itself provided no punishment therefor.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by Plumas county against D. C. Wheeler and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and L. N. Peter, Dist. Atty., for appellant. Cheney & Massey (Campbell, Metson & Campbell, of counsel), for respondents.

SLOSS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants, entered upon the plaintiff's failure to amend its complaint after a general demurrer thereto had been sustained. The action was brought by the county of Plumas to recover the sum of $1,300, alleged to be due it from defendants as a license fee for conducting the business of raising, grazing, herding and pasturing sheep and lambs within the county. The plaintiff's claim is based upon an ordinance adopted by the county supervisors, in January, 1902, and set forth in full in the complaint. The enactment is entitled "An ordinance regulating the business of raising, grazing, herding, and pasturing sheep and lambs in the county of Plumas, state of California." Section 1 requires persons engaging in the described business in the county to present annually to the license collector an affidavit showing the number of sheep or lambs owned or controlled by them in the county, and whether such sheep or lambs are infected with contagious disease. Section 2 prohibits the bringing into the county of sheep or lambs infected with certain diseases. Sections 3, 4, 5. 6, and 7 make certain provisions regulating the conduct of said business. In a general way, it is sufficient to say that provision is made against the camping or grazing of sheep or lambs on public roads or trails, against dipping near public highways or buildings, and against such acts as would cause injury to the roads or trails of the county or delay and inconvenience to travelers. Section 8 makes a violation of any of the preceding sections a misdemeanor. Section 9, which provides for the license here sought to be collected, reads as follows: "Section 9. Every person, firm or corporation engaging in said Plumas county in the business of raising, grazing, herding, or pasturing sheep or lambs must annually, at the time of the commencement of said business, procure a license therefor from the license collector of said county, and must pay for said license, the license fee or charge of ten cents for each sheep or lamb owned by, in the possession of, or under the control of such person, firm or corporation." The remaining sections of the ordinance (except section 13, which will be referred to hereafter) provide for the collection of the license fee, section 16 declaring that the license fee or charge is a debt owing to the county, and shall become due and payable to the county in advance. Section 11 authorizes the district attorney to bring suit, in the name of the county, to recover license fees due.

The complaint alleges that the defendants, between May 1, 1902, and June 19, 1902, were engaged in the business of raising, grazing, herding and pasturing sheep and lambs in the county of Plumas, that during that time they owned and possessed in said county 13,000 sheep and lambs, and that they have failed and refused to take out a license or to pay any license fee. If the ordinance in question is a valid exercise of the legislative power of the county, the complaint states a cause of action. And, on the record before us, consisting simply of the complaint and the demurrer, the validity of the ordinance must be determined from an inspection of its provisions alone, read in the light of facts within the judicial knowledge of the court. Unless, so read, it appears that the ordinance is invalid on its face, the order sustaining the demurrer cannot be upheld. Under the state Constitution (article 11, § 11) "any county * * * may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws." Section 3366 of the Political Code, enacted in 1901, provides that "boards of supervisors of the counties of the state * * * shall, in the exercise of their police powers, and for the purpose of regulation, as herein provided, and not otherwise, have power to license all and every kind of business not prohibited by law, and transacted and carried on within the limits of their respective jurisdictions * * * to fix the rates of license tax upon the same, and to provide for the collection of the same by suit or otherwise." The effect of this statutory provision was to cut off the power, theretofore residing in boards of supervisors under the county government act (section 25, subd. 25, St. 1897, p. 465, c. 277) to collect a license tax for revenue. "The words 'not otherwise' curtail and cut off all power boards of supervisors theretofore had to issue licenses and charge therefor as a revenue measure. * * * Indeed, it may be said that every feature of this act of 1901 indicates a plain purpose upon the part of the Legislature to restrict the licensing power of boards of supervisors and city councils to matters of regulation alone." Ex parte Pfirrmann, 134 Cal. 143, 66 Pac. 205.

Can the ordinance now before us be sustained as a valid exercise of the power of the county to regulate the business of raising, herding, grazing and pasturing sheep? The principles affecting the right of legislative bodies in the exercise of what is known as the "police power," to place restrictions upon the conduct of lawful pursuits and occupations, are well settled, although there is often great difficulty in applying these principles to a given state of facts. It is within the legislative discretion to place such restrictions upon the use of any property or the conduct of any business as may be reasonably necessary for the public safety, comfort or health. "The police power, the power to make laws to secure the comfort, convenience, peace, and health of the community, is an extensive one, and in its exercise a very wide discretion as to what is needful or proper for the purpose is necessarily committed to the legislative body in which the power to make such laws is vested." Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 32 Pac. 870, 19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152. Rights of property, like all other social and conventional rights, are subject to such reasonable limitations in their enjoyment as shall prevent them from being injurious, and to such reasonable restraints and regulations established by law, as the Legislature, under the governing and controlling power vested in them by the Constitution, may think necessary and expedient." Commonwealth v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53. "The most proper business may be regulated to prevent its becoming offensive to the public sense of decency, or for any other reason injurious or dangerous." Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) 753. The manner and extent of such regulation are primarily legislative questions, and the courts will not interfere unless it clearly appears that the Legislature has, under the guise of regulation, imposed an arbitrary or unreasonable burden upon the use of property or the pursuit of an occupation. But the legislative determination is not conclusive. As this court said, in Re Smith, 143 Cal. 368, 77 Pac. 180: "The law will not allow the rights of property or business to be invaded under the guise of police regulation for the benefit of the public health or good order, when it is manifest that such is not the object or purpose of the enactment or by-law." "The question in each case," says the Supreme Court of the United States, "is whether the Legislature has adopted the statute in exercise of a reasonable discretion, or whether its action be a mere excuse for an unjust discrimination, or the oppression, or spoliation of a particular class." Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 18 Sup. Ct. 383, 42 L. Ed. 780. It is also well settled that the power to regulate a business may be exercised by means of a license fee or charge. The amount of the license fee, however, must not be more than is reasonably necessary for the purpose sought, i. e., the regulation of the business. If it is so great that the court can plainly see that the purpose of its imposition was to realize a revenue under the guise of regulating the business, the provision for the fee cannot stand as an exercise of the police power. The elements that may properly be taken into consideration by the legislative body in determining the amount of license fee that may, for purposes of regulation, be imposed upon any business, are stated in two recent decisions of the United States Supreme Court. Both were cases involving the validity of ordinances imposing license charges upon telegraph poles and wires. Western Union Telegraph Co. v. New Hope, 187 U. S. 419, 23 Sup. Ct. 204, 47 L. Ed. 240, was an action by the borough of New Hope to recover from the telegraph company a license fee of $1 per pole and $2.50 per mile of wire on the poles and wires maintained by the defendant within its limits. The defendant contended that the requirement of the fee amounted to a regulation of interstate commerce. Judgment for the plaintiff upon the verdict of a jury was affirmed, the court quoting with approval the following language of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in Taylor v. Postal Tel. Cable Co., 202 Pa. 583, 52 Atl. 128: "Clearly the reasonableness of the fee is not to be measured by the value of the poles and wires or of the land occupied, nor by the profits of the business. The elements which enter into the charge are the necessary or probable expense incident to the issuance of the license and the probable expense of such inspection, regulation, and police surveillance as municipal authorities may lawfully give to the erection and maintenance of the poles and wires. * * * Whether or not the fee is so obviously excessive as to lead irresistibly to the conclusion that it is exacted as a return for the use of the streets, or is imposed for revenue purposes, is a question for the courts and is to be determined upon a view of the facts." In Atlantic & Pac. Tel. Co. v. Philadelphia, 190 U. S. 160, 23 Sup. Ct. 817, 47 L. Ed. 995, action had been brought on a similar ordinance. In holding that the reasonableness of the charge was a question of fact upon which the parties were entitled to the finding of a jury, the court states the rule in the language of Mr. Justice Shiras in a similar case in the Circuit Court of Appeals (Philadelphia v. Western U. Tel. Co., 89 Fed. 454, 32 C. C. A. 246), i. e. "When it is said, in some of the cases, that such a question is for the determination of the court, it is not meant that the question may not properly be submitted to a jury. What is meant by such observations is that courts are not precluded from considering the reasonableness of the legislative act prescribing the terms and amount of the charges. * * * Regarding, then, the issue to be tried as one of fact, we think it is one which, from its nature, is eminently fit for the determination of a jury. The expenses attending direct regulation and oversight are not only to be considered, but also the incidental cost to which the municipality is subjected in providing for and maintaining a proper system of supervision. We cannot undertake to specify all the particulars which should be brought into view where the reasonableness of a municipal ordinance is challenged in a court; but we think that the rule laid down in Cooley, Const. Lim. (Ed. 1886) p. 242, may be safely adopted: 'A municipal corporation may impose, under the police power, such a charge for the license as will cover the necessary expenses of issuing it, and the additional labor of officers and other expenses, thereby incurred.'" It is not to be understood from these citations that the costs to the municipality which may be considered are simply those which arise directly in the enforcement of the regulatory provisions themselves. The license fee may properly be fixed with a view to reimbursing the city, town or county for all expense imposed upon it by the business sought to be regulated. "In fixing upon the fee, it is proper and reasonable to take into account not the expense merely of direct regulation, but all the incidental consequences that may be likely to subject the public to cost in consequence of the business licensed." Cooley on Taxation, p. 599. Thus, in Philadelphia v. W. U. Tel. Co., 89 Fed. 460, 32 C. C. A. 246 in which the rule was stated in language which has had the approval of the United States Supreme Court, it was held to be error, in a case involving the reasonableness of a charge for maintaining telegraph poles and wires, to exclude evidence tending to show that the city was, by reason of the wires, put to additional expense in providing a greater number of fire companies and apparatus.

Applying these rules to the ordinance before us, can it be said that the charge of 10 cents per head of sheep and lambs is so clearly excessive, so grossly disproportionate to the expense incurred by the county by reason of this business, that the enactment is void upon its face? It is to be remembered that the presumption is in favor of the reasonableness of the charge, and that the county is not limited to the exact amount of the expense, as it may subsequently develop. "The municipality is at liberty to make the charge large enough to cover any reasonable anticipated expenses." A. & P. Tel. Co. v. Philadelphia, supra. The herding, pasturing, and raising of sheep is undoubtedly a lawful, indeed a necessary, vocation. But there can be no question that it, in common with the keeping of other kinds of livestock, is an occupation which may properly be subjected to reasonable restrictions for the purpose of preventing or lessening the annoyance or discomfort which, if unrestrained, it would be likely to cause. Tiedeman, State & Federal Control, p. 838; Sifers v. Johnson (Idaho) 65 Pac. 709, 54 L. R. A. 785. The first eight sections of the ordinance under examination indicate the nature of some of the objectionable features of this business. Certain acts are prohibited, and the violation of these acts is made a misdemeanor. As bearing upon the expense to which the county may be subjected, we note that it is made the duty of the peace officers in the various townships to cause the ordinance to be enforced and to report all violations thereof, and claims for services rendered or expenses incurred in performing these duties are claims against the county. Section 13. What expense the county will be put to in the enforcement of the ordinance cannot be determined from an inspection of the ordinance itself. It is a question of fact, the decision of which will depend upon the evidence to be introduced at a trial. If it should appear that all the items of expense which could reasonably be anticipated—including not only the cost of issuing the license but every other expense arising from the proper supervision or control of the business—would amount to less than ten cents per sheep (or lamb) the ordinance could not be sustained as a regulatory measure. If, on the other hand, it should appear from the facts shown that the reasonably anticipated expenses would equal or exceed the fee exacted, the ordinance must be held valid. Which of these two states of facts existed in Plumas county at the time of the adoption of the ordinance, this court cannot say. The expense to which the county would be put, or could reasonably expect to be put, by the herding, grazing, raising, and pasturing of sheep within its borders depends upon a variety of circumstances of which we do not have judicial knowledge. To arrive at the amount of such expense it would be necessary to consider the topographical conditions of the county, the extent of the industry as practised there, the effect of the industry on the roads, trails and other public property of the county, the probable cost of prosecutions for violations of the ordinance, and any other matters having a reasonable tendency to indicate the cost to which the county would be subjected by the business sought to be regulated. From these elements there could be a determination of the ultimate question of the reasonableness of the charge. And this ultimate question must be determined by a jury (or by the court, if a jury be waived) which has before it the facts from which a conclusion can be drawn. In the absence of any such facts, we cannot say that the charge here imposed is unreasonable. We do not intend to hold that there may not be ordinances imposing license fees so large that they appear, upon a mere reading, to go beyond any reasonable limits allowed under the rules of law which have been discussed. But we think a fee of 10 cents per head on sheep and lambs does not come within this category.

Much stress is laid upon the fact, which appears from decisions of this court in earlier cases (Ex parte Mirande, 73 Cal. 365, 14 Pac. 888; El Dorado v. Meiss, 100 Cal. 268, 34 Pac. 716; Inyo County v. Erro, 119 Cal. 119, 51 Pac. 32; Mono County v. Flanigan, 130 Cal. 105, 62 Pac. 293) that, even when counties had the power to license for revenue, a tax of only five cents per head was imposed by various counties. But this is not conclusive. The conditions in the counties which fixed those taxes may have been entirely different from the conditions existing in Plumas county. "What is reasonable in one municipality may be oppressive and unreasonable in another." Atlantic & Pacific Telegraph Co. v. Philadelphia, supra. And that the reasonableness of such a license fee is peculiarly a question of fact to be determined upon the conditions that may be shown to exist in the particular governmental subdivision imposing the fee is well illustrated by the two cases of Western Union Tel. Co. v. New Hope and Atlantic & Pacific Tel Co. v. Philadelphia, supra, both decided by the Supreme Court of the United States during the same year. Each case involved the validity (as a measure of regulation) of an ordinance imposing a license fee on the maintenance of telegraph poles and wires. The amount of the charge was the same in both cases. In the New Hope Case the question of reasonableness was submitted to a jury, which found in favor of the tax. The judgment was affirmed. In the Philadelphia Case the court took the question from the jury, and directed a verdict upholding the tax. The judgment was reversed, the court holding that the question was one of fact which should have gone to the jury.

In the case at bar we are not aware of any facts from which we can say, as matter of law, that the license fee imposed is necessarily, under all circumstances and in every locality, unreasonable or excessive. It may be unreasonable and excessive, in view of the conditions existing in Plumas county. If it is, the defendants may so allege, and if they prove their allegations they will be under no liability. But, in view of the purpose of the ordinance, as declared in its title, and the presumption of validity attending such enactments, it should not be held that the ordinance is, on its face, a revenue measure disguised as a provision for regulation. We see no force in the contention that the provision in the ordinance authorizing a suit by the county to recover the amount of the license fee indicates that the tax is exacted for revenue, rather than as an exercise of the police power. Pol. Code, § 3366, which restricts the licensing power of the county supervisors to licensing for regulation, in the exercise of their police powers, expressly authorizes them to fix the rates of license tax, and "to provide for the collection of the same by suit or otherwise." Sonora v. Curtin, 137 Cal. 583, 70 Pac. 674, and Santa Monica v. Guidinger, 137 Cal. 658, 70 Pac. 732, decide nothing inconsistent with this view. Those were cases of ordinances imposing license fees for revenue and providing for the collection of the fees by suit. The ordinances were passed prior to the enactment of section 3366. It was held that the adoption of that section repealed the tax in each case, and that the right of action to recover the tax fell with the tax. But it was not held that a charge which a county or city is authorized to impose under Pol. Code, § 3366, cannot be collected by civil suit.

The point is made that the provision requiring the payment of a license fee cannot be regarded as a regulation, inasmuch as the ordinance does not "forbid the carrying on of the business mentioned unless a license be procured." If such prohibition be an essential element of a regulatory license fee, it is supplied by the provisions of Penal Code, § 435, to wit, "Every person who commences or carries on any business, trade, profession, or calling, for the transaction or carrying on of which a license is required by any law of this state, without taking out or procuring the license prescribed by such law, is guilty of a misdemeanor." A county ordinance is a "law of this state" within the meaning of this section. In re Lawrence, 69 Cal. 608, 11 Pac. 217. An ordinance providing no punishment for doing business without a license, but merely providing what the license should be, is therefore, when read in connection with the Penal Code, sufficient to prohibit the doing of such business, and to attach a penalty to the commission of the prohibited act. Ex parte Christensen, 85 Cal. 210, 24 Pac. 747. See, also, In re Sic, 73 Cal. 148, 14 Pac. 405; Ex parte Mansfield, 106 Cal. 400, 39 Pac. 775; Ex parte Stephen, 114 Cal. 282, 46 Pac. 86. Various other points are made by the respondents, but, in our judgment, they are all reducible to, or are based upon, the proposition that the ordinance in question is necessarily to be regarded as a revenue measure. These points are therefore sufficiently answered by what has already been said in this opinion regarding the character of the enactment.

The judgment is reversed.

SIERRA COUNTY v. FLANIGAN. (Sac. 1,305.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 1, 1906. Rehearing Denied Oct. 31, 1906.)

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sierra County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by Sierra county against P. L. Flanigan. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Campbell, Metson & Campbell, A. E. Cheney and Thomas H. Breeze, for appellant. Frank R. Wehe, W. I. Redding, and Solinsky & Wehe, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This case was argued and submitted with Plumas County v. Wheeler et al. (just decided) 87 Pac. 909, and involves the validity of an ordinance of Sierra county, substantially similar to the ordinance of Plumas county, considered in the Wheeler Case. Here a general demurrer to the county's complaint setting forth the ordinance and seeking to recover license fees due under it, was overruled, with leave to the defendant to answer. Upon his default for failure to answer within the time allowed, plaintiff had judgment according to the prayer of its complaint. Defendant appeals.

For the reasons stated in Plumas County v. Wheeler, the complaint stated a cause of action, and the demurrer was properly overruled.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SOEDER. (Crim. 1,283.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 8, 1906.)

1. Criminal Law—Evidence—Admissibility.

That letters offered in evidence to show motive for a homicide were of such character as would prejudice the jury against the defendant could not affect their admissibility if they were otherwise competent.

2. Homicide—Evidence—Admissibility—Motive.

The theory of the state was that defendant had gone abroad and enticed his brother-in-law to this country and murdered him to obtain life insurance money. A series of letters written by defendant while abroad to a young woman showed that he was desirious of marrying her, and was satisfied that to accomplish this that he must immediately obtain a considerable sum of money, and that she would not see or listen to him until such sum was obtained, and it also appeared that he attempted to procure insurance to this same amount. Held, that the letters were admissible to prove motive.

3. Criminal Law — Trial — Course of Conduct—Remarks of Judge.

After a witness concluded his testimony, the court asked him if he understood that defendant was charged with murder and his punishment might be death, and after an affirmative answer said that the court had no desire of intimating that the testimony was true or false, but, that he might have an opportunity of correcting the same, informed him that any person who by willful perjury secured the conviction and execution of an innocent person could be punished by death, and inquired whether, with the knowledge of such punishment, the witness had any change or correction to make in his testimony. Held, that there was no intimation of opinion on the part of the court constituting misconduct prejudicial to defendant's rights.

4. Same.

It was proper for the jury to know in a homicide case that a witness testified with knowledge of the law that perjury leading to a conviction and execution would render the witness liable to punishment by death.

5. WITNESSES—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Where defendant testified that he did not kill deceased or employ any one to kill him, it was proper cross-examination to ask him where he was at the hour of the night the homicide was committed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 50, Witnesses, § 980.]

6. SAME—CREDIBILITY AND IMPEACHMENT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, defendant, having voluntarily testified in his own behalf, became subject to the same rules as other witnesses, and it was competent for the prosecution to show either by cross-examination or the record of the judgment that he had theretofore been convicted of a felony.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 50, Witnesses, §§ 1113, 1129–1132.]

7. CRIMINAL LAW—TRIAL—CONDUCT OF COUNSEL—ARGUMENT.

Counsel in argument may fully state his views as to what the evidence shows, and as to the conclusions to be fairly drawn therefrom.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge.

Leon Soeder was convicted of murder in the first degree, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Edward S. Salomon and Alex. Campbell, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., C. N. Post, Asst. Atty. Gen., J. Charles Jones, and Lewis F. Byington, Dist. Atty., for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The defendant was charged by information filed in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco with the crime of murder, alleged to have been committed on January 10, 1904, by the unlawful killing of one Joseph Blaise, and, having been convicted of murder in the first degree and adjudged to suffer death, appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

There is not, and could not well be, upon the record before us, any claim that the evidence adduced on the trial was insufficient to support the verdict, and it will, therefore, be unnecessary to state the evidence, except in so far as is essential to a proper understanding of the points made for reversal. Between 8 and 9 o'clock a. m. on January 11, 1904, the body of Blaise was found lying on the west side of Taylor street, between Vallejo and Green streets, in the city of San Francisco. The evidence afforded by the condition of the body and of the ground where it lay was clear and convincing to the effect that Blaise had been foully murdered at that place the evening before, by being first struck down from behind with some blunt instrument, and then killed by a knife driven into and drawn clear across the throat, severing carotid artery and jugular vein. The spot where the body was found was a lonely place, Taylor street at Vallejo street running over the brow of Russian Hill, and between Vallejo and Green streets being a very steep grade without sidewalk and without a house on either side. No one witnessed the killing, and the state was, therefore, without direct evidence as to the identity of the murderer. Blaise, according to the statements of defendant, was the husband of defendant's sister, who lives in Germany, and has never been in this country. He was apparently a laborer and without means, and at the time of his death had been in the United States only about six weeks, and in San Francisco for less than a month, having left his home in Germany with defendant in November, 1903. He was entirely without knowledge of the English language. On January 7, 1904, defendant had succeeded in obtaining two policies of insurance on the life of Blaise, one of which was an accident policy for $3,000, payable to defendant, and the other of which was an ordinary life policy for $3,000, payable to defendant's sister, who, as already stated, was in Europe. The theory of the prosecution was that the defendant, who had lived in this state for several years, went from California to Germany for the purpose of bringing Blaise to this country, so that he might then insure his life here, and subsequently kill or otherwise dispose of him, in order to obtain the insurance money, and that, in pursuance of this plan, he did bring Blaise from his home in Germany to San Francisco and there obtained insurance on his life, and then lured him to this lonely spot on Russian Hill and there killed him, so that he might realize on the investment he had made. Difficult as it is to conceive of a human being so constituted that he could deliberately make and carry into execution such a plan, the evidence sufficiently supports the theory above stated.

1. A portion of the evidence introduced by the prosecution in support of this theory consisted of certain letters written by defendant to a young woman in San Francisco. The admission of these letters in evidence, over the objection of defendant, is claimed to have constituted prejudicial error. It is urged that the letters are of such a character that they must have prejudiced the jury against the defendant. This, of course, would be no sufficient objection to their being received in evidence if they were relevant to any material fact in issue. Evidence having a direct tendency, in view of the surrounding circumstances, to prove motive on the part of a person for a crime, and thus to solve a doubt "either as to identity of the slayer, the degree of the offense, the insanity of the defendant, or to the justification or excusability of his act," is admissible against a defendant, however discreditably it may reflect on him, and even where it may show him guilty of other crimes. See People v. Cook (Cal. Sup.) 83 Pac. 43, 46, 50; People v. Suesser, 142 Cal. 354, 363, 75 Pac. 1093. In People v. Brown, 130 Cal. 591, 594, 62 Pac. 1072, this court, quoting approvingly from People v. Stout (N. Y.) 4 Park C. C.

128, said: "Whatever fact tends legitimately and fairly, according to the ordinary operation of the human mind and the ordinary principles of human conduct, to show motive, may properly be given in evidence in proof of any assumed motive for the commission of the crime." Evidence as to a motive for the killing on the part of the defendant is peculiarly material in a case where the identity of the party who committed the crime is a fact in dispute, though, as we have seen, the rule as to its admissibility does not confine it to such cases. See People v. Cook, supra.

We have no doubt that the letters admitted in evidence in this case were admissible upon the question of motive. The evidence of the young woman to whom they were written showed that from April, 1903, to the time of his departure for Germany on October 16, 1903, defendant had been most anxious to win her favorable regard, and especially desirous of showing to her that he was possessed of money. He had been assiduous in his attentions, had made her presents of articles aggregating several hundred dollars in value, and had also represented to her that money had been bequeathed to him by an uncle in Germany, which he would shortly obtain, and that he would be a wealthy man. He left California on October 16, 1903, with the purpose avowed to her of obtaining a portion of the money given to him, telling her that the lowest sum he would come back with would be $10,000, which sum, it may properly be noted in passing, was the exact amount of life insurance that defendant sought to obtain on the life of Blaise, the insurance companies applied to refusing to issue a policy in such a large amount. The letters introduced in evidence, eight in number, were written by defendant between the time of his departure and January 1, 1904, several having been written in New York and France, and at least three in San Francisco after his return. This series of letters, the last of which was mailed December 29, 1903, unmistakably shows that defendant for some reason was most desirous of marrying the young woman, and also that he was satisfied that it was essential to the accomplishment of this that he should immediately obtain a considerable sum of money from some source, and that it would be useless to persist in further attentions, or even to see her, until such money was obtained. It throws some light upon the question as to the ultimate object of the earnest efforts of defendant to obtain insurance in large amounts upon the life of Blaise, indicating an object the accomplishment of which, viz., the immediate obtaining of the insurance money, necessarily included the death of Blaise or his disappearance under such circumstances as to make sufficient proof of death possible. It had a direct tendency to show a motive on the part of defendant for the doing of that which would make the insurance policies payable, as he undoubtedly believed the death of Blaise would do, and thus to show a motive on his part for the killing of Blaise. While the effect in this behalf of the first seven letters may have been somewhat impaired by the last letter, written December 29, 1903, wherein defendant reproaches the young woman for not having answered any of his letters or sent him any word or come to see him, all because he had disappointed her in not sooner procuring money, and declares the engagement broken, and demands a return of his presents, such effect was not destroyed thereby. The letter was of such a character that it certainly cannot be held that it shows, as a matter of law, that defendant had given up all desire or hope of winning the hand of the young woman, or that he did not feel that with money in his possession he could still obtain her.

It is suggested that, as the life policy was payable to the wife of Blaise, defendant could not derive any benefit therefrom, and there was, therefore, so far as such policy was concerned, no possible motive on his part for the killing of Blaise. This suggestion, however, is practically without force when we remember that this wife, if there was such a person, was, according to the testimony, the sister of defendant, and a resident of a country thousands of miles away. In the light of all the facts, it is apparent that defendant expected to himself handle the proceeds of such policy. It must also be borne in mind that we have nothing except the statement of defendant, acquiesced in by Blaise when alive, to show that Blaise was the brother-in-law of defendant, or that he had a wife at all.

2. One Cooper, who was a cellmate of defendant in the county jail while defendant was confined there awaiting trial, and who testified that he had known defendant prior to the killing of Blaise, gave testimony to the effect that the defendant had admitted to him that he killed Blaise for the purpose of obtaining the insurance, and had, with the aid of a pencil drawing which defendant himself admittedly made, given him a detailed statement of the locality where and the manner in which the crime had been committed. He further testified that defendant had asked him to assist in establishing an alibi. After Cooper had concluded his testimony, the court asked Cooper if he understood that the defendant was charged with murder, and that the punishment for murder of the first degree might be death, and Cooper answered in the affirmative. The court then said: "Now, the court has no desire or intention of intimating in either way that your testimony is true or that it is false, but that you may have an opportunity of correcting the same, if any be untrue, I inform you that, under the law of this state, any person who, by willful perjury, secures the conviction and execution of any innocent person is punishable by death. With the knowledge of the punishment attached in such case, have you any change or correction to make in your testimony?" The witness answered in the negative. The district attorney then asked: "You have no change or correction to make?" and Cooper answered: "None." This occurred in the presence of the jury. No objection or intimation that the same was not entirely satisfactory was made by defendant in regard to any of these questions, and no exception was taken to the action of the court or district attorney in the matter.

It is now urged that the court had no right to pursue this course of examination, for the reason that it thereby intimated to the jury an opinion on the part of the court as to the truth or falsity of Cooper's evidence, and also that it was prejudicial to the accused, as it left with the jury the impression that the witness had testified truthfully. Under our system, the trial judge is rigorously prohibited from action or words having the effect of conveying to the jury his personal opinion as to the truth or falsity of any evidence. The determination of questions of fact must be made by the jury free from the influence that knowledge of the trial judge's views thereon might have. If there was anything in the action complained of that would have the effect of intimating to the jury views on the part of the court as to Cooper's evidence, which were adverse to defendant's interests, defendant would have good ground for complaint. We are, however, unable to see therein any intimation on the part of the court of an opinion unfavorable to the defendant, and in favor of the evidence given by Cooper. If, despite the court's express disavowal of an intent to intimate either way as to the truth or falsity of the evidence given by Cooper, the statement made and questions asked by the court had the effect of conveying any intimation of opinion on its part, such intimation was that the court was inclined to doubt the truth of the evidence, rather than to believe it. If it had been otherwise, there could have been no occasion for making the statement and asking the questions, for certainly it could not have been, and cannot now be, assumed by any one from the nature of the statement and questions, that it was the desire of the court thereby to fortify and emphasize the evidence given by the witness. It may be that the necessary effect of the statement and questions was to intimate a doubt on the part of the court as to the truth of the evidence given by Cooper, but in this there could be no intimation unfavorable to defendant, and he, therefore, cannot complain. So far, therefore, as the remarks and questions of the court are concerned, there was no intimation of opinion upon the part of the court that can be held to have been misconduct prejudicial to defendant's rights. It is unnecessary to here determine whether the objections now made in this matter can be considered without objection made or exception reserved in the trial court.

We see no merit whatever in the objection that the effect of the adherence to his testimony by Cooper, in the face of the information given him by the court as to the penalty for willful perjury resulting in the conviction and execution of an innocent person was to strengthen that testimony in the minds of the jurors. If such was the effect, which may be conceded, it was due solely to the fact that the jurors knew that the witness was testifying with actual knowledge as to the penalty prescribed by law for perjury. This it was entirely proper for them to know and take into consideration with all other matters going to the question of credibility of the witness, in determining the weight that should be given to his testimony.

We are unable to see any merit in the contention of defendant relative to the incident we have been discussing. Everything done by the court was in furtherance of the ultimate object of every judicial investigation, viz., the eliciting of the truth—there was therein no intimation of opinion on the part of the court adverse to defendant's interest —and the only effect thereof was to bring to the attention of the jury a fact which it was proper for them to know in determining the weight to be given to Cooper's evidence.

3. Many rulings of the trial court overruling objections to questions asked the defendant on his cross-examination by the district attorney are complained of, it being claimed that such questions were not proper cross-examination for the alleged reason that they had no reference to matters about which he was examined in chief. Penal Code, § 1323. Defendant had testified very fully on his direct examination as to his conversations with Cooper in the county jail, denying the truth of Cooper's statements, and, testifying explicitly in regard to the diagram made by him showing the place of the homicide, said that he told Cooper at the time that he knew nothing about the place or its whereabouts of his own knowledge, and that he was drawing the diagram solely from his own recollection of a map that had been produced in the police court. This was in direct conflict with the evidence of Cooper as to the conversations between them upon this subject. Several of the questions asked on cross-examination of the defendant were devoted to an effort to show by him that he did, at the time of the conversation with Cooper, know from personal observation as to the whereabouts and character of the place. It may be strongly argued that this was legitimate cross-examination upon a matter concerning which he had been "examined in chief," viz., his conversation with Cooper, for the reason that any answers to the questions asked which tended to show such personal knowledge on his part would impair the force of his direct testimony as to what his statements to Cooper were in this regard, and therefore would be legitimate cross-examination within the rule laid down in People v. Gallagher, 100 Cal. 466, 475, 35 Pac. 80. It is not necessary, however, to decide this point, in view of the answers given by the defendant to the questions. By those answers he steadfastly denied any personal knowledge as to these matters, and the evidence elicited was of such a nature that prejudice could not have been suffered by defendant on account of such cross-examination.

Outside of the testimony as to the Cooper conversations, defendant had testified on his direct examinations simply as follows: "I did not kill my brother-in-law, Joseph Blaise. I never employed or tried to employ any one to, or make any combination or agreement with anybody to kill him." On cross-examination he was asked: "Where were you on the night of January 10th of this year at the hour of 9 o'clock?" This time, according to the evidence, was about the time of the commission of the murder. This undoubtedly was legitimate cross-examination as to the general statement made by defendant on his direct examination to the effect that he was not the person who had committed the murder. See People v. Gallagher, supra. The defendant having voluntarily testified in his own behalf became "subject to the same rules for testing his credibility before the jury by impeachment or otherwise, as any other witness" (People v. Hickman, 113 Cal. 80, 86, 45 Pac. 175), and it was therefore competent for the prosecution to show either by his cross-examination or the record of the judgment that he had theretofore been convicted of a felony. Code Civ. Proc. § 2051; People v. Arnold, 116 Cal. 682, 687, 48 Pac. 803; People v. Sears, 119 Cal. 267, 271, 51 Pac. 325; People v. Meyer, 75 Cal. 383, 386, 17 Pac. 431. The rulings of the court upon this point were, therefore, not erroneous.

The usual contention is made that the district attorney, in his closing argument to the jury, went beyond the limits of legitimate argument to the prejudice of the defendant. We find no support for this contention in the record. This is not a case like that of People v. Cook (Cal. Sup.) 83 Pac. 43, where the district attorney stated as a fact something most prejudicial to the defendant, as to which there was absolutely no intimation in the evidence. As was said in People v. Romero, 143 Cal. 458, 460, 77 Pac. 163, 164: "Counsel has the right in the argument to fully state his views as to what the evidence shows, and as to the conclusions to be fairly drawn therefrom." In the case at bar, the district attorney, in our judgment, did no more than this.

The transcript on appeal discloses no other point requiring discussion.

The judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

McANENY v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SANTA CLARA COUNTY et al. (S. F. 4,609.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 4, 1906.)

1. Appeal—Stay of Proceedings—Effect—Alimony—Receivership.

Though, under Civ. Code, § 137, a superior court may require the husband, in action for divorce, to pay temporary alimony, suit expenses, etc., and, under section 140, may enforce payment or security therefor by the appointment of a receiver or by other appropriate remedy, where defendant filed a bond to stay proceedings pending an appeal from orders requiring him to pay temporary alimony, etc., the superior court had no jurisdiction to appoint a receiver to provide security for the ultimate payment of temporary alimony, etc., since Code Civ. Proc. § 946, provides that the perfecting of an appeal shall stay further proceedings in the court below on orders appealed from and matters embraced therein.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, § 2208.]

2. Prohibition — Grounds — Existence of Another Remedy.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1102, giving the superior court authority to issue a writ of prohibition to arrest proceedings of a tribunal exercising judicial functions in excess of its jurisdiction, being limited by section 1103, providing that the writ will not issue where there is a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of the law, the writ will not issue to stay receivership proceedings to provide security for the payment of temporary alimony, etc., from orders for payment of which the husband has appealed, since the writ of supersedeas offered defendant a speedy and adequate remedy to stay the proceedings.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 40, Prohibition, §§ 4, 5, 13.]

3. Same—Jurisdiction—Issues and Proof—Review.

Where a husband's petition for a writ of prohibition to stay receivership proceedings to secure the payment of temporary alimony, from the orders for the payment of which he had appealed, alleged that he was unable to procure sureties for the amount of the bond required by the superior court to stay proceedings, and the allegations were denied by the answer and the case was submitted without a trial of that issue, the Supreme Court could not determine whether or not appeal afforded the husband a plain and adequate remedy against the receivership proceedings.

4. Same — Presentation of Objection in Original Proceeding.

Where a husband appealed from orders of the superior court requiring him to pay temporary alimony, etc., a writ of prohibition would not issue at his instance to stay receivership proceedings to secure the ultimate payment thereof, where it did not appear that he had objected to the jurisdiction of the lower court to appoint a receiver after appeal from the orders, or that the court was informed of the filing of the undertaking to stay proceedings on the appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 40, Prohibition, § 66.]

In bank. Application of George B. McAneny for writ of prohibition against the superior court of Santa Clara county and another. Denied.

Jackson Hatch and John E. Richards, for petitioner. H. E. Wilcox and D. M. Burnett, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an original proceeding in this court for a writ of prohibition to prevent further proceedings in pursuance of an order of said superior court made in the course of an action for divorce therein pending, wherein Mabel M. McAneny is plaintiff and George B. McAneny is defendant, appointing Walter L. Crow receiver to take charge of the property of the defendant. Prior to the making of the order appointing Crow as receiver the court had made an order in the action for divorce requiring the defendant, George B. McAneny, to pay certain sums of money to the plaintiff for her alimony pending the suit and for her costs and counsel fees in the prosecution thereof, and also a subsequent order for the payment of additional sums as alimony pending an appeal from the first order and for her expenses upon such appeal. From each of these orders the defendant had appealed to the Supreme Court, and had stayed further proceedings on each order pending the appeal by giving the necessary undertakings. The last order for alimony pending the appeal was made on February 12, 1906. Notice of the motion for the appointment of a receiver and the notice of motion for alimony, etc., pending appeal were both served and filed on February 1st, and it was stated in the former notice that the purpose sought to be accomplished by the appointment of a receiver was the securing of the payment to plaintiff of such sums as might be directed to be paid to her for alimony, costs, and counsel fees. The order appointing a receiver was made on March 8, 1906. The court ordered that Crow be appointed receiver, and directed him, as such receiver, to take charge and custody of all the money and property of said defendant, with certain immaterial exceptions, and collect all rents, issues, and profits therefrom. This order recites the terms of the notice, stating the purpose for which the receivership was desired, as aforesaid.

A writ prohibition may be issued by this court to arrest the proceedings of any tribunal exercising judicial functions "when such proceedings are without or in excess of the jurisdiction of such tribunal." Code Civ. Proc. § 1102. By section 137, Civ. Code, power is given to the superior court in actions for divorce to make orders requiring the husband to pay money to the wife for her support pending the action and for her expenses in prosecution or defense thereof. The orders in question, directing the payments of money by the petitioner, were made in pursuance of the authority given by that section. By section 140 of the Civil Code it is provided that the court may require the husband to give reasonable security for making any payments which the court may direct to be made under the provisions of section 137 aforesaid, "and may enforce the same by the appointment of a receiver, or by any other remedy applicable to the case." Under these provisions a receiver may be appointed either for the purpose of enforcing payment of the alimony and expense money previously ordered paid, or for the purpose of enforcing a previous order requiring the husband to furnish security for such payment, or for the purpose merely of providing such security. Petaluma Bank v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 495, 44 Pac. 177; Huellmantel v. Huellmantel, 124 Cal. 588, 57 Pac. 582; Sharon v. Sharon, 67 Cal. 202, 7 Pac. 456, 635, 8 Pac. 709.

It must be admitted that the superior court had full jurisdiction to grant the motion for a receiver at all times during its pendency, prior to the taking of the appeal from the order to pay alimony and costs and the filing of the undertaking to stay proceedings on said appeal. The stay of proceedings on the alimony order, thus effected, operated as a supersedeas, and, during its operation, deprived the superior court of all power to enforce the order appealed from, either by execution or by proceedings for contempt, or through the appointment of a receiver. Ruggles v. Superior Court, 103 Cal. 127, 37 Pac. 211; State I. & I. Co. v. Superior Court, 101 Cal. 150, 35 Pac. 549. If the order appointing the receiver in this case was an act in furtherance of the enforcement of the alimony order which was stayed by the appeal, it was prohibited by the statute, which in such cases forbids further proceedings upon the order appealed from and matters embraced therein (Code Civ. Proc. § 946), and it was, in a certain sense, in excess of the jurisdiction of the court. Notwithstanding the limited scope and purpose of the order appointing the receiver in the present case, as expressed in the notice and recited in the order, we think it was a step taken for the enforcement of the payment of the alimony and expenses allowed. State I. & I. Co. v. Superior Court, supra. The fact that the custody is solely for the purpose of providing security does not change the character of the proceedings. It is security for payment, so that when the final act of enforcement comes—that is, the actual appropriation of the money to the satisfaction of the demand—the money will be ready for that purpose if enough has been secured, or the property will be in the receiver's hands for sale, if it is necessary to resort to a sale, and so it may be said to be a provision for the better enforcement of the order to pay alimony. It could have no other object than the ultimate enforcement of the payment. It is therefore a proceeding which was stayed by the undertaking for the stay of the proceedings on the order of February 12th granting further alimony and attorney's fees.

A writ of prohibition will not be issued where there is a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. Code Civ. Proc. § 1103. We have already seen that the proceeding to appoint a receiver was a step toward the enforcement of the alimony order appealed from, and that the effect of the stay bond on the appeal was to stay all proceedings on the order, or in the enforcement thereof. The petitioner has, therefore, a speedy and adequate remedy by means of a motion in this court in the matter of the appeal for a writ of supersedeas to stay the hand of the court below in any proceeding to enforce the order, whether judicial or ministerial. The writ of supersedeas "is frequently granted by this court for the purpose of staying proceedings in the superior court, when a review of the action of that court is sought in this court, either upon direct proceeding or on appeal, and is directed to the court whose action is under review, or to an officer of that court who may be about to enforce its judgment. * * * If, after such appeal, the court below seeks to enforce its judgment, this court will grant a special order restraining its action." Dulin v. Pacific W. & C. Co., 98 Cal. 304, 33 Pac. 123. Such writs have been issued in the following cases: Hoppe v. Hoppe, 99 Cal. 537, 34 Pac. 222; Painter v. Painter, 98 Cal. 626, 33 Pac. 483; Born v. Horstmann, 80 Cal. 452, 22 Pac. 169, 338, 5 L. R. A. 577; Baldwin v. Superior Court, 125 Cal. 584, 58 Pac. 185; Anderson v. Anderson, 123 Cal. 445, 56 Pac. 61; Brown v. Rouse, 115 Cal. 619, 47 Pac. 601; Hubbard v. University Bank, 120 Cal. 632, 52 Pac. 1070. This court has even gone so far, upon the granting of a writ of supersedeas, as to quash writs already issued out of the superior court and vacate sales already made in pursuance of the order of that court. Owen v. Pomona L. & W. Co., 124 Cal. 331, 57 Pac. 71. This remedy is more effectual and comprehensive than prohibition in all cases where, as in this case, the acts of the party restrained are proceedings which are stayed by an appeal. The petitioner is also the appellant, and therefore has the right to apply for a supersedeas in aid of his appeal. We are aware that this court has sometimes granted relief by way of prohibition where the exercise of judicial functions were threatened in enforcement of the judgment stayed by an appeal. In the leading case of Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 342, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192, the persons applying for the writ of prohibition were not parties to the action. It was considered doubtful whether they had the right to appeal, and, if so, whether the appeal would be of any value without a bill of exceptions, and hence that remedy was not deemed plain or adequate. Not being parties, they could not move for a supersedeas. In the case of State I. & I. Co. v. Superior Court, supra, and in other cases where prohibition has been entertained at the instance of a party to the appeal, the existence of the remedy by writ of supersedeas does not appear to have been called to the attention of the court, and the effect of such remedy has not been discussed in the opinion.

There is also the remedy by appeal by which the order can be vacated for mere error, as well as for excess of jurisdiction. The defendant has appealed from the order appointing the receiver, and in his petition he seeks to show that this remedy is ineffectual because the amount of the undertaking to stay proceedings thereon has been fixed at $30,000, and he avers that he is wholly unable to procure sureties for that sum. This allegation is denied in the answer, and, as the case has been submitted without a trial of the issue thus raised, we cannot decide whether or not this remedy is plain or adequate in this particular case.

Another objection to the sufficiency of the case made by the petitioner is that it does not appear that the objection to the jurisdiction of the court was ever brought to the attention of the superior court and an opportunity given to that court to recede from its position, a step which is usually a condition precedent to the right to a writ of prohibition in this court. There was not here, as in Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 403, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192, a lack of opportunity to do so, nor is there anything in the record to show that the disposition of the lower court to persist in its course made it useless to object. The proceeding for a receiver was initiated at the same time as the application for additional alimony, and the court, as before stated, had full jurisdiction to proceed at all times prior to the appeal from the alimony order and the securing of the stay of proceedings thereon. The appeal from the alimony order was taken and the stay of proceedings thereon obtained on February 14, 1906. The application for a receiver was postponed from day to day by stipulation of the attorneys, and did not come on for hearing until March 8, 1906, at which time it was granted. There was therefore ample opportunity given to the petitioner to object to the jurisdiction of the court and to give notice to the court of the fact he had taken the appeal and obtained a stay of proceedings. It does not appear that the superior court was ever informed of the filing of the undertaking which operated to stay proceedings. Unless it was aware of that fact, it could have no knowledge that it was proceeding in excess of its power. This case therefore does not come within the exceptions or qualifications to the rule that objection must be made in the lower court which are noted in the opinion in Havemeyer v. Superior Court, supra.

The petition is denied.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v. CITY OF VISALIA. (Sac. 1,443.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 25, 1906.)

1. TRIAL—FINDINGS OF FACT—CONSTRUCTION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

An ordinance purporting to grant a privilege to a telegraph company to use the streets of the city for its poles, regulating the manner of such use and the rights of the city and company therein, nowhere used the word "franchise." The company's officer testified that the ordinance and its acceptance by the company was not a "franchise," or understood to be such, but a mere police regulation. Held, that a finding that a "franchise" was created thereby should be construed as meaning that the ordinance and its acceptance by the company operated in law as a franchise, and not that a franchise was applied for and granted eo nomine.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 871.]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—USE OF STREETS—FRANCHISE TO TELEGRAPH COMPANIES—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

An ordinance, to become operative on its acceptance by a telegraph company, purported to grant to the telegraph company a right to use the streets of the city for poles, provided that such use was not exclusive, regulated the manner of such use, fixed the company's liability for damages arising from an abuse thereof, and gave the city a right to use the poles. Held, that the other provisions contained in the ordinance did not change its character from an attempted grant of a franchise.

3. TAXATION—CORPORATIONS—FRANCHISES—GRANT OF POWER ALREADY POSSESSED.

Act July 24, 1866, c. 230, 14 Stat. 221, grants a certain telegraph company a franchise of constructing its lines along the post roads of the United States. Rev. St. U. S. § 3964, [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2707] provides that all public highways are post roads. Pol. Code, § 2618, declares that public highways are roads, streets, and alleys laid out and dedicated to the public. Civ. Code, § 536, authorizes telegraph companies to construct their lines upon any public road or highway. Held, that a city ordinance purporting to grant to the corporation referred to in 14 U. S. Stat. a franchise to use the city streets for its poles was a mere attempt to give what the company already had, and did not create a franchise which could be taxed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by the Western Union Telegraph Company against the city of Visalia. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and remanded with directions.

Brown & Wells, R. B. Carpenter, and Beverly L. Hodghead, for appellant. H. T. Miller, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The plaintiff is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of New York and engaged in the telegraph business. It has been in existence as such corporation since before July 24, 1866. The defendant, the city of Visalia, is a municipal corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of California. Plaintiff has numerous lines of telegraph running through many parts of California and other American states and adjoining countries, and one of its lines runs through the streets of the defendant to the extent of 3 miles of poles and 12 miles of wires. The defendant assessed for the year 1904 all these poles and wires and all other tangible property of plaintiff within said boundaries, and all the taxes levied upon such property were paid by plaintiff, but defendant for said year also assessed plaintiff for "a franchise granted by the city of Visalia, $1,500," and levied a tax thereon of $30, and was about to levy upon and sell all plaintiff's said poles and wires to satisfy said tax, when plaintiff commenced this action to restrain such sale. Judgment went for defendant in the trial court, and, from the judgment, plaintiff appeals, bringing up the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions. As respondent does not make any point as to the remedy asked by appellant, we will assume, for the purpose of this appeal, that the remedy is a proper one and determine the case, as both parties seem to want it determined, upon its real legal merits.

The case was tried by the court, without a jury, upon a stipulated statement of facts, with leave to either party to introduce further evidence, and some further evidence was introduced by plaintiff. The character of plaintiff, and its rights, franchises, and immunities, have been before this court in other cases, and particularly in the case of the City and County of San Francisco v. The Western Union Telegraph Company, 96 Cal. 140, 31 Pac. 10, 17 L. R. A. 301. It was determined in that case—and is the law—that, by an act of Congress passed July 24, 1866, (14 Stat. p. 221, c. 230) and the subsequent acceptance of its terms by the appellant herein, the appellant was granted the franchise of constructing, maintaining, and operating its lines of telegraph over the public domain, and across and under navigable waters, and along the military and post roads of the United States, in such manner as not to obstruct or interfere with ordinary travel thereon; that, by section 3964, Rev. St. of the United States [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2707] it was provided—as Congress had the right to provide—that "all public roads and highways while kept up and maintained as such are declared to be post roads," and by section 2618 of the Political Code of this state it is provided that public "highways" are "roads, streets, alleys," etc., laid out, erected, and dedicated to the public; that, by said act of Congress, and its acceptance by appellant, the latter became an instrumentality of the United States in carrying out its govermental functions, and that, therefore, under the principle declared in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, the franchises granted plaintiff by said act of Congress are not subject to state taxation, either directly or indirectly. Therefore the respondent had no authority to assess and tax any federal franchise enjoyed by appellant and exercised upon the streets of respondent. This principle respondent admits, but it contends that the franchise which it assessed was the franchise granted by respondent, and that its assessment was not, therefore, the assessment of a federal franchise, and whether or not this is so is the question to be determined on this appeal.

On the 20th day of February, 1892, the trustees of respondent passed a certain ordinance designated as "ordinance No. 69," which was to take effect only upon the filing by appellant with the clerk of the city a written acceptance of such ordinance. The respondent contends, and the court found, that by said ordinance a franchise was granted to appellant, and it is contended and found that the franchise assessed by respondent is the franchise which is averred to have been created by said ordinance. If that ordinance did not create a franchise then the attempted assessment was on something which had no existence. This case, therefore, differs from Western Union Telegraph Co. v. County of San Joaquin, 141 Cal. 264, 74 Pac. 856, because in that case it did not appear from the pleadings that the plaintiff there did not have some franchise from the city of Stockton different and in addition to its federal franchise. The appellant had erected and was using its lines of poles and wires through what were afterwards streets of the city of Visalia before said city was incorporated; and has ever since used the same line. The said ordinance No. 69, passed February 20, 1892, with its acceptance by appellant is as follows:

Section 1. Be it ordained by the city council of the city of Visalia, state of California, that the Western Union Telegraph Company, its successors and assigns, are authorized to erect and maintain on the streets, alleys and public ways of said city the poles and fixtures and wires necessary for the purpose of supplying the citizens of said city and the public communication by telegraph, or other improved electrical device such use to be and continue upon the terms and conditions hereinafter stated.

"Sec. 2. The location of the poles and lines now in use is hereby approved, subject to the provisions of this ordinance, and provided the same shall be made to conform with the requirements of this ordinance and the location of all poles and lines now in use, or extensions thereof, shall be under the direction and control of the city council of the said city.

"Sec. 3. Said poles and wires shall be placed and maintained so as not to interfere with travel on said highways, and said company shall hold said city free and harmless from all damages arising by reason of any abuse of said occupancy. This grant is made, and is to be enjoyed, subject to such reasonable regulations and ordinances of a public nature as said city council of said city is authorized and sees proper at any time to adopt not destructive to the rights herein granted.

"Sec. 4. The right of use herein given shall not be exclusive and the city council of said city reserves the power to grant a like right of way to any other telegraph company; the same however, not to interfere with the reasonable and proper exercise of the privileges herein granted.

"Sec. 5. In consideration whereof, said Western Union Telegraph Company shall, and by the acceptance of this ordinance does, agree to allow the city council of said city to attach at any time to the top crossarm of any of said poles, where practicable, the city fire alarm and police wires, and said poles are hereby made a municipal instrumentality for that purpose; provided, however, said attachment shall be so made as not to interfere with said company's use, and said attachment shall be made and maintained under the direction of said company's manager in said city of Visalia.

"The said company shall and will furnish for the said city the use of its poles for the attachment thereto of its fire alarm boxes, without charge to said city.

"Sec. 6. This ordinance shall take effect on and after its passage and the filing by said company of unconditional acceptance thereof in the office of the clerk of said city of Visalia, and shall be published in one issue of the Tulare County Times, a newspaper printed and published in said city of Visalia.

"Sec. 7. That whenever said company ceases to operate a telegraph line in said city of Visalia and ceases to use the said poles and lines herein provided for in the operation of its line of telegraph then said company shall remove said lines and poles from the streets and alleys of said city within sixty days from date that said company so ceases to use and operate said lines.

"Sec. 8. This grant is made on condition that all poles used by said Western Union Telegraph Company within the city limits shall be of the uniform height of twenty-six feet above the surface of the ground, and shall be maintained at such height, without any splicing, relative to the sidewalks of said city as the common council may designate.

"Sec. 9. All ordinances and parts of ordinances, orders and resolutions upon the subject of telegraph poles, wires, etc., of previous date, in so far as the same relates to the Western Union Telegraph Company, are hereby repealed and annulled."

"San Francisco, Cal., Feb. 20, 1892. To his Honor, the Mayor, and the Honorable City Council, Visalia, Cal. — Gentlemen: The Western Union Telegraph hereby accepts your ordinance No. 69, passed the 10th day of February, 1892, and files hereby this its unconditional acceptance thereof, in the office of your city clerk. Very respectfully, The Western Union Telegraph Company, by Frank Jaynes, Supt."

The court found that, prior to the passage of this ordinance, "the plaintiff applied to defendant herein the city of Visalia for the privilege and franchise of constructing, maintaining, and operating plaintiff's telegraph lines, poles, and structures in the streets, alleys, and public ways of said city of Visalia," and that said ordinance was passed in pursuance of such application, and that "said ordinance and franchise were duly accepted in writing by plaintiff." If this can be construed to mean literally that plaintiff really applied for a franchise, eo nomine, to construct and operate a telegraph line through the streets of the city, then it would have no support in the evidence, and the judgment would have to be reversed for that reason. The word "franchise" is not used in the ordinance, and there is no pretense in it of the granting of a right to "operate" the telegraph line. The only evidence on the subject is the testimony of plaintiff's superintendent, F. H. Lamb. He said: "I am acquainted with the franchises of the Western Union Telegraph Company on the Pacific Coast. The matter of the application for a franchise, if any were made, would be a part of my duties. We have no franchise in the city of Visalia granted by the city of Visalia or the county of Tulare for any purpose." On cross-examination he was asked: "Now, Mr. Lamb, at any time prior to the month of February, 1892, did not the Western Union Telegraph Company, through you, make an application to the city of Visalia for a franchise to erect its poles along the city streets of Visalia and to string its wires thereon?" and to this question he answered as follows: "I do not understand that that application was made, as it was well understood by this company that the act of Congress of 1866 gave the Western Union Telegraph Company the franchise to erect its telegraph lines and operate them over all portions of the public domain, over all post routes; and also that the state of California gave to all telegraph companies similar authority. The application that was made to the city of Visalia was in the nature of a police regulation in order to settle the question as to the location of our poles, the height of wires above ground, etc., in order to prevent the lines which we erected in the streets from being subsequently disturbed by some whim of a street official. Q. Now, in pursuance of that application, Mr. Lamb, there was an ordinance passed by the board of trustees on February, 1892, which granted to your company some rights in the streets, was there not? A. There was an ordinance passed which prescribed that the location of the poles and wires then erected was approved. Q. It is the same ordinance that has been set forth here in the complaint and statement of fact? A. Yes, sir."

In the face of this evidence we do not think that the court intended to find that the plaintiff applied for what it called or understood to be a "franchise." We think that the finding can be, and should be, construed to mean merely that, in the opinion of the court, the ordinance 69 did, in law, create a franchise, and that, therefore, plaintiff can be said to have applied for a franchise. And, construing it in that sense, the case can now be here decided on its merits, without the necessity of ordering a new trial upon a point that would only cause delay. The real question therefore, is, as before stated, does the ordinance 69 create a "franchise?" and, in our opinion, it does not. If it can be construed as an attempted granting or an original franchise to operate a telegraph line through the streets of the city, it would be merely an empty form of granting what the plaintiff already had and of which the city could not deprive it. The plaintiff had that right not only from the act of Congress above referred to but also from section 536 of our Civil Code, which provides that "telegraph corporations may construct lines of telegraph along and upon any public road or highway." But we do not think that the ordinance purports to grant any "franchise." While the appellate had the right, of which the city could not deprive it, to construct and operate its lines along the streets of the city, nevertheless it could not maintain its poles and wires in such a manner as to unreasonably obstruct and interfere with ordinary travel, and the city had the authority, under its police power, to so regulate the manner of plaintiff's placing and maintaining its poles and wires as to prevent unreasonable obstruction of travel. And we think that the ordinance in question was not intended to be anything more, and is nothing more, than the exercise of this authority to regulate. But such regulation is not the granting of a franchise; it is a restriction of and burden upon a franchise already existing; it is not an original and affirmative granting of anything in the nature of a franchise. Indeed, the ordinance and its acceptance by plaintiff—which acceptance was necessary to give it any effect—was in the nature of a contract between the parties. The plaintiff's poles and wires were still in the same place in which they had been for many years, and, by the ordinance, the city agreed in writing that the poles and wires as they then stood were in a proper place and might remain there if plaintiff would agree to allow the city to use them for certain purposes, and plaintiff, by accepting the ordinance, so agreed. Such was evidently the purpose of the ordinance, and we do not see in it the creation of anything in the nature of a franchise. Therefore the assessment was for an asserted franchise which had no existence.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to render judgment as prayed for in its complaint.

I concur: LORIGAN, J.

SHAW, J. I concur. I think, however, that the ordinance in question was intended to grant a certain right to use a portion of the public streets, and that, as it purports to be a grant by public authority of a right to the use of public property, it does purport to grant a franchise. The fact that it also regulates the manner of the use does not change its character in this respect. But, in so far as it purports to grant such right, it merely attempts to give the plaintiff that which it already had, and was of no legal effect whatever. The assessment, being specifically upon that so-called franchise, was upon a thing which had no real existence and which could not have any value. It was, therefore, necessarily void, and its collection in the manner here attempted should be enjoined.

SPIRES v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al.

(L. A. 1857.)

1. DEDICATION—CITY PARK—USE OF PROPERTY.

The erection by a city on a square dedicated by it as "a public place forever for the enjoyment of the community in general," of a public library for the use of the same public, is not only not inconsistent with the purpose for which the park was dedicated, but is in aid and furtherance of its enjoyment by the public; but the building can be used for strictly library purposes only; so that, while rooms therein may be provided as a meeting place for the board of library directors, they cannot be provided for the board of education.

2. APPEAL—ISSUES NOT RAISED BELOW.

On appeal from a judgment, enjoining a city from erecting a public library on a park dedicated as a public place for the enjoyment of the community in general, the contention of plaintiff below being that the city had under no circumstances any authority to devote any portion of it to a public library, the question of any limitation on such right where the park is small and the building large, cannot be considered.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Action by J. H. Spires against the city of Los Angeles and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

W. B. Mathews and Herbert J. Goudge, for appellants. Chas. Wellborn, C. E. Woodside, Eugene Overton, and H. T. Lee (H. W. O'Melveny, of counsel), for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. The plaintiff, a resident and taxpayer of the city of Los Angeles, and the owner of certain property abutting on what is claimed to be a public park in said city, brought this suit in conjunction against the city of Los Angeles, the mayor and common council, the members of the board of directors, and the members of the board of park commissioners of that city, to restrain them from erecting a public library on a tract of land owned by said city of Los Angeles bounded by Fifth, Hill, Sixth and Olive streets in that city, and known as "Central Park," on the ground that the city, as owner of said property, had dedicated it to the use of the public for park purposes, and that such purpose would not permit erection therein of a public library building. The Central Park in question is 600 by 330 feet in size, and it was proposed by the municipal authorities to use a space in the center thereof, 100 by 150 feet, upon which to erect a public library. The trial court found that the land in question had been set apart and dedicated by the city authorities of Los Angeles for the use of the public as a public park, and that its official name was "Central Park," and that ever since December 11, 1866, it had been maintained and used by the people of the city of Los Angeles exclusively as a park. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, and the defendants appeal to this court therefrom. The appeal is from the judgment, accompanied by a bill of exceptions.

The sole points presented on this appeal are whether, first, the block in question was ever dedicated by the city of Los Angeles as a public park, or secondly, if it was so dedicated, would the erection therein of a public library be foreign to the purposes for which said tract was dedicated, inconsistent with its use by the public, and an invasion of public right. Much of the evidence in the case was addressed to the first proposition, whether there was in fact a dedication by the city of the block as a public park, but, in view of the conclusion we have reached on the second point, we do not deem it necessary to pass upon that question. If it be conceded that there was a dedication of the square as "a public place forever for the enjoyment of the community in general," as the principal ordinance, on which reliance is based as showing dedication, declares, still we think that the erection therein of a public library for the use of the same public who are entitled to use the park is not only not inconsistent with the purposes for which the park was dedicated, but is really in aid and furtherance of its enjoyment by the public. It is to be remembered that the dedication here is not one made by a private individual for a specific public use, where the rule of strict construction of the terms of the grant is to be applied. The land which it is claimed here was dedicated as a public park was land acquired by the city as successor to the pueblo of Los Angeles, to which it had been granted by the government of Spain. The city of Los Angeles, when the alleged dedication was made, was the owner in fee, and its dedication was for a general public use, namely, "as a public place forever for the enjoyment of the community in general." This was comprehensive language, and in construing the grant, or rather the extent of the terms of the dedication, no narrow and strict construction should be applied to limit the city in the uses to which the property dedicated may be devoted, as long as they are such as tend to further and promote the enjoyment of the people under the general dedication of them and for their benefit. And that the establishment of a public library, to which the visitors to the park have access, is consistent with such public enjoyment, and tends to enlarge it, we have no doubt.

As matter of public knowledge, we are aware that the erection of hotels, restaurants, museums, art galleries, zoological and botanical gardens, conservatories, and the like in public parks is common, and we are not pointed to any authority where it has been regarded as a diversion of the legitimate uses of the park to establish them, but, on the contrary, their establishment has been generally recognized as ancillary to the complete enjoyment by the public of the property set apart for their benefit. To instance, in Central Park in New York City there is a museum of natural history and a metropolitan art museum; and in Golden Gate Park in San Francisco, a museum, children's playground, and buildings used in connection with it, and a conservatory. We mention simply these parks and particular features devoted to the public enjoyment, although many other parks might be mentioned where similar buildings have been erected. Now, we are at a loss to perceive why, if the erection of museums, conservatories, and art galleries are sustained as in aid of the enjoyment of property dedicated to the public, the erection of a public library on a public park should be proscribed. Certainly the latter is as much in aid of the enjoyment of the public as the former, and, as far as the right of public access to it is concerned, stands on entirely the same footing. Of course, if a municipality were undertaking to establish on this property a city hall, fire engine station, hospital, or jail; endeavoring to devote the property (assuming it was dedicated for a public park) to the erection of municipal buildings or offices or structures for use in the transaction of municipal business, a different question would be presented, and there would be little hesitancy in holding that it could not do so. But using a portion of said dedicated property for a museum or art gallery or conservatory or library, designed for the recreation, pleasure, and enjoyment of the community in general, is an entirely different proposition, and is a distinction generally recognized by the authorities. Public buildings such as we have last mentioned are for the benefit of the same public that enjoys the advantages of the park. There is nothing exclusive about it, and they are, in fact, erected and maintained as additional and ancillary means to promote the recreation and pleasure of those to whom the enjoyment of the park is devoted. And that among the buildings which may be erected within a public park in aid of and for the better enjoyment of the public, a public library is included, is settled by authority.

An interesting and leading case upon the subject is the Attorney General v. Corporation of Sunderland, 2d Ch. Div. 634. This case directly involved the right of a municipality to erect a public library in a public park. A tract of land was purchased by the borough of Sunderland as an extension to an existing park, and was conveyed to it by a deed which declared that the land was to be used "only for public walks and pleasure grounds." Subsequently the corporation resolved to employ a quarter of an acre as a site for the erection of town buildings, including accommodations for a museum and a library and public offices. Thereupon suit was brought by the Attorney General at the relation of certain inhabitants and rate payers of Sunderland to have the corporation restrained from appropriating any portion of the park "as sites or a site for the erection of any town buildings, or for any erection or building which is not needed, or incidental to, the maintenance of the park as public walks or pleasure grounds." The vice chancellor before whom the case was first argued held that the municipal corporation defendant had power to erect upon the land in question a museum and conservatory, but not any municipal building or a library or school of art, and pursuant to this decision a decree was made restraining the corporation from erecting any town buildings or any building other than a museum or conservatory. The corporation appealed from this decree, and the Court of Appeals modified it by directing that the injunction should not "extend to a free public library, museum, or conservatory open for the use, convenience, and recreation of the persons frequenting such walks and pleasure grounds." In reaching this conclusion opinions were expressed by the justices of the court, James, L. J., after agreeing with the vice chancellor that the corporation had no authority to use any land of the park as the site of a town hall, saying with reference to the erection of the other buildings involved: "The original park was appropriated as 'a place of recreation,' and, according to the act under which the land now in question was acquired, it must be used 'as public walks or pleasure grounds.' These words are not to be construed too narrowly. It is admitted by the information that some buildings are allowable, and the prayer is, as it seems to me, quite correct. The corporation is in the position of a trustee, and the question is whether in building a museum and library, it is improperly executing a trust. The primary object of the trust is to provide a place of enjoyment and recreation. Nothing is improper which conduces to that object, and we ought not to quarrel with anything which the corporation, in a reasonable exercise of their discretion, consider conducive to it. It is admitted that the erection of a conservatory is allowable, and it is an erection which you would expect, as a matter of course, to find in first-rate pleasure grounds. The erection of a free museum containing botanical specimens and other curiosities appears also to be unobjectionable. A library into which people may turn if the weather becomes unfavorable also seems allowable if bona fide intended for the use of persons frequenting the grounds, as it will tend to promote the convenient use of the grounds. I think, therefore, that the exception in the order ought to be extended, so that the erection of a free library may not be prohibited." Justice Mellish, concurring, said: "I am of opinion, therefore, that no part of it can be used as the site of a town hall and offices. Can, then, any part of it be applied as a site for a museum, library, and conservatory? If the corporations were to acquire land for those purposes only, I think that such a purchase would not be within the act; but public walks and pleasure grounds having been laid out on a piece of land containing 25 acres, it is proposed to apply a quarter of an acre for the erection of those buildings. The question then arises whether this application of a small portion of the ground is not reasonably incidental to the main object, and whether it will not improve the grounds in their character of public walks and pleasure grounds. I am of opinion that it will, for it will increase the enjoyment of persons who go to walk there, and may induce more persons to frequent the grounds. I think that we ought not to put a narrow and strict construction upon the words, but that we ought to see whether the trustees, in what they are proposing to do, are bona fide carrying out the object of the trust." And Justice Baggallay expressed himself to the same effect: "The purposes of the section are that the land should be used for public walks and pleasure grounds, and I should much regret to be obliged to hold that applying a small portion of it for a museum, library, and conservatory, was inconsistent with this purpose. I cannot conceive anything more likely to conduce to the enjoyment of the walks and pleasure grounds than the having these erections attached to them, and I agree with the Lord Justices that the order should be varied to the extent mentioned."

It is insisted, however, by respondent that if this rule, supported by universal custom, and announced in the case just cited, obtains, it can only apply when but a small portion of a public park is taken, and not when the site to be used is so large as to result practically in the destruction of the park as a pleasure ground for the recreation and enjoyment of the public. This argument concedes the general right of the municipality to take a part of the park for buildings erected in aid of the enjoyment of the park by the public, and only insists that it has its limitations. But conceding the limitations, we have nothing to do with its application here. It is not apparent that the erection of this library will tend to the destruction of the park at all. The site for a library is relatively but a small portion of it, and, as we have seen, the erection of such a building therein is in aid of the public enjoyment of the entire park. Aside from this, however, no issue on this point was made in the court below, the contention of plaintiff there being that, as the park in question was dedicated to the use of the public as a pleasure ground, the city had no authority whatever to devote a portion of it, large or small, to a public library. No point was made as to any limitation on the right of a city by reason of the size of a site proposed to be taken in a public park for a library, but the right to do so was denied under any circumstances.

There is nothing further to be said in this matter. Under the view we entertain on the subject, the city of Los Angeles has a right, notwithstanding it be conceded that Central Park was dedicated for the benefit and enjoyment of the public, to build a public library on it, and the court was in error in granting a decree to plaintiff enjoining it, and its officers from doing so. This view, of course, necessitates a reversal of the judgment. While the municipality has the right to establish upon the public park a public library it cannot devote any of the rooms therein to administration purposes. It appears from the evidence set forth in the bill of exceptions accompanying this appeal that it is the purpose of the city to provide rooms therein as a meeting place for the board of library directors of such city, and that application has been made to such board of directors to provide rooms therein for the board of education. As far as the board of directors is concerned, this would seem permissible on account of their control of the library. But as to the board of education this cannot be done. The library building can be used for strictly library purposes only, and cannot be devoted to the establishment of municipal offices therein or used for municipal administration purposes other than as indicated relative to the board of library directors. If any part of such building could be used for one administration purpose, it might gradually be devoted to another. If one municipal board or municipal officer of the city having no direct relation to the library can be located therein, so may another, and so the building which the city has a right to erect as a library building solely in aid of the public enjoyment of the park may be gradually invaded for administration purposes and ultimately devoted to those purposes. Upon a new trial it shall be the duty of the trial court under the views we have suggested to ascertain whether the city of Los Angeles proposes to use the library to be erected for any municipal purpose at all, except as to a meeting room for said board of library directors, and, if so, to enjoin such use; the right of the city to erect the proposed library on the public park to be limited to its use solely for public library purposes. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

The appellant is entitled to costs on appeal.

LOS ANGELES & R. R. CO. et al. v. NEW LIVERPOOL SALT CO.

(L. A. 1,657.)

1. Reformation of Instruments — Lease — Construction—Mistake.

A lease granted premises, described on a blue print attached, reserving from the said "leased premises" that portion lying between the tracks of the L. Railroad, as shown on such blue print, and also reserving a strip of land 10 feet on either side of said railroad tracks. Another clause granted the lessee an option to purchase the said "leased premises" at a certain price. Held, that the saving clause was not a reservation of an easement merely, but reserved from the operation of the lease the fee of the portion reserved, and, such reservation having been omitted from a deed executed on the exercise of the option, the grantor was entitled to have the mistake corrected.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Reformation of Instruments, §§ 69–71.]

2. Same—Defenses—Negligence.

A lease, having attached thereto a plat of the premises, contained an option for sale, on the exercise of which the plat and lease were sent to an abstract company by the grantor's attorney with instructions to prepare a certificate of title, and also a description for insertion in the deed. The description written on a slip of paper was returned to the attorney, but, in some unexplained manner, an exception or reservation mentioned in the lease was not inserted in such description, and with this mistake it was copied into the deed by the typist. Held, that the negligence was not so gross as to constitute a neglect of legal duty, or forfeit the right of either party to relief from the mistake by reformation of the deed.

Purcell Rowe and J. S. Chapman, for appellant. Borden & Carhart, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an action to correct a mistake in a deed executed by the plaintiffs to the defendant. The plaintiff Redondo Improvement Company was merely a nominal party to the deed as well as to this action. In mentioning the plaintiff in this opinion, we refer only to the railroad company.

The mistake alleged to have been made consisted of the failure to insert in the description of the property an exception which, if inserted, would have excluded from the description certain territory embraced within the lines of a tract described in the deed by metes and bounds. The court found that the mistake was made as alleged and gave judgment for the reformation of the deed as prayed for. The principal contention upon the appeals, which are taken from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial, is that the evidence does not sustain the finding or judgment. In July, 1901, the plaintiff executed to the defendant a lease, for the term of seven years, upon certain described property. The lease contained a clause to the effect that, at any time during the term the defendant, at its option, might purchase of the plaintiff the leased premises for the price of $12,500. In May, 1902, the defendant elected to buy the property in pursuance of the option. The deed in controversy was executed in compliance with the obligation to convey, which, by the exercise of the option, became operative and binding upon the plaintiff. There is no pretense on the part of the defendant that there was any new or additional agreement, or modification of the old agreement, whereby the plaintiff became bound to convey any other property, or greater quantity of land, than was embraced in the option. The claim of the defendant is that there was no mistake; that the option covered the entire tract of land, including that reserved or excepted from the description in the lease, and that it was, therefore, in precise accord with the intention of the parties and necessary in order to comply with the option agreement, that the space of ground reserved from the operation of the lease, should be conveyed to the defendant upon the exercise of the option, and that the exception, or reservation, which constituted part of the description in the lease, was purposely and properly omitted from the deed. Unless this construction of the option contract is correct, there can be no doubt that there was a mistake, and that the evidence amply supports the findings and judgment.

We are of the opinion that the option cannot be so construed. The description of the land leased is as follows: "Situate at Redondo Beach in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, and being a portion of the property known as and called the 'Pacific Salt Works Tract,' a portion of said tract hereby leased being more specifically delineated and described upon the blue print hereunto attached and made a part hereof, the said leased premises being inclosed in red lines upon said annexed blue print and consisting of two parcels, the larger of which contains, as shown upon said blue print, 17.07 acres of land and the smaller of said parcels, as shown upon said blue print, containing 2.31 acres of land; saving and reserving from the said leased premises that portion thereof lying between the tracks of the Los Angeles & Redondo Railway Company, as shown on said blue print, and also saving and reserving a strip of land twenty feet in width, being ten feet on either side of the center line of said railroad tracks as the same are now constructed, excepting, however, such portion of said twenty-foot strip so reserved as is at the date of this indenture occupied by the building or vats of the said lessee." The option clause, so far as material, is in these words: "It is further agreed that at any time during the existence of this lease the said lessee * * * shall have, and it is hereby granted an option to purchase the said leased premises at the price of $12,500 to be paid in gold coin of the United States at the date of the conveyance of said real property unto said lessee by said lessor." (The italics in both clauses are our own.)

The claim of the defendant that the term "leased premises" in the option clause was therein used in the same inaccurate sense which appears to have been given to it where it is used in the reservation clause in the description, and, consequently, that the option covered the entire area inclosed in the red lines, including the railroad tracks, is shown to be untenable by the context, the surrounding circumstances and the conduct of the parties, as well as by the natural meaning of the words. Conditions in the lease require the lessee to "maintain on said leased premises" the present salt plant, and also require of the lessee a certain method of operation of the "leased premises," and provide that, upon a breach of the conditions, the lessor may resume possession of the "leased premises." In each of these instances the phrase does not embrace the excepted area. The lessee did not take possession of the railroad tracks, and claimed no right to do so, until long after the execution of the deed in question, and the lessor operated the tracks continuously during the whole of the intervening period. The short section of the tracks included within the red lines was but a small part, in length, of the spur tracks of the plaintiff, and was absolutely necessary to the use of the part extending beyond these lines and which would be cut off from connection with plaintiff's main line if plaintiff were prevented from crossing the land with its cars. Its traffic over these spur tracks was important and valuable. The short pieces of track within the red lines would be of no substantial value to the defendant. The saving clause in the description is not a reservation of an easement, merely, over a part of the leased premises. Its effect is to save and except from the operation of the lease the fee of the area between the tracks and for 10 feet on each side of the center thereof, and hence the lease did not transfer any estate in that part of the space inclosed in the red lines. That space formed no part of the leased premises, and was not covered by the option clause giving the right to purchase the premises actually leased. Sears v. Ackerman, 138 Cal. 586, 72 Pac. 171; Butler v. Gosling, 130 Cal. 422, 62 Pac. 596. There is, therefore, no foundation for the defendant's contention that the evidence is insufficient to prove a mistake in the preparation and execution of the deed. It is not important to determine whether it was a mutual mistake, or a mistake of plaintiff alone, known or suspected by the defendant. The complaint was in two counts and alleged the mistake in both forms. If either was proven the plaintiff was entitled to the relief given.

There is no merit in the objection that the mistake was due to the forgetfulness of the attorneys and officers of the plaintiff who drew and executed the deed, or by their neglect in failing to compare the description in the deed as prepared, with that in the lease. The course of decision in this state has not been entirely consistent on the general subject of the effect of neglect as a reason for refusing relief in equity. The decisions in Hawkins v. Hawkins, 50 Cal. 558, Senter v. Senter, 70 Cal. 619, 11 Pac. 782, Metropolitan L. A. v. Esche, 75 Cal. 513, 17 Pac. 675, and Crane v. McCormick, 92 Cal. 181, 28 Pac. 222, are cited by defendant as authority for the proposition that a written contract will not be reformed in equity on the ground of mistake at the instance of a party who neglected to read the instrument when he had a full opportunity to do so before its execution, and the defect is of such a character that he could easily have discovered it if he had read it with attention. The cases do not sustain the proposition to the full extent necessary to its application to the present case, although some expressions might seem to go so far as that. Hawkins v. Hawkins was criticised and explained in Wilson v. Moriarity, 88 Cal. 213, 26 Pac. 85. It was not, technically, a suit to correct a mistake in the written contract for the sale of the grain in question. It was an action to cancel the writing and to recover a balance due on the alleged previous verbal contract of sale. The preliminary statement of facts, made by the reporter, if correct, would seem to make a clear case of mistake of one party known to the other, in which case, under the principles stated in sections 3399 and 3402 of the Civil Code, the plaintiff might have had the written contract corrected, and might have recovered the balance that would be due according to its terms as revised. Such relief was not asked, and the opinion, which is very general in its terms, seems to treat the cause of action as one founded upon alleged fraud, and applies the principle that, before entering into a contract, one must use the opportunities open to him to discover the facts affecting it, and, if he negligently fails to do so, he cannot obtain relief from the fraud which, by his neglect, he suffered to be practiced upon him. It does not hold that the failure to read a contract with sufficient care to perceive a mistake in its terms will, of itself, prevent relief by way of a correction of the mistake. In Senter

v. Senter, the mistake as to the description of the land was induced by false statements of the defendant to plaintiff concerning the same, and was held that the plaintiff was entitled to have the correction made. Hawkins v. Hawkins is cited and is declared to be not in point. In Metropolitan L. A. v. Esche, the alleged mistake was made by sureties in a bond for the performance by the principal of certain duties to the obligee during a term of office. The obligee was not aware of any mistake on the part of the sureties, and accepted the bond and allowed the principal to continue in its service upon the faith of it. There was, therefore, neither mistake nor fraud of which the sureties could complain. Crane v. McCormick was a similar case and the facts were declared not to make out a case of mutual mistake.

It has been frequently decided that the mere failure of a party to read an instrument with sufficient attention to perceive an error or defect in its contents will not prevent its reformation at the instance of the party who executes it thus carelessly. In Higgins v. Parsons, 65 Cal. 280, 3 Pac. 881, the plaintiff signed a contract believing that it contained a certain stipulation agreed on. The defendant knew that it did not contain the stipulation and also knew that the plaintiff believed that it did. The plaintiff had an opportunity to read the contract before signing. It is said that the conditions on which a contract may be reformed are specified in section 3399 of the Civil Code, and that, as that section does not authorize the refusal of such relief because the party asking it might have discovered the mistake before signing, the court is not at liberty to exact such diligence as a condition. Perhaps the court there should have added that the carelessness did not constitute a neglect of legal duty, within the meaning of section 1577 of the Civil Code. In Wilson v. Moriarity, 88 Cal. 213, 26 Pac. 85, it was held that the neglect of the plaintiff, when the lease was read to her by the notary, to pay sufficient attention to discover that it was for 10 years, instead of five years, as she supposed, was not sufficient to defeat her action for its reformation in that particular. In Sullivan v. Moorhead, 99 Cal. 159, 33 Pac. 796, the deed was executed in compliance with a previous contract of sale, and in that respect it was similar to the case at bar. The contract was for the sale of lots 10, 11, 12, and 13 in a certain block. The deed described the land as lots 10, 11, 12, and "a part of 13." The plaintiff read the deed, but did not observe the variance. The court said: "The fact of his having read the instrument would not prevent the court from finding that it was made under a mistake." There are many authorities from other states to the effect that a written contract will be corrected in equity, although the mistake was patent on the face of the document, and could have been discovered if read with attention. Albany C. S. I. v. Burdick, 7 N. Y. 46; Story v. Gammell (Neb.) 94 N. W. 982; Andrews v. Gillespie, 47 N. Y. 487; San Antonio v. McLane (Tex.) 70 S. W. 201; Kelley v. Ward, 94 Tex. 289, 60 S. W. 311; Lloyd v. Phillips (Wis.) 101 N. W. 1092; Taylor v. Glen Falls I. Co. (Fla.) 32 So. 887; Kilmer v. Smith, 77 N. Y. 226, 33 Am. Rep. 613; Synder v. Ives, 42 Iowa, 162.

There was, it is true, some negligence on the part of the plaintiff in the case at bar. But it was an inadvertence of a character which will sometimes occur in the conduct of men of prudence and caution. The plat and lease were sent to an abstract company by plaintiff's attorney with instructions to prepare a certificate of title and also a description for insertion in the deed. This was done, and the description, written on a slip of paper, was returned to the attorney, but in some way not explained the exception mentioned in the lease was not inserted therein. It was copied into the deed by the typewriter in this erroneous form. The attention of all the parties was particularly directed to other features of the transaction and to other parts of the description, the omission of the exception clause was not observed by any of them, and all signed the deed believing that the description therein was the same as in the lease. The negligence was not so gross as to constitute a neglect of legal duty, or forfeit the right of either party aggrieved to relief from the mistake.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

BELL v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 4,591.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 11, 1906.)

COSTS—TAXATION OF COSTS—PROCEEDINGS—STATUTES.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1034, provides that a party claiming costs awarded to him by the appellate court must deliver to the clerk of the court below a memorandum of his costs, etc. Section 1033 provides that a party claiming costs on recovering a judgment, must file and serve a memorandum thereof on the adverse party, and if the latter is dissatisfied with the costs claimed, he may move to retax them. Held, that a party seeking to have costs, awarded generally in the appellate court, taxed in the lower court, must comply with the provisions of section 1033 with respect to the service of notice on the adverse party, as otherwise section 1034 would be violative of Const. art. 1, § 13, providing that no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law, which means a notice and an opportunity to be heard in the matter in which the judgment follows.

Shaw, J. dissenting.

In Bank. Writ of Review to Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Petition for a writ of review by Teresa Bell against the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco and another. Writ dismissed.

T. Z. Blakeman, for petitioner. Edmund Tauszky and Wallace A. Wise, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. This is a petition for a writ of review. On November 19, 1904, in the case of Teresa Bell v. Mary E. Pleasant et al., on appeal to this court, the judgment and order of the superior court, denying the motion of plaintiff for a new trial, was reversed (Bell v. Pleasant, 145 Cal. 410, 78 Pac. 957, 104 Am. St. Rep. 61), and the cause remanded to the superior court for a new trial, with costs allowed said plaintiff on appeal. On the day plaintiff filed the remittitur from this court in the superior court, she also filed in said court a memorandum duly verified of her costs on said appeal, amounting to the sum of $269.50, and subsequently had an execution issued thereon as upon a judgment, as provided by section 1034 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Upon the issuance of said execution, the defendants served and filed a notice of motion in said action for an order of the superior court striking from the files thereof the memorandum of costs of plaintiff, and to vacate and annul the said execution. Said motion was based upon the ground that neither said memorandum of costs allowed on appeal, nor notice of the filing thereof had ever been served upon defendants, and supported the motion by an affidavit showing the fact of such nonservice, which was not controverted. Upon the hearing the superior court made an order granting said motion, and struck out said memorandum of costs, and vacated and annulled said execution. Thereupon this proceeding was commenced by plaintiff to have these orders of the superior court, striking out said memorandum of costs and quashing said execution, set aside and annulled as in excess of its jurisdiction.

Proceeding now to a consideration of the matter on its merits. In the chapter in the Code of Civil Procedure on "Costs," it is provided by section 1033 thereof, stating its provisions generally, that a party in whose favor judgment is rendered, and who claims costs, must file and serve a verified memorandum thereof upon the adverse party within a given time, and that if the party so served is dissatisfied with the costs claimed, he may, within a certain time, move to retax them. Section 1034, immediately following, provides that "whenever costs are awarded to a party by an appellate court, if he claims such costs, he must, within thirty days after the remittitur is filed with the clerk below, deliver to such clerk a memorandum of his costs, verified as prescribed by the preceding section, and thereafter he may have an execution therefor as upon a judgment." It will be observed that this latter section does not, in terms, provide for service of any notice on the adverse party relative to such memorandum, and it is insisted by petitioner that, as he complied literally with the provision of that section by filing his cost bill within 30 days after the filing of the remittitur, that is all that the law required of him, and he was entitled to execution; that not only is no notice required to be given by that section, but that the section itself contains no specific provision for retaxing costs, and that if illegal or excessive items of costs are charged, application must be made to this court for relief, or an independent action in equity be brought for that purpose. But this court has nothing to do with the particular items of costs to which a party may be entitled under a judgment rendered therefor by this court. The effect of our judgment is simply that a party is entitled to costs. What they are, the specific amount which he would be entitled to have fixed or allowed therefor, are matters to be determined by the trial court to which the cause is remanded, or to which the remittitur runs. The determination of that court on the subject necessarily constitutes the definite and specific judgment concerning which the general right to recover was declared by this court. There is no provision of law authorizing this court to tax or retax the costs it allows on appeal from a judgment, or order of the superior court, either reversed or affirmed. That is a matter solely for consideration in the lower court.

And, it is true that section 1034 does not provide for any right of the party against whom costs are claimed to have them retaxed. The section, as literally construed, provides neither for a notice of the filing of the cost bill, nor for any right to the adverse party to be heard concerning the legality or propriety of any of the items in it. And herein rests the vice of the section if it is to be construed as contended for by plaintiff, that there is no provision in the law requiring notice of the filing of the memorandum, or affording defendants a right to be heard concerning its items, because, under such circumstances, costs are imposed and the judgment for them obtained without affording any right or opportunity to defendants to be heard in the matter. Any and all kinds of illegal and excessive charges may be made. No authority is conferred on the court by the section to revise them. The memorandum is simply filed with the clerk, and execution therefor may immediately be issued and the property of defendants taken upon such execution under judgment for costs obtained against them without notice. It hardly needs to be suggested that if the section in question is to be so construed, that it is violative of the constitutional provision (Const., art. 1, § 13) that no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law which is held to mean upon notice and an opportunity to be heard in the matter in which the judgment follows. Hovey v. Elliott, 167 U. S. 409, 17 Sup. Ct. 841, 42 L. Ed. 215. There is nothing in the point that the defendants may have their action in equity. Certainly it has no force here. If the order or judgment for a specific amount of costs under the section referred to is void for want of notice and an opportunity to be heard, the method adopted here is a proper proceeding for annulling it, and it is immaterial what other redress, if any, defendants might have.

It is suggested, too, that the section itself was notice to the defendants that within 30 days after the filing of the remittitur the plaintiff might file a memorandum of costs, and that it was the duty of defendants to look out for such filing, and, if they questioned the items of the memorandum, to file a motion to retax costs. But, if we assume that the section is itself notice, still the constitutional objection is not obviated, because there is nothing contained in section 1034 conferring any right upon the adverse party to question the tax bill, by either a motion to retax, or in any other manner. He is given no right whatever to be heard, assuming that the section gives notice. He is given only a partial measure of his constitutional rights—notice—but the right to be heard before a judgment which may deprive him of his property on execution thereunder is made is not given him at all. Hence the claim of petitioner as to the section giving notice, does not obviate the constitutional difficulty, which the failure to confer any right upon the adverse party to be heard, presents. In view of our discussion so far, relative to section 1034 alone, this situation presents itself, that, while this court is authorized under the law to award costs upon appeal, and the lower court to which our mandate runs, is the tribunal where they are to be specifically ascertained, yet the judgment of this court as to such award is rendered ineffectual because no provision is made, in the section in question under which such costs are to be ascertained, for notice to the party sought to be charged with their payment, or an opportunity afforded him to be heard in the lower court relative to them; in effect that if the right of the prevailing party to have his costs on appeal fixed and an execution issued therefor depends solely upon the provisions of section 1034, then no such right exists, as the section is unconstitutional on account of its failure to provide for notice and an opportunity for the adverse party to be heard. It is with extreme reluctance that courts feel constrained to hold any law unconstitutional, and only do so when no other alternative presents itself whereby it can be avoided. In the present case, however, we think that it can be avoided by treating sections 1033 and 1034—sections found in the general chapter on "costs"—as analogous, as was done by the Supreme Court of Montana, where kindred provisions of the statute of that state were before it for consideration.

In the state of Montana the Code of Civil Procedure there, in the general chapter concerning costs, contains provisions identical with the sections of our Code above referred to, and the same question presented here was presented to the Supreme Court of that state in a proceeding similar to this. Section 1867 of the Montana Code corresponds with section 1033 of ours, and the Montana Code section 1869 with section 1034 of this state. The same point was raised in the Supreme Court of Montana as raised here, namely, that section 1869 of the Montana Code (section 1034 of ours) in failing to provide for notice to the adverse party of the filing of the memorandum of costs and providing an opportunity for him to be heard relative thereto, was unconstitutional as depriving one of his property without due process of law. In discussing the points the court there said: "We do not think it necessary to hold section 1869 unconstitutional. The chapter of which this section is a part has to do with costs and the mode by which they may be collected. Section 1867 points out the mode to be pursued for the collection of costs in the district courts, and also in original proceedings in this court; at least it does not in terms apply to district courts exclusively. Section 1869 points out the mode by which they may be collected when awarded on appeal; but we think that all the analogies, as was stated in State ex rel. Hurley v. District Court, supra, 27 Mont. 40, 69 Pac. 244, require notice of the claim to be given under the provisions of section 1867, or that they should be denied. While the exact point now before the court was not raised in State ex rel. Hurley v. District Court, supra, yet what was there said as to the necessity of notice was not impertinent, and is wholly applicable in this case. This rule must govern or the conclusion is inevitable that section 1869 is invalid, and that parties have no means provided by which they may collect costs awarded to them by this court on appeal. Section 1867 clearly does apply to proceedings in this court in some respects. We think it must be held to apply also to the method of claiming in the district court costs awarded by this court on appeal, and that the method pointed out must be pursued, else the court has no power to settle controversies in any manner concerning them. * * * Costs, as costs, are allowed only by statute and can be collected only by the method pointed out by the statute. Citing authorities. When, therefore, the party claiming costs has failed to claim them as directed by the statute, his right to them has not attached, and the court has no other power in the premises than to strike out and disallow them on motion of the adverse party. For these reasons we think that the district court, in proceeding to tax and allow any portion of the bill in controversy, was wholly without jurisdiction, and the order must be annulled." State ex rel. v. District Court, etc. (Mont.) 85 Pac. 367.

The effect of the ruling of the Montana Supreme Court was that, while the section of the Montana Code (section 1869) like our section 1034 did not provide, in terms for notice to the adverse party of the filing of a cost bill in the lower court, for costs awarded by the appellate court, still by analogy the provisions of section 1867—our corresponding section 1033—providing for the presentation and settlement of cost bills where judgments were obtained in the trial court controlled, and that the same notice required there to be given, should be given when it is sought to have costs awarded generally in the appellate court, specifically taxed in the lower court after the appellate judgment allowing them. We are satisfied with the reasoning in the Montana Case, and with the conclusion reached in support of the constitutionality of the section in question, when considered in connection with the other section relative to the matter of taxing costs in the trial court to which we have referred. It is a reasonable and warranted construction which aids in securing to one the benefit of a judgment for costs given to him by the appellate court and of which he would be deprived, at least as far as section 1034 is concerned, were a different result arrived at. As both sides have presented this matter on the merits we have so disposed of it regardless of any question as to whether this application for a writ is the proper remedy.

The petition for the writ is dismissed.

We concur: HENSHAW, J. SLOSS, J. McFARLAND, J. ANGELLOTTI, J.

SHAW, J. I dissent. I do not think it is necessary to declare section 1034 unconstitutional. Section 1033, in my opinion, was not intended to apply to the costs on appeal, and section 1034 is valid without aid from the preceding section. The fact that no notice is expressly required in section 1034 should not render the provision invalid. Nor should it be held that the provision that an execution for such costs may be issued without notice, invalidates the entire section unless the clause of section 1033 in regard to notice is read into section 1034 also. It does not follow from the lack of an express provision in the Code for a previous or contemporaneous notice, that the entire proceeding would be unconstitutional. The court has inherent power to afford an ample remedy for any injustice that may be attempted by the filing of an excessive cost bill. The entire argument of the prevailing opinion is based on a false premise which is not stated, namely, that the superior court cannot entertain any motion, nor afford any relief in a case by any procedure, unless the motion or mode of relief is prescribed in the Code or by some statute. This I hold to be a mistake. The superior court is a court of general jurisdiction, possessing all the usual and ordinary powers of the former courts of law and equity, and it may, therefore, in any emergency not provided in the Code, follow the practice of the common law and chancery courts in similar emergencies, and may adopt any procedure suitable to the exigencies of the case over which it has jurisdiction. Code Civ. Proc., § 187. The statute allows the prevailing party on appeal to file his cost bill without notice. This, of necessity, cannot conclude the adverse party. An unsettled question, the correct amount of costs, remains for determination in such a case, and the court retains jurisdiction for that purpose. The losing party may at any reasonable time thereafter. either before or after the issuance of an execution, avail himself of this jurisdiction and move the court to retax the cost by striking out the items not allowable, and reducing those which are excessive. And no doubt proceedings on execution could be stayed pending the determination of such motion, and the execution could be corrected after the motion was decided. The only restriction upon the right to this motion is that the party must not, after he has notice of the bill, unreasonably delay moving to retax, else he may be defeated by his laches. All these matters, in the absence of statutory provisions on the subject, are within the inherent power of the court. No statute is required to give the court the necessary power to protect the rights of parties to the litigation. In many of the states the costs are taxed by the clerk, without notice to either party, and no statutory procedure for retaxing is provided, and yet motions by either party to retax such costs are among the most frequent of proceedings in those courts, and the power to decide them has never been doubted. The time within which they must be made is a matter for adjustment in such states by judicial decision. The same power must exist in this state in cases for which the Code makes no provision. The courts are as capable as the Legislature of framing a rule and procedure that will be reasonable and just to all parties, and no evils are to be apprehended from the exercise by the courts of the power in this respect which the Legislature has committed to them by section 187 aforesaid. In my opinion the court below should not have granted the motion to strike out the costs, except upon a showing that they were not legally allowable. The appellant has followed the plain letter of the statute and the effect of the majority decision will be that she will be now entirely deprived of her costs, and this is done by means of a strained and unnatural construction adopted to avoid a difficulty which does not exist.

UNION COLLECTION CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY & COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 4,608.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 2, 1906.)

1. Courts — Jurisdiction — Statutory Provisions.

Code Civ. Proc. § 187, provides that, "when jurisdiction is by the Constitution or by this Code, or by any other statute conferred on a court or judicial officer, all the means necessary to carry it into effect are also given, and in the exercise of this jurisdiction, if the course of proceeding be not specifically pointed out by this Code or by the statute, any suitable process or mode of proceeding may be adopted which may appear most comformable to the spirit of this Code." Held, that this section does not confer jurisdiction, but merely enables the court to exercise a jurisdiction otherwise created.

2. Discovery—Jurisdiction.

Const. art. 6, § 5, granting to superior courts jurisdiction in all cases in equity, confers on the court the power to compel a discovery in all cases in which under the established rules of chancery practice existing at the time of the adoption of the Constitution a party would have been entitled to this relief.

3. Same—Nature and Scope of Remedy.

In an action against the stockholders of a corporation, plaintiff was unable to ascertain the whereabouts of all of the defendants, and subpœnaed a witness to appear before the court to give information as to the whereabouts of some of the defendants. Held, that such a proceeding was not one for discovery, as matters sought to be discovered must be material to the existing suit or to one which is to be instituted.

4. Same—Examination before Trial.

Plaintiff in an action against the stockholders of a corporation, being unable to ascertain the whereabouts of all of the defendants, subpœnaed a witness to appear before the court to testify as to the whereabouts of some of the defendants. Held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to examine the witness in such a manner or for such purpose, and the court properly refused to compel her to be sworn.

[Ed Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 16, Discovery, § 10.]

In Bank. Application for writ of mandate by the Union Collection Company prayed to be directed against the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco and the Honorable James M. Troutt, judge thereof. Proceeding dismissed.

J. S. Reed, for petitioner. C. H. Sooy and Eastin, Sooy & Dorn, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. An alternative writ of mandate having been issued by this court, the respondents demur to the petition, and thus raise the question whether the following facts, set forth in the petition, are sufficient in law to authorize the granting of the relief sought: The Union Collection Company, petitioner herein, commenced an action in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against some 240 defendants, stockholders of the El Dorado Exploration Company, a corporation, to compel the payment by such defendants of the unpaid subscription price of their shares for the purpose of satisfying a judgment against said El Dorado Exploration Company, held by petitioner. Summons was issued, and was served on some of the defendants, but petitioner has been unable to ascertain the whereabouts of many of the defendants, and these have consequently not been served, nor have they appeared in the action. In order to get the information necessary to enable it to make service, the petitioner filed in the superior court an affidavit alleging that it could not ascertain the whereabouts of many of the defendants not served except by examining persons connected with the El Dorado Exploration Company; that one of such persons was Mrs. Elizabeth M. Ustick, who refused to give any information which would enable the petitioner to cause summons to be served, and praying for an order requiring Mrs. Ustick to appear before the court to be examined "concerning her knowledge as to the whereabouts of the defendants not served." An order was made as asked, and a subpœna issued and served on Mrs. Ustick. She appeared at the time set and objected to the court proceeding in the matter, upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction. The court sustained her objection, refused to cause her to be sworn, and ordered that she be discharged from further appearance in the matter. The purpose of the present proceeding is to obtain a writ of mandate directing the respondent court and judge to require Mrs. Ustick to be sworn as a witness and to give her testimony in respect to the matter stated in the affidavit. The sole question to be determined is whether the superior court of this state has jurisdiction to compel the defendant, or a stranger to a pending action, to appear before it, prior to trial, and be examined as to the whereabouts of certain defendants, in order that they may be served with summons.

It is not contended by the petitioner that the proposed examination of Mrs. Ustick was authorized by the provisions of the Code relative to the taking of depositions. On the contrary, the argument is that, because there is no specific statutory method applying to such a case as this, the court should compel the giving of the desired information in some suitable mode to be adopted by it. This position is based upon section 187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads: "When jurisdiction is, by the Constitution, or by this Code, or by any other statute, conferred on a court or judicial officer, all the means necessary to carry it into effect are also given; and in the exercise of this jurisdiction, if the course of proceeding be not specifically pointed out by this Code or by the statute, any suitable process or mode of proceeding may be adopted which may appear most conformable to the spirit of this Code." If the superior court, in which an action is pending, has jurisdiction to compel the giving of information as to the whereabouts of defendants whom it is desired to serve with summons, it may be assumed, for the purpose of this discussion, that the "process or mode of proceeding" employed was suitable and conformable to the spirit of the Code. But section 187 obviously does not attempt in itself to confer jurisdiction. It merely operates to enable the court to exercise a jurisdiction otherwise created. Tulare County v. Kings County, 117 Cal. 195, 203, 49 Pac. 8. We are thus brought back to the original question of the power of the superior court, by any mode of procedure, to compel the giving of the information here sought to be obtained from Mrs. Ustick. The alleged power is sought to be derived from the constitutional grant to the superior courts of jurisdiction in "all cases in equity" (Const. art. 6, § 5), including, as is claimed, the power to entertain proceedings in the nature of bills of discovery. It is not necessary here to decide the question adverted to, but not definitely determined, in Wright v. Superior Court, 139 Cal. 469, 73 Pac. 145, whether a bill of discovery can, under any circumstances, be maintained in this state. Whatever may be the ultimate conclusion on this mere matter of procedure, we have no doubt that the superior court, under the constitutional provision cited, has the power, by some sort of process, to compel a discovery in all cases in which, under the established rules of chancery practice, existing at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, a party would have been entitled to this relief.

Is the present case one for a discovery under these rules? We think not. A bill of discovery seeks the disclosure of facts within the knowledge of the defendant, or of papers in his possession, in aid of some other action or proceeding. The discovery may be sought in the same suit in which the ultimate relief is pursued, or it may be sought merely in aid of some other proceeding pending or to be brought. But whether the bill be for discovery and relief, or for discovery only, it is well settled that the matters as to which discovery is sought must be material to the existing suit or to the one which is to be instituted. 6 Ency. of Pl. & Pr. 740; Bisp. Prin. of Eq. (4th Ed.) § 560; 1 Pom. Eq. Jurisp. (3d. Ed.) § 201. See, also, many cases cited in 16 Century Digest, cols. 1991 & 1992. Here the action in aid of which the plaintiff claims the right to a discovery was already pending. The matters as to which disclosure is sought are in no way material to the issues presented by the main action in the court below, and a disclosure of them will not assist the plaintiff therein (petitioner here) in establishing its case. The facts constituting the cause of action are fully known to the plaintiff, and have been set forth by it in its complaint. What it seeks now is not the disclosure of facts relevant to the cause of action or which will assist in establishing it, but of facts, entirely collateral to the merits, which will enable it to bring defendants within the jurisdiction of the court. No case has been cited which extends the right of discovery to a state of facts such as is here presented. In Post v. Toledo, etc., R. R. Co., 144 Mass. 341, 11 N. E. 540, 59 Am. Rep. 86, the plaintiff, creditor of a corporation, was allowed a discovery of the names of stockholders, in order that he might enforce the individual liability of such stockholders. But the names of such stockholders constituted information which was essential to plaintiff in order that he might frame his proposed declaration or complaint, and institute his action. While the name and identity of the proposed defendants are certainly material to a cause of action about to be instituted, the whereabouts of defendants who are known and who have been made parties, cannot be said to be material to an action already pending against them. Hoppock's Executors v. United N. J. R. R. & C. Co., 27 N. J. Eq. 286 (reversed, on a ground not here involved, in 28 N. J. Eq. 261), is similar in principle to Post v. Railroad Company. The other cases cited by petitioner have no bearing upon the particular point now under discussion.

Since the information sought was not material to the action in aid of which the proceeding against Mrs. Ustick was instituted, the petitioner could not, under any system of procedure, have maintained a bill of discovery against her. For the same reason, such petitioner was not entitled to examine her as a witness in the manner here attempted, and the court properly refused to compel her to be sworn.

The proceeding is dismissed.

HUNT BROS. CO. et al. v. SAN LORENZO WATER CO. (S. F. 3,572.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 11, 1906.)

1. Damages—Breach of Contract — Consequences Within Contemplation of Parties.

Under Civ. Code, § 3300, fixing the measure of damages for breach of contract as the amount which in the ordinary course of things will be likely to result therefrom, the damages recoverable for a breach of contract are only such as may reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties at the time of the making of the contract as the probable result of the breach, in the light of the facts known, or which should have been known.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Damages, § 58.]

2. Same.

Where a contract calls for a continuance of an instituted water service for the purpose of extinguishing fires, loss by fire as the consequence of a breach may be reasonably supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties, and therefore recoverable.

3. Same.

A manufacturer and a water company entered into an agreement whereby the company agreed to lay a main to a point near the manufacturer's premises, connect the premises by a service pipe to supply the manufacturer with water at a specified rate, and erect and install a fire hydrant near the premises to be used by the manufacturer in case of fire. No time was prescribed for the completion of the work, or for the commencement of the service, except that it was to commence on the installation of the necessary pipes and hydrant. Subsequently the company promised to commence work immediately. No special circumstances were known to the company or to the manufacturer making it essential to the protection of its property from fire that the contemplated service should be commenced within any particular time. Held, that damages by fire to the manufacturer's property before the installation of the fire hydrant were not recoverable, for they could not reasonably be supposed to be within the contemplation of the parties.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Action by the Hunt Bros. Company and others against the San Lorenzo Water Company. From a judgment for defendant rendered on sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Van Ness & Redman, for appellants. E. S. Pillsbury, Alfred Sutro, and Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from a judgment given in favor of defendant; a demurrer to plaintiffs' amended complaint having been sustained, and plaintiffs having failed to amend.

The action was brought to recover $124,496.98, damages, resulting from the destruction of certain property, the injury to other property, and a loss of profits from an established business, all occasioned by a fire, which occurred on April 12, 1901, which fire occurred without any fault on the part of plaintiffs. The corporation, Hunt Bros. Company, which will hereafter be called the plaintiff, was the owner of all said property. The numerous other plaintiffs were insurance companies which had, at the time of the fire, policies in force covering, respectively, various portions of said property, insuring plaintiff against loss by fire, and which had paid plaintiff upon said policies, on account of said loss, amounts aggregating $91,221.42, and, having received assignments from plaintiff of its claim against defendant to the extent of the amount so paid by them, are here endeavoring to collect the amount paid by them, from defendant. The plaintiff was engaged in the business of fruit canning, packing, manufacturing cans, storage of fruits, canned goods, etc. The property injured and destroyed consisted of certain buildings used and occupied in the conduct of said business, machinery, and other implements used in such business, and the stock on hand, and 74 cottages occupied by employés of plaintiff. All this property was situated on certain premises occupied by plaintiff in Hayward, Alameda county, Cal. The allegations of the complaint upon which it is sought to hold defendant liable for the amount of this loss are substantially as follows: Defendant was a water company, engaged in the business of supplying water to the inhabitants of Hayward by means of mains laid in the streets of the town, and pipes running therefrom to the premises of its customers. Some time between September, 1900, and March, 1901, plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement, whereby defendant agreed to lay a six-inch main from one of its mains charged and supplied with water, to a point near one corner of plaintiff's premises, to connect said premises with this new main by a service pipe, and to thereupon supply plaintiff, by means thereof, with 100,000 cubic feet of water annually, at the rate of 25 cents per 100 cubic feet, and as much more as might be required at 20 cents per 100 cubic feet; plaintiff agreeing to consume annually 100,000 cubic feet, and pay for it at the 25-cent rate. Defendant further agreed that it would erect and install a fire hydrant near said premises, to be used by plaintiff in case the premises should take fire, and connect the same with said main, and supply plaintiff, by means thereof, with water for the purpose of extinguishing any fire which might occur on said premises, in consideration of the payment by plaintiff to defendant of $2.75 a month, which plaintiff agreed to pay. No time was specified for the commencement or completion of this work. Defendant laid the new main to a point near one corner of plaintiff's premises, as agreed, but failed to install the service pipe or the fire hydrant. On March 14, 1901, plaintiff remonstrated with defendant because of its failure to do these things, and defendant, on March 15, 1901, promised in writing that it would "immediately commence the work" of putting in the service pipe to connect the premises with the main, and also that it would "immediately commence the work" of erecting and installing said fire hydrant and connecting the same with the main. It failed to commence to do either of these things prior to the fire.

It is alleged that, if defendant had commenced the work of connecting said premises with the main, and the work of erecting, installing, and connecting the fire hydrant, as it had agreed to do, and had prosecuted said work to an end with ordinary diligence, said premises would have been so connected and said fire hydrant installed and connected and ready for use in March, 1901; and that, if said hydrant had been so installed and connected at the time of the fire, said fire could and would have been extinguished, by means of the water which would have thereby become available, before it had damaged the property to the extent of $5,000; and that therefore the additional loss and damage were wholly due to defendant's neglect and failure to comply with the terms of its agreement. We are satisfied that the damages alleged cannot be recovered as a consequence of the breach of contract alleged. In so saying we do not dispute the proposition, made by learned counsel for appellant, to the effect that a failure to furnish water, under a contract requiring one to do so, may, under some circumstances, entitle the other party to the contract to recover, as damages for such breach of contract, the value of such of his property destroyed by fire as would have been saved by the water, had it been furnished in accordance with the contract. We have examined the cases cited from other states by counsel upon this proposition, and find that with practical unanimity they appear to support the conclusion that the circumstances may be such as to make the person who agreed to furnish water for the extinguishment of fires liable for the failure to furnish it as agreed, in the value of such property destroyed by fire as would have been saved by the water, if it had been furnished. New Orleans, etc., Co. v. Meridian Waterworks, 72 Fed. 227, 18 C. C. A. 519; Middlesex Water Co. v. Knappman Whiting Co., 64 N. J. Law, 240, 45 Atl. 692; Paducah Lumber Co. v. Paducah, etc., Co., 89 Ky. 340, 12 S. W. 554, 13 S. W. 249, 7 L. R. A. 77, 25 Am. St. Rep. 536; Gorrell v. Water Supply Co., 124 N. C. 328, 32 S. E. 720, 46 L. R. A. 513, 70 Am. St. Rep. 598; Planters' Oil Mill v. Monroe Water Co. (La.) 27 South. 684; Lenzen v. City of New Braunfels (Tex. Civ. App.) 35 S. W. 341; Atkinson v. Water Co., L. R. 6 Exch. 404. See, also, Ukiah v. Ukiah, etc., Co., 142 Cal. 173, 179, 75 Pac. 773, 64 L. R. A. 231, 100 Am. St. Rep. 107.

The cases cited are, however, all cases where the contract had been executed to the extent of installing and commencing the contemplated service, and the respective parties to the contract were acting thereunder; the one purporting to supply water for the purpose designated by the contract, viz., the extinguishment of fires, and receiving the agreed consideration therefor, and the other paying for such service, and relying upon the continued observance of the contract by the water company as a protection against such fires as might occur on the premises. As to such a situation it may well be said, as was, in fact, said in some of the cases cited, that, in view of the fact that water may be supplied in such quantity and manner as to usually extinguish a fire before serious damage is done, when promptly and efficiently used, it may reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties that a loss by fire would be the probable result of a failure to comply with the contract at the time the fire occurred. It could only be upon such a theory that one party would pay for the continuance of the service for fire purposes, and the other receive the sums so paid. And it is solely by reason of the fact that, in such cases, damage by fire may reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties as a consequence of a breach of the contract to furnish water, that the liability for such damage may be held to attach, for it certainly cannot be held that any such liability would exist for the breach of a contract to simply furnish water for no particular designated purpose, or for designated purposes not including the extinguishment of fires, even although it might be that, if there had been no breach, the fire would have been extinguished in its incipiency by the water furnished, and such breach therefore would have been indirectly and remotely the cause of the loss. The law of damages does not concern itself with such remote causes. As said in Martin v. Deetz, 102 Cal. 55, 68, 36 Pac. 368, 372, 41 Am. St. Rep. 151: "Remote results, produced by intermediate sequences of causes, are beyond the reach of any just and practicable rule of damages." Field, in his work on Damages (section 10), says: "To trace remote effects of causes would often be a difficult, if not an infinite, task. It would require an infinite mind. Each cause produces results that in turn, alone or by combination with other causes, produces other effects, and so ad infinitum. It is a subject too abstruse and complicated for the human mind. In the quaint language of Lord Bacon 'It were infinite for the law to consider the cause of causes, and their impulsion one on another.'" No case cited goes to the extent of holding that one may be liable for a breach of contract to furnish water, in the value of property destroyed by a fire, unless the case was such that damage of this kind might reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties to the contract as a consequence of a breach thereof, and, in the case of Beck v. Kittanning Co. (Pa.) 11 Atl. 300, it was expressly declared that, as the plaintiff, who had a contract for water for general use, had no contract with the defendant for a supply of water for the extinguishment of fire, he had no cause of action on his contract for damages resulting from destruction of his property by fire.

It is the well-settled general rule of damages for any breach of contract that the damages that can be recovered for a breach are only such as may reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties at the time of the making of the contract, as the probable result of a breach. Other damages are too remote. In this lies the distinction between damages for breach of contract and damages for tort; the rule as to tort being that the injured person may recover for all detriment proximately caused thereby, "whether it could have been anticipated or not." Section 3333, Civ. Code. Such, as we understand it, is the rule declared by section 3300 of the Civil Code, as that section has always been construed by this court, and it is the rule enunciated in the leading case of Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341, which has been universally accepted and followed. See Mitchell v. Clarke, 71 Cal. 165, 11 Pac. 882, 60 Am. Rep. 529. As has often been suggested by writers upon this subject, the remote effects of slight causes are so beyond all possible conception of the parties to a contract, both in character and extent, that any other rule would practically preclude the making of contracts altogether, for no sane person could be expected to assume such uncertain and limitless liability. This rule does not mean that the parties should actually have contemplated the very consequence that occurred, but simply that the consequence for which compensation is sought must be such as the parties may be reasonably supposed, in the light of all the facts known, or which should have been known to them, to have considered as likely to follow in the ordinary course of things, from a breach, and therefore to have, in effect, stipulated against. The understanding and intention of the parties in this regard must, of course, be ascertained from the language of the contract, in the light of such facts. See Sutherland on Damages, § 45.

Where a contract calls for the continuance of an instituted water service for the purpose of extinguishing fires, loss by fire as the consequence of a breach may, as already suggested, be reasonably supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties. This may also be true in the event of such a service contracted to be commenced at a certain definite time in the future, especially if the special circumstances are such as to make it essential that the particular protection from fire to be thereby afforded should commence at that time, and those circumstances were made known to the person or company contracting to furnish the service. As to this, however, it is not necessary here to decide. The contract here alleged was, in effect, first, to lay and install certain pipes through which water for general use might be supplied, and to install one fire hydrant, through which water for use in the event of fire might be supplied; and, second, such pipes and fire hydrant having been installed, thereupon to commence supplying water for those purposes, and to continue supplying it at certain prescribed rates. No time whatever was prescribed for the completion of the work essential to the furnishing of such water, or for the commencement of the water service, except that it was to commence upon the installation of the necessary pipes and hydrant. We attach no importance to the subsequent "promise" of March 15, 1901, on the part of defendant, that it would "immediately commence the work" essential to the installing of the service for the various purposes designated. Giving this additional promise full force as a part of the contract between the parties, there was therein no undertaking on the part of defendant that the work so to be commenced would be completed and the water service instituted at any certain definite time. There was no allegation whatever as to any special circumstances known to defendant, or, for that matter, to plaintiff, making it essential to the protection of the property from fire that the contemplated service should be commenced within any particular time. The case presented, then, is one where the parties simply agreed upon the installation and commencement of a water service for various purposes, including one hydrant to be used for the extinguishment of possible fires, upon the installation and commencement of which the plaintiff was to commence paying, at certain prescribed rates, for the water furnished; no definite time for the commencement of such service being fixed, and no special circumstance appearing, by reason of which it might be anticipated that it was essential to the protection of plaintiff's property from fire that the service should be commenced within any particular time, or, as plaintiff claims, within a reasonable time.

Under such circumstances, it appears very clear to us that damage by fire to plaintiff's property cannot reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties, as possible to be caused by a failure on the part of defendant to commence the water service agreed upon. The plaintiff not having stipulated for the limited protection against fire, to be furnished thereby, to commence at or within any particular time, and, under the terms of the contract, paying for such protection only from the time of the actual commencement thereof, could not, until the actual commencement of the service, be considered as relying on such protection, or on the commencement thereof at any particular time, in the slightest degree, and there was nothing to warrant even a supposition on the part of defendant that plaintiff did so rely. The utmost that can be reasonably contended to have been within the contemplation of the parties in this regard was that, when at some future indefinite time the hydrant had once been installed, and the service actually commenced, water would thenceforth be available, by means of the hydrant, for the extinguishment of possible fires, and that any failure to then have it so available, in the event of a fire, might cause damage to plaintiff's property. This was the full extent of the contract of the parties, and the parties could not be understood as stipulating for such protection prior to the actual commencement of the service. This being so, whatever might be the proper measure of damage for a breach of contract in failing to install the service within a reasonable time, loss of property by fire could not be an element thereof. Until the actual assumption of the duty of such protection, damage by fire could not be held to be within the contemplation of the parties as a possible consequence of a breach, and in no legal sense of the words could such damage be held to have been caused by the breach alleged, although, if it had not been for such breach, water might have been available for the extinguishment of the fire. The case is no different in principle from one where water is furnished by contract for other than fire purposes, and a fire occurs which could have been extinguished by such water if it had been available, but, owing to some failure of the person furnishing the water, no water is available, and the property is destroyed. As already stated, although in such a case the breach is, in one sense of the words, a cause of the loss, there could be no recovery, for the water company has not assumed the duty of protecting the other's property from fire, and loss by fire is not therefore damage possible within the contemplation of the parties to the contract. Here, although water was ultimately to be furnished for fire purposes, the defendant had not, under the terms of its contract, assumed the duty of so protecting plaintiff's property at the time of the fire.

We are of the opinion that the amended complaint did not show any damage for which recovery might be had, and that the demurrer was therefore properly sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

PAVKOVICH v. SOUTHERN PAC. RY. CO. et al. (L. A. 1,459.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 24, 1906. On Rehearing Oct. 11, 1906.)

1. Deeds—Reservation—Construction.

A deed granted and conveyed certain land "for the purpose and with the limitation that the rock and material taken therefrom by the grantee, its lessees or assigns, is for railroad purposes, and the grantee is not to carry on the business of furnishing rock for any other purpose, or for such purposes and in such business as the party of the second part may be engaged." Another clause provided that the conveyance was on condition that the grantee, within two years, construct a railroad to certain quarries, otherwise the conveyance should be forfeited. Held, that the subsequent clauses were not in irreconcilable conflict with the premises within the rule that they should be disregarded, but they qualified or limited the estate granted, reserving to the grantor a contingent estate, with the restriction for its benefit as to the taking of rock.

2. Same.

The limitation as to the removal of rock was for the benefit of the grantor, and therefore, under the express terms of Civ. Code, § 1069, was to be interpreted in his favor, and as so construed the grantee had no right to furnish rock taken from the premises to others.

3. Same—Covenants.

Whether or not the restriction be construed as a covenant running with the land, it was a covenant binding on the assigns of the grantee.

4. Contracts — Validity — Restraint of Trade.

The deed was not to be construed as giving the grantee right to remove any quantity of rock he desired and then limiting the use he might make of such rock, and was not, therefore, in restraint of trade.

5. Waste—Complaint—Sufficiency.

In an action to enjoin waste and for damages, an allegation that plaintiff was the owner in fee simple of all the lands described, "subject only to the terms and provisions" of a certain deed of a portion of the land, reserving a right to the grantor, sufficiently showed that plaintiff was the heir or assign of the original grantor.

6. Same—Injunction—Damages.

The owner of a contingent estate in premises might enjoin waste in the taking of rock, but, not having a vested interest in the rock removed, could not recover damages therefor.

McFarland, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by John L. Pavkovich against the Southern Pacific Railway Company and the California Construction Company. From a judgment sustaining demurrers to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Charles S. Allison, Davis & Rush, and A. W. Hutton, for appellant. Bicknell, Gibson & Trask, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Since the taking of this appeal the plaintiff has died and Spiro B. Radovich, as the executor of his last will, has been substituted as plaintiff in his stead. The appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment in favor of the defendants, upon the sustaining of a demurrer to the complaint based on the ground that the complaint does not state a cause of action. The action purports to be for damages caused by the removal of rock from certain land, and to enjoin further waste of the same character. On April 25, 1888, Declez and Beaudry were the owners in fee simple of the land in question, the same being a part of section 35, township 1 south, range 6 west, San Bernardino base and meridian. They also apparently owned the entire section, or a considerable part thereof. On or near to this section were certain stone quarries known as the "Declez Quarries," but whether or not Declez and Beaudry had any interest therein does not appear. On the day mentioned they executed to the Pacific Improvement Company a deed, conveying to said company certain strips of land in said section, to be used as ways for a railroad connecting said quarries with the main line of the Southern Pacific Railroad from Los Angeles to Yuma, and certain spur tracks necessary for the convenient working of the quarry, and also the tract from which the defendants are now taking rock, which tract contains seven acres of land. The conveyance of this seven-acre tract of land was expressly made subject to certain limitations, upon the effect of which the plaintiff's right of action depends. After the execution of this deed the Pacific Improvement Company conveyed all its right, title, and interest thereunder to the defendant, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and the plaintiff became, and still is, the owner in fee simple (but subject to the rights of the defendant under the deed of Declez and Beaudry to the Pacific Improvement Company) of all the lands described in said deed, including the seven-acre tract. The California Construction Company is building for the United States the breakwater in the harbor at San Pedro, and for that purpose, by agreement with the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, is quarrying and removing rock from the seven-acre tract, and using the same in the construction of the breakwater. The plaintiff in this action seeks to recover damages for the rock that has been taken from this tract for that purpose, and to enjoin the further taking thereof for such purpose.

The right of the defendants to take this rock, and of the plaintiff to maintain this action, depends on the effect of certain clauses of the deed of Declez and Beaudry to the Pacific Improvement Company. This deed first conveys the strips of land intended for the rights of way. Then follow the paragraphs purporting to convey the seven-acre tract and the qualifying clauses. This part of the deed is as follows: "And the said parties of the first part also grant and convey onto the said party of the second part a tract of land in said section 35, described as follows: [here is described the seven-acre tract in controversy]. The conveyance of the tract of land last-above described to the party of the second part is for the purpose and with the limitation that the rock and material taken therefrom by the party of the second part or by its lessees or assigns is for railroad purposes, and the party of the second part or its lessees or assigns is not to carry on the business of furnishing rock for any other purpose than that of railroad purposes, or for such purposes and in such business as the party of the second part may be engaged. This conveyance is made to the party of the second part on condition that the said party of the second part shall construct a railroad from the main line hereinbefore described within two years from the date hereof, and shall operate the same; and in the event that said railroad is not constructed within the time above mentioned, or if the said party of the second part shall fail to operate said railroad or abandon the same as a railroad, then and thereupon the estate hereby granted shall be forfeited to the parties of the first part, their heirs or assigns, and this conveyance shall become null and void. This conveyance is made for the purpose and to the end that a railroad shall be constructed and operated over the line aforesaid from the main track of the Southern Pacific Railroad to the quarries herein mentioned, and that the same be completed and operated within two years from this date."

The plaintiff claims that the effect of the qualifying clauses quoted is to limit or qualify the estate which would otherwise pass by the words "grant and convey," so that the estate actually transferred is not a fee simple, but a fee qualified by the limitation that the grantee, or its lessees or assigns, shall have no right to remove from the seven acres any rock, except such as should be found necessary or convenient for the building or maintenance of railroads, or for use in some other business in which the grantee might engage; that the provision for a forfeiture upon the violation of the condition subsequent, in effect, reserved to the grantor a contingent estate in the land granted, which could be, and has been, transferred to the plaintiff, and that the ownership of this estate in the land invests the plaintiff with a right to enjoin the taking of rock therefrom for any other purposes than those specified in the limitation. The defendants contend that the limitation clause does not purport to withhold from the grantee the right to take rock from the land in such quantity as it should choose, even extending to all the rock therein contained, but that it merely limits and restricts the uses to which such rock may be devoted after it is removed; that it is a purely personal covenant, binding only upon the Pacific Improvement Company, and not upon its assigns; that it does not run with the land, and that, in effect, it is a provision that the grantee shall not use rock taken from the land, except for certain purposes, and is a restriction repugnant to the estate conveyed by the granting clause, and therefore void; and hence, that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company cannot be enjoined from the removal of any or all of the rock, and, being a grantee of the Pacific Improvement Company, it is not liable in damages in an action on the covenant, which binds no one but the original parties.

A reservation or exception in a grant is to be interpreted in favor of the grantor. Civ. Code, § 1069; Code Civ. Proc. § 1864; Martin v. Lloyd, 94 Cal. 203, 29 Pac. 491; Sears v. Ackerman, 138 Cal. 586, 72 Pac. 171. The rules of interpretation in such cases are well stated in Barnett v. Barnett, 104 Cal. 300, 37 Pac. 1050, as follows: "A grant is to be interpreted in the same manner as any other contract (Civ. Code, § 1066), so as to give effect to the intention of the parties, if it can be ascertained (section 1636), and, for the purpose of ascertaining that intention, 'the whole of the contract is to be taken together, so as to give effect to every part, if reasonably practicable, each clause helping to interpret the other' (section 1641). * * * The rule that, if the habendum is repugnant to the premises, it is to be disregarded, is only another form of the rule that, 'if several parts of a grant are absolutely irreconcilable, the former part prevails' (Civ. Code, § 1070). The intention of the parties to the grant is to be gathered from the instrument itself, and determined by a proper construction of the language used therein, but for the purpose of ascertaining this intention the entire instrument the habendum as well as the premises, are to be considered, and, if it appear from such consideration that the grantee intended by the habendum clause to restrict or limit or enlarge the estate named in the granting clause, the habendum clause will prevail over the granting clause. It is in such case to be considered as an addendum or proviso to the conveyancing clause, which, by a well-settled rule of construction, must control the conveyancing clause or premises, even to the extent of destroying the effect of the same." In other cases it is said that: "The tendency of modern decisions is to uphold conveyances, and give effect to the intention of the parties, regardless of technical rules of construction." Faivre v. Dailey, 93 Cal. 671, 29 Pac. 258. "It matters little what name we give to the rights reserved to the grantor in a deed. Attempts to create symmetry in the law by classification and designation of classes of different kinds of rights connected with, and springing out of, lands are always hazardous" (Painter v. Pasadena, etc., Co., 91 Cal. 84, 85, 27 Pac. 542); and "to arrive at this intention, the situation of the parties and the subject-matter at the time of contracting should be considered" (Stockton v. Weber, 98 Cal. 439, 33 Pac. 334; Brannan v. Mesick, 10 Cal. 106). The clause immediately following the description of the seven acres, which we designate as the limitation clause, is loosely and awkwardly drawn, and discloses the work of one not skilled in the use of language nor familiar with technical definitions. Upon a consideration of the whole instrument and the circumstances appearing therefrom, the intention of the parties is not difficult to ascertain. The main object of the grantors, which is expressed in the last clause, was to secure railroad transportation to the Declez quarries, and the other clauses manifest a clear purpose to give nothing not necessary to attain that object. They were careful to insert a provision forfeiting the granted estate upon the failure to build the road within two years, or to operate it thereafter, so that, upon failure to secure the object, the grantors would lose nothing and the grantee would obtain nothing. The seven acres were manifestly demanded by the grantee in order to get rock therefrom for use in its business of railroad construction. The purpose of the limitation clause, though awkwardly expressed, was to define and restrict this right as the parties understood it to be given. It qualifies the grant for the benefit of the grantors, and consequently is, in effect, a reservation to be interpreted in their favor. The design was, in part at least, to protect the contingent estate so that, if it became vested, the grantors would not find it stripped of the rock not required for the uses allowed. To construe it as providing that all the rock could be removed by the grantee, but that, when removed, no use could ever be made of any of it, except the limited use mentioned, so that the remainder could be taken for no purpose at all, except to violate the agreement, or wantonly to injure the grantors, would render the clause, to that extent, foolish, ridiculous, and vicious. A construction producing such results is to be avoided if any other reasonable meaning is possible. In view of the objects to be accomplished, the provision that "the conveyance is for the purpose and with the limitation that the rock taken from the land by the grantor is for railroad purposes," may reasonably be understood to have been intended to prohibit the taking of rock for any other purpose. The doctrine that, where the habendum, or other subsequent clause, is repugnant to the premises, the premises must prevail, applies only where the two are irreconcilable. And it does not apply where it appears from the whole conveyance, or from the language of the subsequent clause, that the grantor intended thereby to qualify the granting clause, or where the grantee will receive an estate of value even if the granting clause be modified as may be necessary to give effect to all parts of the deed. Barnett v. Barnett, supra; Faivre v. Dailey, supra; Morrison v. Wilson, 30 Cal. 344; Pellissier v. Corker, 103 Cal. 518, 37 Pac. 465; 1 Devlin on Deeds, § 215a; Bodine v. Arthur, 91 Ky. 53, 14 S. W. 904, 34 Am. St. Rep. 162; Fogarty v. Stack, 86 Tenn. 610, 8 S. W. 846; Bassett v. Budlong, 77 Mich. 338, 43 N. W. 984, 18 Am. St. Rep. 404; Gay v. Walker, 36 Me. 54, 58 Am. Dec. 734; Cooney v. Hayes, 40 Vt. 478, 94 Am. Dec. 425; Cravens v. White, 73 Tex. 577, 11 S. W. 543, 15 Am. St. Rep. 803. The clause is, therefore, in effect, a limitation upon the estate of the grantee in the seven-acre tract to the extent that it could not take rock therefrom except for the purpose therein stated. Hence it follows that the grantee had no right, as against the grantors, to take the rock for the purpose of constructing a breakwater.

In support of the position that the limitation clause is a mere personal covenant, binding on the Pacific Improvement Company alone, the defendants rely on the decision in Los Angeles Terminal Land Co. v. Muir et al., 136 Cal. 36, 68 Pac. 308. The clause considered in that case followed a clause purporting to grant an estate in fee simple, and it was expressed in these words: "It is hereby covenanted and agreed by and between the parties hereto, that, in consideration of this conveyance, no saloon business or business of vending malt, vinous, or spiritutous liquors, shall ever be carried on upon said lot, neither shall said lot be used for any business or store purpose other than for hotel, lodging house or club purposes." It did not purport to be made by, or on behalf of, or for the benefit of, the assigns or lessees of either party, but ran to the parties only, and the deed contained no reservation to the grantor of any interest, conditional or otherwise, in the land granted. Herein it was essentially different from the instrument here in question. In that case the original grantee was not a party to the action, and the court, upon the point that the covenant was personal and binding on the grantee only, and hence not enforceable in equity against a subsequent grantee, say that the plaintiff in that case, who was the grantor, "could have inserted a covenant which would have inured to the protection of plaintiff's grantee or successor in interest, and would have expressly bound the Yacht Club [the grantee in the deed]. It did not do either, but contented itself with a covenant, in its terms purely personal, purporting to create a restriction upon the use of the property so long only as the vendee should retain the title, * * * and as there is no personal contract relation between the parties to this action, the plaintiff is not entitled to any relief against the defendants, unless the evidence shows with reasonable certainty that the use of the lot for ferry purposes would materially injure the remaining property of the plaintiff." In the present case the clause in question, treating it as a covenant not to take rock except for certain uses, expressly purports to bind the grantee, and also its lessees and assigns. There is also a condition subsequent whereby there is reserved to the grantor a contingent estate in the identical rock which the defendants are removing. This contingent estate is a species of property and may be transferred. Civ. Code, § 699. It has been transferred to the plaintiff, who, it is alleged, is now the owner thereof. There is, therefore, an existing contract relation and privity of estate between the parties to the action. The removal of this rock, of necessity, will materially injure the value of the contingent estate in the land, and, being removed for a forbidden use, it constitutes sufficient ground for the interposition of equity. It is our opinion that the restrictive clause may be considered as a limitation in favor of the grantors upon the use of the estate granted, and against the grantee, its lessees, and assigns, made for the purpose of feeding and protecting the grantors' contingent estate reserved by the next succeeding clause of the deed, and that it is also a personal covenant binding on the successors in interest of the grantee, by which they are prohibited from removing the rock for the use they are making of it; and hence that they may be restrained from so doing. We do not consider the question whether or not the covenant was one which runs with the land to be material to the decision of the case.

The objection that the complaint does not show that the plaintiff is an heir or assign of the original grantors is not well taken. It alleges that the plaintiff is, and has been ever since November 10, 1900, the owner in fee simple of all the lands described in the deed in question, "subject only to the terms and provisions" of the said deed. This means that he is the owner of all the estate and rights reserved therein to the grantors. He could only become such owner by descent or purchase from the grantors or their successors in interest; and hence he is either an heir or assign. Respondents also contend that, if the qualifying clauses of the deed are to be considered effectual to forbid the sale or other disposition of the rock taken from the seven acres, they constitute a contract in restraint of trade, and are void for that reason. This claim is based on the theory, which we hold untenable, that the deed does not forbid the quarrying or removal of rock, but only forbids certain uses of it after such removal. Where a grantor reserves a contingent estate in the land granted, and a condition or covenant is inserted in the deed forbidding the grantee from removing for certain uses a part of such realty, the removal of which would lessen the value of such contingent estate, such condition or covenant is a lawful contract for the protection of the grantor's interest, and cannot be deemed a contract in restraint of trade. By the terms of the covenant the parties are not to be restrained from engaging in the business of quarrying or selling rock in general, but only from taking for that purpose certain rock in which the plaintiff has an interest.

It is further contended that an action to recover damages for waste, or to restrain waste, cannot be maintained by one having only a contingent estate, to become vested only upon a forfeiture for a violation of a condition subsequent. So far as the claim for damages for waste already committed, based upon the ownership by the plaintiff of such contingent estate, is concerned, this contention must be sustained. The plaintiff's interest is not vested (Civ. Code, §§ 693, 695); and hence he has no present property in the rock removed, for the value of which damages can be computed, or to which he could have the right of present possession. Hunt v. Hall, 37 Me. 363; Peterson v. Clark, 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 205; Sager v. Galloway, 113 Pa. 500, 6 Atl. 209; Brasher v. Macey, 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 93; Cannon v. Barry, 59 Miss. 289; Gordon v. Lowther, 75 N. C. 193. But the rule is different with regard to the equitable remedy by injunction. The owner of a contingent interest may protect that interest against deterioration or destruction by enjoining a threatened waste. This is well settled by the authorities. Hayward v. Stillingfleet, 1 Atk. 422; Robinson v. Litton, 3 Atk. 209; Brashear v. Macey, supra; Cannon v. Barry, supra; Miles v. Miles, 32 N. H. 147, 64 Am. Dec. 362; Petersen v. Ferrell, 127 N. C. 169, 37 S. E. 189; Cowand v. Meyers, 99 N. C. 198, 6 S. E. 82; Gordon v. Lowther, supra; Braswell v. Morehead, 45 N. C. 26, 57 Am. Dec. 586; Lewisburg University v. Tucker, 31 W. Va. 621, 8 S. E. 410. It comes within the rule that an injunction will be granted to prevent an injury to real property which consists of the removal or destruction of the substance of the estate, or where the party injured cannot be adequately compensated in damages, or where the resulting damages cannot be measured by any certain pecuniary standard. Richards v. Dower, 64 Cal. 63, 28 Pac. 113; Silva v. Garcia, 65 Cal. 592, 4 Pac. 628; More v. Massini, 32 Cal. 595; 16 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 361.

With respect to the breach of the covenant not to take rock, except for the permitted purposes, the breach of such a contract, of itself, constitutes a cause of action for at least nominal damages. Whether, in view of the nature of the plaintiff's interest, anything more can be recovered, is a question not discussed by counsel, and, as it is not necessary to the decision of the case, we express no opinion in regard to it.

From the conclusions we have reached, it necessarily follows that the demurrer should have been overruled.

The judgment is reversed.

On Rehearing.

BEATTY, C. J. Upon a careful reconsideration of this case after rehearing ordered, we find no occasion to modify our original opinion. Nor do we deem it necessary to undertake a discussion of the proper construction of our Code provisions relating to covenants running with the land. Our conclusions are not rested upon those provisions, and they contain nothing inconsistent with what we have decided. Conceding that there is no covenant running with the land in a strict legal sense, we still hold that the plaintiff, as the owner of a contingent future estate in the land, is entitled in equity to enjoin a threatened destruction of that estate by the tenant in possession, whether such threatened destruction be total or partial. When land is conveyed subject to a condition, breach of which will work a forfeiture of the estate granted, the grantor retains an interest in the land, the value of which will be impaired by the pulling down of houses, the cutting of timber, or the quarrying and removal of stone or any other valuable material contained in the soil, and it would be strange if the law afforded him no means of protecting his interest. It may be that there is a presumption in such case that there will be no breach of the condition subsequent and that there is a probability that the estate will never be forfeited, but, in dealing with the rights of the grantor, a court is bound to assume, as the parties by their deed have assumed, that there may be a breach of the condition, and to hold that the grantee has no right, in the meantime, to make way with the very substance of the estate. If, in such case, the deed contained no express provision restraining the removal of the soil, or cutting of timber or other destructive use of the land, we are clearly of the opinion that a court of equity would enjoin a threatened injury of the magnitude alleged in this case. But here the deed expressly limits the purposes for which stone may be taken, and this imposes a practical limit to the quantity that will be taken, and the right of the grantor, or his successor, to enjoin the transgression of that limit is even clearer than the right to an injunction would have been in the absence of such express provision. Of course, there are exceptional cases to which the doctrine here asserted does not apply. One of them is defined in section 819 of the Civil Code—the lease of a going mine or quarry. But such exceptions only fortify the general doctrine.

As to the objection so strongly urged that the stipulation in question is not binding upon the successors of the Pacific Improvement Company, and does not inure to the successor of the grantors, our opinion remains unchanged, and ought not to be misunderstood. The assigns of the grantee are expressly named in the deed, and whatever right the grantors had to protect their interest in the land passed by their conveyance of the land to their grantee. Their estate was alienable, and the right to sell an estate includes the right to transfer the means of protecting it.

Our decision rests, of course, upon the case as presented in the record before us. If there are other facts or circumstances, proof of which would have a legitimate bearing upon the true construction of the deed to the Pacific Improvement Company, nothing we have said will prevent the defendant from alleging and proving such facts.

The judgment of the superior court is reversed.

SLOSS, J. I concur in the judgment. What the plaintiff's rights would have been if the deed had contained no provision limiting the grantee's right to take rock is a question not involved in this case, and I express no opinion upon it. It is enough to say that the deed under which the defendants hold did restrict the right of the grantee and its successors in interest to do certain acts destructive of the substance of the estate, and that this estate might, on breach of a condition subsequent, revert to the grantor. Such restrictions may lawfully be annexed to the conveyance of an interest less than an unqualified fee, and will be enforced at the suit of the holder of the future estate. Blake v. Peters, 1 DeG. J. & S. 345.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; LORIGAN, J.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent, and think that the judgment should be affirmed.

BIESCAR v. PRATT. (Civ. 275.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District. California. Sept. 18, 1906.)

1. Sales — Remedies of Seller — Resale — Collection of Draft Deposited.

Under Civ. Code, § 3311, fixing the rights of the seller on breach of contract by the buyer, and section 1670, providing that a provision in a contract for a stipulated amount as damages is void except where it would be difficult to fix the actual damage, where a seller, on refusal of the buyer to complete the contract, sells the goods elsewhere at an advanced price, he is not entitled to collect a draft deposited as part of the price.

2. Appeal — Harmless Error — Amount of Recovery.

Any error in not requiring a seller to return to a buyer a cash deposit on the price is not prejudicial to the seller.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. P. James, Judge.

Action by Henry Biescar against T. H. Pratt. From a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Milton K. Young, for appellant. Frank James, for respondent.

SMITH, J. Appeal from a judgment for the defendant and an order denying the plaintiff's motion for a new trial. This is a suit by the indorsee against the indorser of a draft on a New York bank, the payment of which was refused by the bank under the defendant's instructions.

The case, as shown by the answer and findings, is: The plaintiff, by written contract of date December 26, 1903, agreed with the defendant and one Bassett to sell them "the business, consisting of stock, hardware, and fixtures now in building," described in the agreement, at invoice prices, etc., and the draft sued upon constituted a part of "the deposit of $500" made by the vendees to the vendor, and which, it is provided, should "be forfeited by them to said first party" in the event of failure of the second parties to pay the balance of the purchase price. The defendant and his co-vendee, on account of certain alleged misrepresentations of the plaintiff as to the aggregate value of the property and certain other matters alleged in the answer, refused to proceed with the contract, and, on the 11th day of January, 1904, attempted to rescind the contract, notifying the plaintiff thereof and demanding the repayment of the cash deposit and the surrender of the draft. The plaintiff refused to comply with this demand, but, it is alleged and found, continued to carry on the business, "and has sold much of the said stock of goods therein * * * and has received the price therefor and made a profit thereon;" and finally, it is found, shortly after the commencement of this suit, sold the whole of the stock of goods and fixtures "for a price in excess of the invoice price, or amount agreed to be paid therefor" by defendant and his partner. This finding is attacked by appellant as not supported by the evidence, but we think without grounds. It is further found "that plaintiff has not been damaged or injured by any act of the defendant, or at all." The court below was of the opinion (1) that the plaintiff, by continuing to carry on the business and to sell the stock, and by finally selling the stock previously unsold for a larger price than the sum agreed upon, acquiesced in the rescission of the contract and thus became liable to return the deposit; and (2) that the provision as to forfeiture of the deposit was "void as being an attempt to liquidate damages in an unauthorized case."

In this opinion of the court we concur. The remedies of the vendor in a case of this kind are clearly defined. Civ. Code, § 3311; Gay v. Dare, 103 Cal. 458, 37 Pac. 466; 2 Benjamin on Sales, § 1117, and note. They do not include the right to sell the goods at an advanced price and to retain the purchase money paid on the contract, either as liquidated damages (Civ. Code, § 1670), or on any other ground. The appellant claims the contrary, and cites in support of his contention the decision in Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17. But the contract there involved was for the sale of real estate, and contained a provision that time should be of the essence of the contract. To such cases it was held on the authorities cited that a peculiar rule applied. It has no application to such an agreement as here involved to sell personal property.

It is also objected that, upon the principle of the decision of the court below, defendant was entitled to a return of the cash deposit. This, we think, was the case, but the error is one that the plaintiff cannot complain of.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, P. J.; ALLEN, J.

MEEKER v. SHUSTER et al. (Civ. 246.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District. California. Sept. 20, 1906.)

1. JUDGMENT—RES JUDICATA.

A judgment in ejectment, declaring the deed under which plaintiff claimed to be a mere mortgage from defendants, is res judicata in an action between the same parties to have the deed declared a mortgage, and to forcelose it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, §§ 1244, 1245.]

2. MORTGAGES — DEED AS MORTGAGE — EVIDENCE.

Evidence, in an action to have a deed declared a mortgage and to foreclose it, held sufficient to sustain a finding that it was a mortgage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmett Seawell, Judge.

Action by M. C. Meeker against Sarah E. Shuster and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See 47 Pac. 580.

J. A. and E. C. Barham and T. J. Butts, for appellants. J. M. Thompson, for respondent.

BUCKLES, J. This is an action to have a certain deed declared to be a mortgage, and to foreclose the same. The defendants were in possession of the land mentioned in said deed while the legal title thereto was in one Aaron Barnes. The complaint alleges that on December 3, 1883, the said Barnes entered into a contract and bond with the Shusters whereby he obligated himself to convey by bargain and sale deed said land to the Shusters on or before December 3, 1893, upon the Shusters paying to him the sum of $11,000 in sums not less than $100 and interest at the rate of 9 per cent. per annum. This contract and bond was duly recorded on the same day it was made. On October 5, 1892, the Shusters still owed $8,440 to said Barnes. To enable them to pay this debt, the plaintiff loaned them $8,440. The money was paid over to Barnes, the Shusters released and satisfied the contract and bond on the records and requested the said Barnes to and he did make, execute, and deliver to the said plaintiff a deed to said land as security for the payment to him by said Shusters the said sum of $8,440, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, and the plaintiff gave the Shusters his bond for a deed for said land in which he agreed to convey said land to the Shusters on or before 10 years from October 5, 1892, upon the payment to him of the $8,440, with interest as aforesaid, by the said Shusters. That no part of the principal or interest of said debt was ever paid, and that at the time the suit was commenced there was due and unpaid the sum of $18,513.26. That in a suit in ejectment in which the plaintiff and the defendants were the same as in this action, tried in the superior court of Sonoma county, a judgment was duly rendered and entered on December 14, 1894, by which it was adjudged that the payment of the said sum of $8,440 by plaintiff to the Shusters and by them to said Barnes was a loan by plaintiff to said defendants, and that the deed executed and delivered by Barnes to plaintiff was a mortgage to secure the payment of said sum. Judgment was for defendants. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court and the judgment affirmed.

The answer contains a specific denial and a setting forth the transaction of plaintiff paying over the $8,440 and the circumstances of Barnes making the said deed and the plaintiff making the said contract and bond to the Shusters, claiming in effect that such transaction did not constitute a mortgage, but a sale and conveyance of title of said land to the plaintiff, and also pleads bar under the statute of limitations. The only oral testimony as to the transaction between plaintiff and the Shusters was that given by the plaintiff. A short time before the deed was made one of the Shusters asked plaintiff to buy the land, and plaintiff replied: "I do not need the land. I really have more land now than I know what to do with," but then announced his willingness to furnish the money to pay the debt due to Barnes. Again when plaintiff and the Shusters were all together at the time the arrangements were agreed upon which were afterward carried out he says: "I told them I had the money now to let them have * * * and I asked them how they wanted to do the transaction and they said they would take a deed from Barnes * * * and give me a mortgage. I then objected to taking a mortgage from them. Then they didn't really know how to do it, and I said it's like this, I will let you have the money to pay Barnes off, and you will discharge the record, and then I will give you a bond to purchase the property, and will give you 10 years' time, and will pay all taxes on the property during this 10 years' time, and you pay me interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum." The testimony shows that neither Meeker nor Barnes had ever been in possession of the said land. There is no evidence whatever to indicate the Shusters were intending to sell the land to Meeker. The court below found that the Shusters solicited from Meeker a loan of $8,440 for the sole purpose of paying said Barnes the sum due him, to wit, $8,440, and then agreed with Meeker to repay him the said sum in 10 years; and that no agreement was ever made by plaintiff with said Barnes for the purchase of said land. The evidence abundantly supports these findings. Many errors are alleged in the court's rulings on the admission of evidence, but as all the testimony offered to which there was objection and exception seems to have been properly admitted we see no necessity of taking up the time and space to state them here. Independent of the findings and judgment of the case, Meeker v. Shuster (Cal.) 47 Pac. 580, the ejectment suit heretofore referred to, we think the oral testimony in this case with the bond and deed, show the transactions to have been one of money loaning by Meeker to the Shusters, and a giving of the deed of Barnes to Meeker and the bond of Meeker to the Shusters, simply the means of securing the repayment of said loan and that therefore said deed must be treated as a mortgage. Besides this the suit reported in 47 Pac. 580, supra, was a suit between the same parties in relation to the same property, and involved a construction of the same deed, and we think the judgment in that case is conclusive that the said deed was intended as a mortgage. The judgment roll in the case 47 Pac. 580, supra, was placed in evidence over the objection of the defendants, and this is alleged as error. But the very question in issue was made a question there, and the conclusion reached in that case was the same sought to be reached in this case. The parties were the same there as they are here, and the testimony here substantially the same as in the ejectment suit. McDonald v. McCoy, 121 Cal. 57, 53 Pac. 421; Wallace v. Sisson, 114 Cal. 42, 45 Pac. 1000. If the deed in that case, the case of ejectment, and the same deed that is being construed here, conveyed to the plaintiff in that case the title to the land, then the defendants would have been ejected, and that would have ended the contention as to the right to the land. But the court said in effect that it was a mortgage and the equity of redemption of the Shusters could not be foreclosed in an ejectment suit, besides the time for bringing an action to foreclose had not then accrued. In the ejectment suit the court found the Shusters to be the owners in fee of the land, and such a finding in this case could not contradict the proceedings in that case. If the deed was a mortgage in that case it was a solemn finding of a competent court when the same parties were before it, and when exactly the same subject-matter, the same deeds, the same contracts, and the same bonds were being considered and exactly the same question there was litigated as is the paramount question here:

Was this deed intended as a mortgage? We think that the defendants in this case are absolutely estopped by reason of the judgment in that case from asserting in this that the said instrument was a deed conveying all their interest in said land, and therefore and further because that judgment was made an issue in this case the judgment roll was properly admitted.

Irrespective of the former judgment the testimony of the plaintiff in this case shows that he never intended to purchase said land and the deed and bond simply constituted his security for the money he had loaned the Shusters. The lower court found the deed of Barnes to plaintiff was intended by defendants to secure to plaintiff the payment of said sum of $8,440, and that plaintiff did not and never did intend to purchase said land and that the statute of limitations has not run against the cause of action set forth in plaintiff's complaint, and that said action is not barred. These and all the findings are warranted by the evidence in the case. As conclusions of law the court found that said deed is a mortgage and a lien upon the lands described therein and in plaintiff's complaint. The judgment was that the deed was a mortgage, and to foreclose the same. The findings support the judgment.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

MARTIN v. MOLERA. (Civ. 259.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District. California. Sept. 20, 1906.)

EJECTMENT — PLEADING — CROSS-COMPLAINT —RIGHT TO FILE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 442, providing that whenever defendant seeks affirmative relief against any party, affecting the property to which the action relates, he may, in addition to his answer, file a cross-complaint, defendant in ejectment was entitled to file a cross-complaint pleading a judgment rendered in a prior action between plaintiff and defendant's predecessor in interest, involving the title and possession of the land in controversy, and alleging that the action was contrary to equity and intended to annoy defendant by compelling him to relitigate the questions determined by such judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; M. T. Dooling, Judge.

Action of ejectment by James Martin against E. J. Molera. From a judgment overruling plaintiff's demurrer to defendant's cross-complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. M. Delmas and J. J. Wyatt, for appellant. Chas. W. Slack, for respondent.

McLAUGHLIN, J. It is alleged in the complaint herein that on a specified date the plaintiff was the owner, seized in fee and in the possession of a designated tract of land, and, at the time the action was commenced, he was the owner and entitled to the possession of said land. This is followed by an averment that on the date mentioned the defendant entered upon and ousted and ejected plaintiff to his damage in the sum of $1,000. The prayer demands restitution of the premises with damages in the sum stated. The defendant filed an answer denying each of the allegations of the complaint and pleading a judgment rendered in an action between plaintiff and defendant's predecessor in interest, involving the title and possession of the land here in controversy, which judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court. See De Molera v. Martin, 120 Cal. 544, 52 Pac. 825. In connection with this special defense it was alleged that in the complaint in the former action one of the calls in the description of the land read, "south 82 degrees west, 3.35 chains to station," and by reason of a clerical misprision and mistake this call read, "south 82 degrees west 5.35 chains to a station," as inserted in the judgment pleaded. Immediately following this, in a portion of the pleading designated a cross-complaint, the defendant pleaded the facts touching the former action between plaintiff and defendant's grantor, and inserted a copy of the judgment in said former action. The above-mentioned mistake in one of the courses and distances as inserted in the judgment was then set forth, and this was followed by three paragraphs specifically fixing the starting point in the description of the tract of land involved in the former judgment, and more particularly describing one of the boundaries of the tract with reference to the old channel of the Salinas river and the cabin of Buckskin Joe, which was destroyed by fire after the commencement of said action. The cross-complaint further contained specific allegations to the effect that the lands described in the complaint herein are a part of the lands involved in the former action and that the present action is contrary to equity and good conscience, and is intended to harass, vex, and annoy defendant by compelling him to relitigate the same questions which were tried and determined in the action of De Molera v. Martin, and that cross-complainant has no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law. The plaintiff demurred to the cross-complaint on the ground that it did not state facts constituting a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled and plaintiff answered, but later withdrew his answer and elected to stand on the demurrer to the cross-complaint. His default was thereupon entered and the court proceeded to hear evidence touching the averments of the cross-complaint, all of which were found to be true as pleaded. Judgment was thereupon entered in favor of defendant, and from such judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

Appellant contends that the court erred in overruling his demurrer to the cross-complaint, and this contention presents the only point urged in the brief filed in his behalf. It is urged that in cases like the one at bar a cross-complaint is always unnecessary and improper, and Doyle v. Franklin, 40 Cal. 106, is cited as supporting this view. Waiving the fact that the court expressly declined to pass on this particular point in that case, an examination and analysis of this and cases of like tenor, shows that our highest court has simply decided that, where the relief demanded in the cross-complaint can be had upon the denials and averments of the answer, a cross-complaint is unnecessary. Nelson v. O'Brien, 139 Cal. 629, 73 Pac. 469; Miller v. Luco, 80 Cal. 261, 22 Pac. 195; Wilson v. Madison, 55 Cal. 8. This, however, is far from saying that a cross-complaint may not, under some circumstances, be both proper and necessary. The rule in ejectment is identical with the rule in actions to quiet title, and the reason underlying one supports the other; hence authorities applying to the latter class of actions apply with equal force to actions in ejectment. In Winter v. McMillan, 87 Cal. 264, 25 Pac. 407, 22 Am. St. Rep. 243, the Supreme Court, in passing upon the question before us here, said: "Appellants contend that the demurrer to the cross-complaint ought to have been sustained; that a cross-complaint is improper in actions of this kind. In support of this contention, they cite Wilson v. Madison, 55 Cal. 8. All that case decides is that, where the relief demanded by defendant can be had upon the denials and averments of his answer, a cross-complaint is unnecessary. But there may be cases in which full relief cannot be given the defendant upon answer, and, as in ejectment, a cross-complaint in such cases is recognized as a proper pleading so that the whole controversy may be settled in one action." This doctrine has received express or implied sanction in a number of cases where the point was involved. Angus v. Craven, 132 Cal. 698, 64 Pac. 1091; Islais & S. W. Co. v. Allen, 132 Cal. 438, 64 Pac. 713; Am. & Eng. Ency. Pl. & Pr., vol. 17, pp. 354, 356.

Under section 442, Code Civ. Proc., whenever the defendant seeks affirmative relief affecting the property to which the action relates, he may, in addition to his answer, file a cross-complaint. That the affirmative relief demanded by the defendant related to the property to which this action relates cannot be gainsaid. That such relief involved more than title and right of possession seems equally clear. The plaintiff was bound by the former decree if the property in controversy here formed part of the land embraced in the prior litigation. The defendant was entitled to relief against harassing. annoying, and vexatious attempts to relitigate questions already adjudicated and settled, and, if so, we can conceive of no better time or place to seek such relief than in an action practically identical with the case already determined against the plaintiff's assertion of right. It is not necessary to consider the propriety of thus litigating some questions arising out of facts stated in the amended cross-complaint. The single question presented for determination here is whether the cross-complaint states facts sufficient to entitle the defendant to any affirmative relief. Having concluded that it does, the judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

SUMNER v. NEVIN. (Civ. 258.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 16, 1906.)

1. Assignments — Contract for Personal Services.

Where a servant of a real estate broker made a contract with another person, whereby the servant, on his own behalf, became the agent for the sale of such person's land, the contract was founded on personal qualities; and hence, in a suit by the master, an assignment of the contract could not be directed, or the same decreed to be held in trust.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 4, Assignments, § 30.]

2. Master and Servant — Accounting by Servant.

Whatever the servant received on account of his services in selling the land during the term of his contract with the master belonged to the latter.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 68, 70.]

3. Same.

Civ. Code, § 1986, makes it the duty of an employé on demand, to render to his employer just accounts of all his transactions in the course of his business as often as may be reasonable. A real estate broker made a demand upon his servant for an accounting, which was refused, and subsequently the contract of employment was terminated. During the employment the servant had received, on his own behalf, commissions for effecting a sale of real estate. Held, in an action by the broker against the servant, that the broker was entitled to an accounting as to the amount of commissions received.

4. Same—Nature of Relation.

Civ. Code, § 2295, defines an agent as one who represents another in dealings with third persons. Section 2009 defines a servant as one employed to render personal services to his employer and who remains entirely under the control and direction of the latter. Held that, where defendant agreed to devote his entire time and attention to the interests and business of plaintiff, a real estate broker, defendant's compensation to be a specified percentage of commissions, the relation between the partes was that of master and servant and not that of principal and agent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Action by C. A. Sumner against W. G. Nevin. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and remanded for further proceedings.

Works, Lee & Works, for appellant. T. J. Norton and E. W. Camp, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Judgment for defendant entered upon an order sustaining a demurrer, without leave to amend, from which plaintiff appeals.

It appears from the amended complaint that plaintiff, in November, 1901, held an exclusive agency for the sale of certain real property in the city of Los Angeles; that, while such agency was in force, plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract, by the terms of which plaintiff employed defendant in said business of real estate and in such other capacity as he might elect, and the second party agreed to devote his entire time and attention to the interests and business of said first party upon such business as said first party may direct, receiving as compensation therefor 10 per cent. commission on all policies of insurance placed by him with said first party, and one-half of the net commissions received on all loans, rentals, real estate deals, and other transactions brought to plaintiff by defendant. It was agreed that such contract of employment might be terminated by either party upon 15 days' notice in writing, and that all deals pending at the time of the termination of said contract were to be closed and the proceeds divided under the contract. After the execution of this contract of employment, the agency of the plaintiff in relation to said tract first mentioned terminated, and plaintiff directed defendant to enter into negotiations with the owners for an extension of such exclusive agency in plaintiff's behalf. It is averred that defendant, instead of procuring an extension in behalf of plaintiff, took from the owners in his own name a contract of agency, by the terms of which defendant personally obtained the exclusive agency at a commission less than that originally agreed to be paid to plaintiff; that on August 10, 1902, defendant notified plaintiff of the termination of his contract of employment, and at the same time notified him that he had taken the exclusive agency of the tract in his own name, and thereafter proceeded to the sale of lots in said tract, some of which were by him sold after July, 1902, and before September 1st, the amount of which sales aggregated $3,300, and, under the contract of defendant with the owners of the tract, would have entitled him, at a commission of 7½ per cent., to the sum of $247.50, gross commission. There is no specific statement as to any other lots sold prior to the termination of employment. The plaintiff demanded judgment that the contract of agency between the owners of the tract and defendant be decreed the property of the plaintiff, and that he have an accounting of the amount of commissions received by defendant, and a judgment for one-half the net amount thereof. The theory upon which the plaintiff proceeds is that he was entitled to the services of the defendant until 15 days after notice of the termination of the employment, to wit, until August 26, 1902; and that the contract entered into by defendant before such date last mentioned, while in the name of Nevin, was the property of plaintiff.

While plaintiff in his complaint speaks of the various dates of the termination of the contract and of the service of notice as being in the year 1904, the written notice itself is set out in the complaint, which bears the date of 1902, and, taking the whole complaint together, it is clearly indicated that a typographical error has occurred, and that the transaction spoken of was intended to have been alleged in the year 1902. The contract of employment between plaintiff and defendant was a personal one, and by its terms the relation of master and servant arose, under the definition of section 2009, Civil Code, rather than that of principal and agent, as defined by section 2295, Civil Code. While, under the admitted allegations of the complaint, defendant violated his duty towards his employer in accepting other employment inconsistent with the duties which he owed to plaintiff, yet the personal character of the contract which he entered into with the owners of the tract would prevent plaintiff from having any assignment thereof or benefit therefrom other than such benefit as inured to him while defendant was actually in his employ. This contract entered into between Nevin and the tract owners being special and founded upon personal qualities, was unassignable without the consent of all parties thereto. Taylor v. Black Diamond Coal Co., 86 Cal. 590, 25 Pac. 51. The same, therefore, not being assignable in its character, a court could not direct the assignment or decree the same to be held in trust. Were it to do so, it would be to say that a court might decree relief to which the party was not entitled in virtue of the contract and under the law; that equity instead of following the law should disregard the same. The obligation, however, of defendant under his contract with plaintiff was to devote his entire time and attention to the interests and business of plaintiff while this employment existed. It follows, therefore, that whatever defendant received during the life of this contract with plaintiff on account of his services in similar lines of employment, whether under this contract with the tract owners or otherwise, belonged to his employer. This would be true, also, of any property acquired, which, in virtue of his employment, ought to have been taken for his employer, yet as to the latter, it can only apply to such property received by the employé assignable or transferable in its character.

There is no question of damages involved in the action, in that it is nowhere averred in the complaint that defendant could have procured a contract in behalf of plaintiff similar to the one taken in his own name, nor any damages on account of the nonperformance of the duty required by plaintiff of defendant. It is admitted, however, in the complaint that, while the employment between plaintiff and defendant was in force, defendant received, as agent of these tract owners, certain commissions, a part of which are specifically set forth as aggregating the sum of $247.50, with an additional averment that during that time he sold other lots and blocks, but plaintiff is unable to state the number of any of such lots or blocks, or of any of them, or the price for which the same or any thereof, were sold, or the dates of the sales. Section 1986, Civil Code, makes it the duty of an employé, on demand, to render to his employer just accounts of all his transactions in the course of his business, and as often as may be reasonable, without demand, give prompt notice to his employer of everything he receives for his account. There is an admitted allegation that a demand has been made upon defendant for such accounting, which has been refused. We think the complaint states facts sufficient to entitle plaintiff to an accounting of the amount of commissions actually received during the term of the employment, with a statement of the outlay incident thereto, that the net amount thereof might be determined, and one-half of such amount awarded to plaintiff. That the right to an accounting is to be determined from the situation of the parties with reference to the accounts, and not because of any particular relation which one bears to the other, appears to be the doctrine of Coward v. Clanton, 122 Cal. 451, 55 Pac. 147. The subject of accounting is one cognizable in equity, over which the superior court has jurisdiction. We are of opinion, therefore, that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint.

The judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

4 Cal. App. 333

ROGERS et al. v. OVERACKER. (Civ. 263.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 27, 1906.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—DIVERSION OF WATER—IRRIGATION—PRIOR USE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence that defendant diverted water from a stream into a ditch which he testified had a 20 year old growth of brush in it was not evidence that defendant's predecessors in interest had ever diverted the waters of the stream for irrigation purposes.

2. SAME—RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS—RIGHT TO USE.

A lower riparian proprietor cannot acquire a right to water flowing in a stream either by prior appropriation, prescription, or adverse user as against an upper riparian proprietor whose rights antedated such appropriation and user.

3. SAME — UPPER RIPARIAN PROPRIETOR — NONUSER.

Mere nonuser of waters flowing in a stream by an upper riparian proprietor and the fact that he permitted the waters to pass down to the lands of the lower owner cannot make the latter's use of the water adverse or strengthen the lower proprietor's claim of appropriation or prescription.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, § 150.]

4. SAME—TRIAL—FINDING—FAILURE TO FIND.

Where, in a suit to restrain an upper riparian proprietor from diverting substantially all the water of the stream for irrigation, the complaint alleged no priority of user of the waters for domestic purposes by plaintiff over the rights of the defendant, it was not necessary for the court to make a finding on the allegation in the answer that it was necessary for defendant to use the waters for irrigation and if it was not used to a reasonable extent defendant would sustain irreparable injury.

5. SAME—DIVERSION—IRRIGATION—RIGHTS OF RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS.

Where upper and lower riparian proprietors had an equal right to take water from a creek and it was admitted that at times there was an abundance of water to supply the wants of both and at other times only enough for the use of the lower proprietor, the latter was entitled to restrain the upper proprietor from diverting all the waters of the creek for the irrigation of his riparian land.

6. SAME—JUDGMENT—UNCERTAINTY.

In a suit by lower riparian proprietors to restrain the upper proprietor from diverting all the waters of a creek, a judgment enjoining defendant from diverting such waters for the purpose of irrigation at such times or in such quantity or amount or in such a manner as will prevent the waters of the creek from flowing to and upon plaintiffs' riparian land in a sufficient quantity to supply plaintiffs with fresh water for their natural wants and their domestic purposes, etc., was fatally defective for uncertainty as to the amount of water defendant was required to permit to flow down the creek for plaintiffs' benefit.

7. SAME — JUDGMENT — DETERMINATION OF RIGHTS—ESTOPPEL.

Such judgment did not constitute a complete determination of the rights of either party and could not, therefore, be pleaded as an estoppel.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; H. C. Gesford, Judge.

Suit by T. G. Rogers and others against H. Overacker, Jr. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Mullaney, Grant & Cushing and F. E. Johnston, for appellant. W. F. Henning, for respondents.

BUCKLES, J. This is a suit in equity to enjoin the defendant from diverting certain waters from Conn creek in Napa county. After a trial had, the court made findings and entered judgment therein in favor of the plaintiffs. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The complaint alleges that Conn creek has its source in Howell Mountain in said Napa county, and runs thence in a natural defined channel in a southerly direction until it enters Napa creek near the town of Yountville and flows along over the lands of both plaintiffs and defendant a distance of about four miles, and that the lands of defendant are nearer the source of said Conn creek and higher up on the said creek than any of the lands of plaintiff; that the lands of plaintiffs and defendant have always been used by themselves and their predecessors in interest for stock raising, grazing, and farming, and the waters of said creek have always been used by them for domestic use other than irrigation, until about two years ago, and then only the defendant has at times diverted and claims the right to divert all of the water of said creek so as to flow the same entirely upon his own lands solely for the purpose of irrigation, which diversion is by means of dams erected in said creek and flumes and ditches leading the water out and upon his said land, and has thus deprived the plaintiffs of the use of said water and that there is now no water running in the channel of said creek on or by their lands; that they need said water for their stock and pasturage; that they will suffer irreparable loss unless defendant be enjoined from using said water for irrigation; that defendant has no right, by purchase, prescription, or otherwise, to said water other than as a riparian owner, and no right to deprive plaintiffs of the natural flow of the water of said creek in the natural channel thereof.

The answer alleges that defendants, grantors, and predecessors in interest have from time to time for many years diverted the waters of said creek for purposes of irrigation at a greater or less extent than the same have been used by him, and that he used the ditches made and used by his grantors. Denies that defendant at any time diverted or claimed the right to divert all the waters of said creek, and has never at any time diverted more than one-half of said waters, and that for irrigation, and that he never deprived the plaintiffs of the use of said waters. That when diverted he uses said waters for irrigation and for domestic purposes. Denies that plaintiffs are dependent upon the waters flowing in the channel of said creek for watering their stock and other domestic uses. Denies that he is now diverting, or ever has diverted, the whole of said water, and alleges that he does and has diverted only a reasonable portion thereof, and alleges that there is water enough flowing in the channel of said creek to supply all the riparian owners along the said creek with ample water for domestic use and their stock and to irrigate more lands than have ever been irrigated by the defendant. Alleges that, by reason of the failure of the complaint to show that the waters claimed by plaintiffs are to be used on the lands riparian to said creek and by reason of the failure of plaintiffs to allege the amount of stock which they claim the right to water from said creek, the defendant is unable to determine the actual amount of water claimed by them. Alleges that the tract of land planted to alfalfa which he diverts the water to irrigate is land belonging to defendant and riparian to said creek and naturally drained into said creek and that it is necessary to use a reasonable amount of said water to keep the alfalfa growing on his said land so irrigated. There is no averment in either complaint or answer of the amount of water required by either plaintiffs or defendant, nor of the approximate amount of water flowing in said creek. It does appear, however, that from about July 15, 1902, and 1903, to the time when the cool weather comes the water has ceased to flow upon the surface of the channel of said creek at some places below the lands of defendant.

The court finds, as matter of fact, that all the lands described are riparian to said creek; that all these lands have always been used for stock raising, grazing, and farming and the waters of said Conn creek have been used by plaintiffs for domestic purposes and watering stock to a greater or less extent, and the waters of said creek have never been used to any appreciable extent for irrigation until within the years 1902 and 1903; that plaintiffs are dependent upon the water of said creek during the dry season of the year for watering their live stock; that in July, 1902, defendant diverted a considerable portion of the water of said creek out of the channel to and upon his lands through a flume six by eight inches, for purposes of irrigation; did this again in 1903; that for 20 or 30 years before the diversion of said water by defendant the waters of said creek had flowed upon the said lands of plaintiffs so that, during the dry season of the year, there was abundance of fresh water in said creek for their domestic purposes and watering their stock; and that, by reason of diverting said waters by defendant for irrigation purposes in the dry season of 1902–03, the plaintiffs were deprived of necessary water for domestic use and watering their stock. As conclusions of law the court found as follows to wit: "The right of plaintiffs to a sufficient flow of water of Conn creek, in the county of Napa, state of California in the natural channel thereof to and upon the riparian lands of plaintiffs * * * all seasons of the year sufficient to supply plaintiffs with fresh water for their natural wants and usual domestic purposes, including the watering of live stock kept or maintained by plaintiffs upon their said riparian lands, are primary and paramount rights to the right of defendant to divert or use any of the waters of said Conn creek for the purposes of irrigation. Plaintiffs are entitled to judgment enjoining defendant from so diverting such quantity of the waters of said Conn creek for the purposes of irrigation as will prevent said creek from flowing to and upon the riparian lands of plaintiffs in quantities sufficient to supply plaintiffs with fresh water for their natural wants and usual domestic purposes, including the watering of live stock kept or maintained by them on their said riparian lands." The court does not find the amount of water each riparian owner is entitled to, but finds the defendant's diversion and use of said waters for irrigation purposes (one-half or one-third) as shown by defendant's answer and by the evidence is not reasonable, and, if continued, would cause plaintiffs irreparable injury. The judgment enjoins defendant from diverting the waters of Conn creek from the natural channel thereof upon his lands for the purposes of irrigation at such times, or in such quantities or amounts, or in such manner, as will prevent such waters from flowing to and upon the riparian lands of plaintiffs in a sufficient quantity to supply plaintiffs with fresh water for their natural wants and usual domestic purposes, including the watering of live stock kept or maintained by the plaintiffs on their said riparian lands.

All the testimony for the plaintiffs showed that the water ran in the channel of Conn creek in abundance for their use for domestic purposes and for watering their stock for all the years up to 1902 and that, during 1902 and 1903, and until the suit was commenced in September, 1903, the water ceased to run by their lands about July and August of those years, and was not sufficient for all their needs. There was no substantial conflict in the evidence for the plaintiffs. The testimony for the defendant showed that defendant put in his first dam at his place in July, 1902, and during 1902 he took out about one-third of the volume of the water flowing in the said creek. When cutting the alfalfa, the water in the flume was allowed to run on to waste land. Irrigated about 20 acres of alfalfa. His flume connected with an old ditch which he cleared out and which he testified looked like it had 20 years' growth of brush, etc. Never used the water much on other places than alfalfa, but let it run on one place below his cellar and on another place for pasture. He testified: "During July and August the amount flowing in Conn creek gradually lessens, but there is a large flow all summer and as soon as the days begin to get cooler and the nights get longer the water in the creek begins to rise." This testimony applies simply to conditions existing on defendant's land. "All the water that passes my dam and all the water that flows or seeps back from the alfalfa patch flows down Conn creek into the lands of plaintiffs. * * * This irrigated tract * * * is on the northeast side of Conn creek and * * * is riparian to the creek. * * * Without irrigation, it would be impossible to keep the alfalfa alive."

Appellant claims error because the court did not find on certain issues raised by his answer. There is no specific finding as to this allegation in the answer, to wit: "That it is necessary for defendant to use said waters on said land in order to keep the alfalfa growing on said irrigated tract alive, and, if said water is not used to a reasonable extent upon said lands, great and irreparable injury will result to this defendant thereby." If it was not necessary to irrigate the land then clearly defendant had no right to divert the water of the creek onto it. And, if the court's view that the lower riparian owners had the paramount right to all the water flowing in said creek, then this allegation of the answer would become an immaterial allegation and no finding would be necessary thereon. Louvall v. Gridley, 70 Cal. 511, 11 Pac. 777. There was no testimony of a prior use by defendant or his predecessors of the waters of said creek for purposes of irrigation except what might be inferred from what defendant said about running the water he diverted into a ditch which had a 20 year old growth of brush in it, and we think it can be hardly be said that this bit of testimony furnished any evidence that defendant's predecessors in interest had ever diverted these waters for purposes of irrigation. The court found as follows: "Before the diversion of water of said creek by defendant for a period of 20 or 30 years the water of said creek had always flowed to and upon the lands of all these plaintiffs, so that during the dry season every year there was maintained on their said premises abundant fresh water for domestic purposes, including the watering of their stock." Then in its conclusions of law finds: "The rights of plaintiffs to a sufficient flow of water of Conn creek * * * in the natural channel thereof to and upon the riparian lands of plaintiffs * * * in a sufficient quantity at all seasons of the year sufficient to supply plaintiffs with fresh water for their natural wants and usual domestic purposes, including the watering of livestock kept or maintained by plaintiffs upon their said riparian lands are primary and paramount rights to the right of defendant to divert or use any of the waters of said Conn creek for the purposes of irrigation." If the law is as the court thus finds, then no matter how it may have found as to said allegation the judgment must have been for plaintiffs. But we do not so understand the law. The rule seems to be as laid down in Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 135, 58 Pac. 442, 77 Am. St. Rep. 158, and Hargrave v. Cook, 108 Cal. 72, 41 Pac. 30, 30 L. R. A. 390. In the first case it was said, approving the latter case, that a lower riparian proprietor cannot acquire a right, either by prior appropriation or by prescription or adverse user, as against an upper riparian proprietor whose rights antedate the appropriation and user, and the mere nonuser of the water by the upper proprietor and his permitting the water to pass down to the lands of the lower owner cannot make the user of the lower owner adverse or strengthen his claim of appropriation or prescription. The complaint alleges no priority of user of said waters for domestic purposes, over the defendant. We do not think the court erred in failing to make a finding of the said allegations. The plaintiffs were entitled to a judgment restraining the defendant from diverting all the water from said creek for irrigating his said land riparian to said creek.

The plaintiffs having an equal right to take the water, and it being admitted that at times there is abundance of water flowing in the creek to supply their wants and the defendant for irrigating his alfalfa, and plaintiffs claiming that at times only enough for the use of plantiffs, it becomes necessary to know just how much water must flow down said creek to their lands, for they are entitled to just so much and the defendant to so much. A judgment which enjoins the defendant from diverting such waters "for the purpose of irrigation at such times or in such quantity or amount, or in such manner as will prevent the waters of said Conn creek from flowing to and upon the riparian lands of plaintiffs described in the amended complaint in this action in a sufficient quantity to supply plaintiffs with fresh water for their natural wants and usual domestic purposes, including the watering of live stock kept or maintained by plaintiffs upon their said respective lands," is not a judgment that informs either plaintiffs or defendants just what to do. It must be observed that there is no adjudication whatever as to the amount of water the plaintiffs will need, no mention of the number of stock to be watered, and no means is provided in the judgment by which the defendant can determine just how much water he must let flow down the creek in order that plaintiffs may have their proper and necessary amount of water. The judgment is fatally uncertain, and, although it follows the findings, it gives no information as to the quantity of water which is due to plaintiffs. In Riverside Water Company v. Sargent, 112 Cal. 230, 44 Pac. 560, which was an action to determine the relative rights of plaintiffs and defendants to the use of water flowing in the Santa Anna river, the court said: "The decisions of this court establish that, in cases like the present, the findings and judgment must fix the extent of the superior right, viz., the quantity of water to be allowed to the party whose claim is paramount, otherwise the judgment fails to attain the certainty necessary to an estoppel upon the main subject of the litigation." Citing Dougherty v. Haggin, 56 Cal. 522; Alhambra Water Company v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 604, 14 Pac. 379; Lakeside Ditch Company v. Cram, 80 Cal. 182, 22 Pac. 76; Barrows v. Fox, 98 Cal. 63, 32 Pac. 811; Lillis v. Emigrant Ditch Company, 95 Cal. 553, 30 Pac. 1108; also Smith v. Hawkins, 120 Cal. 86, 52 Pac. 139, and Steinberger v. Meyer, 130 Cal. 156, 62 Pac. 483. In all these cases the judgment was set aside because of uncertainty. In the case at bar the judgment can never be legally enforced because of its uncertainty as to the amount of water defendant must let pass to the riparian lands of plaintiffs and it could not be pleaded as an estoppel (section 1908, Code Civ. Proc.) because the rights of neither party are fully determined thereby.

There are other errors complained of, mostly in relation to the findings, but, as the judgment must be reversed and a new trial had, we will not consider them.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the case sent back for a new trial, and it is suggested that the pleadings be so amended that the court upon a new trial may be able to determine specifically the relative rights of the parties.

We concur in the judgment: CHIPMAN, P. J.; McLAUGHLIN, J.

LADD v. MYERS. (Civ. 265.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 16, 1906.)

1. PLEDGES — WHAT CONSTITUTES — AGREEMENT TO PLEDGE.

The payee of a note in the hands of a pledgeholder to secure another obligation having purchased property under an agreement to execute his note therefor and secure it by his interest in the pledged note, in company with the seller requested the pledgeholder to hold the note as collateral to the two claims against the payee, and pay them out of the proceeds thereof. Held to constitute an actual pledge to the seller and not an agreement to pledge.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 40, Pledges, § 34.]

2. BILLS AND NOTES—ASSIGNMENT—PLEDGED NOTES—EXTENT OF PLEDGE.

One who accepts an assignment of a pledged note in the hands of one holding the pledge as security for two claims of different persons, takes it burdened with both claims, and cannot, by failing to make inquiry, occupy the position of an innocent purchaser without notice as to one of such claims.

3. APPEAL—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—CORRECTION OF FINDINGS.

There is no prejudicial error in the correction of a clerical error in the findings where, owing to the fact that it does not affirmatively appear that findings were not waived, the judgment is supported in the absence of findings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by C. B. Ladd against John W. Myers. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

M. C. Hester, for appellant. Scarborough & Forgy, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Action originally brought by plaintiff against defendant bank to recover a sum alleged to be in the hands of said bank due plaintiff. Defendant Myers, being made a party, answered, claiming such funds. Thereupon the defendant bank deposited the same in court, and, upon the trial, findings and judgment went for defendant Myers. Plaintiff appeals from such judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

The facts are these: One Heart, the owner of a promissory note for $2,000 theretofore executed by one Newton, placed the same in the hands of the First National Bank of Santa Ana, as pledgeholder, to hold the same as collateral to an obligation owing from Heart to one Walker, with instructions upon collection to pay Walker a specified sum and the balance to Heart. Afterwards Heart purchased certain personal property from defendant Myers, and, in consideration thereof, agreed to execute his promissory note to Myers for $1,000 and secure the same by his interest in the Newton note, and accordingly, in company with Myers, visited the bank and directed the cashier thereof to hold the Newton note as collateral to the Walker and Myers claim, and out of the proceeds pay such claim. Afterwards Heart made a written assignment of said Newton note to plaintiff, and, when the bank collected the Newton note, plaintiff demanded the proceeds thereof in excess of the amount required to pay the Walker claim. The bank declined to recognize plaintiff's claim as superior in right to that of Myers, and plaintiff brought this action against the bank, which brought the funds into court for distribution under its order. Myers having been made a party and having filed his answer, upon the trial the court found the facts as above set out, and directed judgment for Myers to the extent of the note held by him so executed by Heart.

Appellant's chief point is that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings. There is nothing in this contention. The evidence is clear and convincing as to the agreement between Heart and Myers, and upon the faith of which Heart obtained the possession of personal property for which the $1,000 note was given. It was not an agreement for a pledge, but an actual pledge. Plaintiff, when he purchased the note in the hands of the pledgeholder, took the same burden with the actual agreement under which the pledgeholder held the same as collateral, and cannot, by avoiding inquiry into the extent of the pledge, occupy the position of an innocent purchaser without notice.

There was no prejudicial error in the action of the trial court in correcting a clerical error in the findings. It does not affirmatively appear that findings were not waived; hence, the judgment is supported even in the absence of findings. Mulcahy v. Glazier, 51 Cal. 626; Baker v. Baker, 139 Cal. 626, 73 Pac. 469.

We find no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

PINNEY v. WILSON et al. (Civ. 250.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 25, 1906.)

New Trial—Evidence.

In an action for compensation for the sale of mining claims for $235,000, where plaintiff's witnesses testified that 10 per cent. was a reasonable compensation, and defendant testified that he offered $7,500, and that plaintiff offered in writing to take $10,000, but no such writing was introduced in evidence, and there was a verdict for plaintiff for $7,500, an award of a new trial to plaintiff was not an abuse of discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, New Trial, §§ 130, 146–148.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge.

Action by George M. Pinney against Homer Wilson and others. From an order granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial, defendant Homer Wilson appeals. Affirmed.

Gavin McNab, for appellant. Geo. M. Pinney and Carter, Rickets & Dolph, for respondent.

BUCKLES, J. This was an action to recover the sum of $40,000 as a reasonable compensation for plaintiff's services rendered in procuring a purchaser for the defendant's mining claims, situated in Trinity county, known as the Chloride-Baily, Jenny Lind, and Maple group of mines. The action is based on a written promise, contained in a letter written by defendant to plaintiff, "to pay you a reasonable compensation for such service." In another part of the letter he says: "To pay you such compensation as in equity and good conscience you are entitled and the margin of profit therein will permit." The case was tried with a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $7,500, and judgment was given for that amount. Plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was granted, and defendants appeal from the order granting a new trial.

At the trial it was shown that plaintiff introduced to Wilson (defendant and appellant) one Charles Sweeny, who purchased of Wilson the said mines for $235,000. Every witness produced for the plaintiff testified that 10 per cent. on the amount for which mining property should sell was a reasonable compensation for the services in finding a purchaser. There was no testimony on the part of defendant, except that given by defendant himself. He testified that when he gave plaintiff the letter referred to, in which he promised a reasonable commission, he offered to give the sum of $7,500; that he considered it reasonable. Then, when the sale was made, he testified that plaintiff came to him and offered to take $10,000 for the services rendered. Defendant said this offer to take $10,000 was contained in writing brought to him by the plaintiff. No such writing was offered in evidence. We do not think there was any abuse of discretion in granting the new trial. The order granting the new trial is affirmed.

LOEHR v. LIGHT. (Civ. 272.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 16, 1906.)

APPEAL—FINDINGS OF COURT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

It being the province of the trial court to determine the weight and sufficiency of the evidence offered where there is testimony tending to support a finding, it will not be disturbed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3979.]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by William Loehr against J. E. Light. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry M. Willis, for appellant. Curtis & Curtis, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. There is nothing presented in the record other than specifications of error based upon the insufficiency of the evidence to support certain findings. An examination of the record discloses that a conflict in the evidence exists in relation to each and every of such findings. It is the province of the trial court, which has before it the witnesses, to determine as to the weight and the sufficiency of the evidence tendered, and this court, under the well-established rule, where there is testimony in the record tending to support any particular finding, will not disturb the same upon appeal.

The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FERNANDEZ. (Cr. 29.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 26, 1906.)

CRIMINAL LAW — LIMITING ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL—DISCRETION OF COURT.

A trial for assault on a female child with intent to rape lasted five days. The testimony occupied 350 pages of the transcript. The evidence was conflicting. The testimony of the child raised the question whether it could be safely considered. Held, that an order of the court, limiting the time of the argument to 1¾ hours to each side, was an abuse of discretion requiring a reversal on it appearing that the counsel for defendant objected thereto, and showed that he could not complete his argument within the time limited, though he was allowed 20 minutes additional time.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 1657.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

A. Fernandez was convicted of an assault on a female child with intent to rape, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Ben Berry and F. G. Ostrander, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant was charged by information with having feloniously assaulted one Stephini Granado, a female child about 7 years old, with intent to commit rape. He was convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the period of six years, and appeals from the order denying a new trial, and from the judgment of conviction.

1. It appeared by evidence that the child was living with her uncle, Eduardo Enriquez, and his wife, Altagratio Enriquez. Some time after the noon hour of October 17, 1905, Eduardo was at his work of clearing some ground from timber near his home, and, needing the help of his wife, called her to him. Soon thereafter she returned to the house, and, looking in, saw a man apparently in sexual contact with this child. The wife called to her husband, who came at once. The man ran away as soon as he was surprised by Altagratio. One of the strongly contested facts in the case, as to which the evidence is by no means clear, was whether either the husband or wife recognized the alleged assailant of this child. Altagratio testified that she saw the accused in the act of making the assault, and testified to circumstances tending to corroborate the fact of an assault being made at the time. The husband and wife went to the girl, and at once chastised her for her conduct, and began interrogating her as to the facts. Over the objection of defendant the witness Altagratio was permitted to testify to what the child told her of the occurrence. She testified: "I scolded the little girl, and told her, and I asked her what had happened her, and why she hadn't called me. Then she told me that this man had told her—then the little girl told me she hadn't called because this man had put an axe to her head, and told her not to call. Mr. Ostrander (attorney for defendant): We move to strike it out if the court please, upon the ground this is hearsay. The Court: The motion will be denied. Mr. Hoar (prosecuting attorney): Did the child tell you what the name of the man was that was with her? Mr. Ostrander: We, of course, interpose our objection to that on the same line. I want to make it specific everywhere. The Court: Yes. Mr. Ostrander: And we except. The Witness: Yes, sir; because none of us have seen him before this Sunday. Q. When did the child tell you what the name of this defendant was? A. Why, at the same moment, because I wanted to know. * * * Q. Was it immediately after you discovered the defendant? A. Yes, immediately after I saw the dirty act because I thought he had killed the little girl like any villain with a child might do. Q. What did the little girl tell you the name of the man was? A. Albero" (the first name of defendant). The motion to strike out was not directed to any particular part of the witness' answer, part of which as given in the record, was free from the objection. The court and counsel probably understood that the objection was made to the hearsay statement, and the record would seem to warrant our treating the objection as directed to that particular statement above the threat made by her assailant. The point, however, arises also on the question as to the name of the girl's assailant where the objection was specific. The evidence shows that the witness saw enough herself, if the jury believed her, to establish the assault, and that what the child told the witness was in response to questions asked by Mrs. Enriquez after the assailant had fled. The rule on this subject is well settled, and has been often approved of by our Supreme Court. It is found stated in People v. Lambert, 120 Cal. 170, 52 Pac. 307, People v. Wilmot, 139 Cal. 103, 72 Pac. 838, and in many earlier cases cited in these two cases. It was said in People v. Wilmot: "It is well settled that in prosecutions for rape the people may prove that the injured party made complaint of the injury while it was recent, and that this may be shown both by the prosecutrix, and those to whom the complaint is made. While such evidence would ordinarily be hearsay, its admission in this class of cases is justified upon the ground that in such cases, when restricted to the fact of complaint, it is, in the strictest sense, original evidence." Mr. Greenleaf says: "This complaint constitutes no part of the res gestæ; it is only a fact corroborative of the testimony of the complainant." 3 Greenleaf on Ev. § 213. It was further said in People v. Wilmot: "It is clear that to allow any mere statement of the prosecutrix as to the details of the affair, or as to the name of the person accused by her, to be given in evidence would be to allow hearsay evidence to prove the offense." Citing People v. Lambert, supra. In the present case the reason for admitting proof of the complaint is lacking, for the offense was witnessed by the person to whom it was sought to show what the child said had occurred. No question of force or of consent could arise as essential to the crime, and no fact to which the child might testify could be corroborated by her hearsay statements beyond the fact of the complaint. Indeed, it can hardly be said that the child made any complaint at all. What she said was drawn from her by the questions of Mrs. Enriquez.

2. Exception was taken to the opening statement of the district attorney, and prejudicial error is claimed for the alleged misconduct. It appeared that defendant, his brother, and two other men were engaged in gathering corn husks not far distant from the Enriquez house at the time of the assault. Suspicion became directed to these persons in some way, and the sheriff arrested all of them. Enriquez was called upon to point out the one against whom he had made complaint, and defendant was held in custody, and the others released, and went their way. While riding with the sheriff and before the parties separated, the four men, who were Mexicans, were engaged in talking in the Spanish tongue, none of which conversation the sheriff understood. The district attorney told the jury in his address that after the defendant had been separated and taken away by the sheriff it would be proved that the brother of defendant attempted to bribe the complaining witness, Enriquez, to dismiss the case. Also that similar attempts were made by defendant's partner, Rodriquez. It was not claimed by the district attorney that the defendant knew of this, or had authorized any such attempt. And subsequently, when he offered to prove the fact by Enriquez, the defendant objected to the evidence, and the objection was sustained. The district attorney justified his statement and his offer on the ground that agency might be inferred from the fact that while riding along with the sheriff the parties were talking of the defendant's guilt, and that the attempt to bribe Enriquez was the subject of the conversation. Also that the fact that the attempt at bribery having been made by defendant's brother shortly after they had separated was a circumstance corroborative of his agency to make the attempt. All these facts were stated to the jury in his opening statement with considerable amplification, and against defendant's frequent and persistent objection. The court stated that it was difficult to place restrictions upon counsel in making their statements to the jury; that it could not anticipate what connection the evidence might have with the case, or how counsel would connect it; that when offered, the court would then rule upon it, and, in fact, the court did refuse the evidence when offered, and directed the jury to disregard the circumstance. It is not necessary now to hold that a new trial should be granted for this alleged misconduct alone. But we are quite satisfied that the district attorney overstepped the bounds of propriety in stating that he would prove facts, in their nature calculated to prejudice the defendant, which facts he must have known were not admissible as evidence, unless he could connect them with the knowledge and approval of defendant, and this he did not pretend could be done, except from the two circumstances above stated. The court very properly took the view that the jury could not infer from so unsubstantial a basis that defendant had authorized his brother or Rodriquez to commit a felony. But the mischief which defendant sought to prevent was already to some extent done. It seems to us that counsel should, in their opening statements, refrain from stating that they would prove facts which they know cannot be established by competent evidence, or by evidence which they have reason to believe to be inadmissible to establish the facts claimed to exist. Courts frequently, to protect the rights of parties, refuse to allow offers of evidence to be made in the presence of the jury which the opposing party has reason to believe is inadmissible and may prejudice his case by being stated in the presence of the jury. Cases are sometimes reversed where counsel persist in seeking to obtain advantage by offering evidence in the presence of the jury which they know is incompetent or inadmissible. For somewhat the same reason, counsel should avoid taking undue advantage, in the opening statement to the jury, by accomplishing at that stage of the case what they know they will not be allowed to accomplish when they come to offer their evidence.

3. At the conclusion of the evidence the court made an order limiting the argument to an hour and three-quarters to each side, to which defendant objected, and the objection having been overruled, the defendant excepted. In support of the motion for a new trial Mr. Berry, one of defendant's attorneys, made affidavit, which is not contradicted, that five days were consumed in the trial of the case; that the testimony and proceedings occupy 350 pages of the transcript as compiled by the reporter; that the testimony of two witnesses taken at the preliminary examination of the defendant, and the testimony of one witness taken at a former trial of said cause, consisting of 100 pages, was admitted by stipulation; "that it was utterly impossible to submit a full and fair argument of the cause to the jury in that time; that by reason of the limitation, counsel for the defendant were prevented from presenting to the jury many material points, which would have been presented, but for the order of the court limiting the time for argument, and he believed the rights of defendant were prejudiced by the said order of the court." It appeared that Mr. Ostrander closed the argument for defendant, and was given five minutes' additional time, and, not having concluded his argument, he was offered 15 minutes of the district attorney's time, which he used and closed his argument.

The principal cases in this jurisdiction where the question is discussed are People v. Keenan, 13 Cal. 581, and People v. Green, 99 Cal. 564, 34 Pac. 231. The cases where the point has arisen are quite fully shown in note to Yeldell v. State, 100 Ala. 26, 14 South. 570, 46 Am. St. Rep. 23. It was said in People v. Green, supra: "That a defendant being tried on a charge of felony has a constitutional right to be fully heard in the defense by counsel, which it is not within the discretionary power of the court to deny or abridge, is not questioned. Yet it has been found impossible to formulate any abstract rule or definition by which the extent of this right may be ascertained in all cases. It is also well settled that the court has a discretionary power to restrain what has been termed, perhaps, not quite appropriately, an abuse of this right by which is meant very little more than that counsel may be restricted to a discussion of matters relevant to the case, and restrained from wasting the time of the court by useless repetition. But it must always be a difficult as well as a delicate matter, in a case like this, for the court to determine in advance what limitation should be imposed upon counsel against their consent (Williams v. State, 60 Ga. 369, 27 Am. Rep. 412); and, as was said in the case of People v. Keenan, 13 Cal. 581: 'If it [the court] imposes a limitation of time upon counsel against their consent, this must be done at the risk of a new trial if it be shown by uncontradicted affidavit that the prisoner was deprived by the limitation of the opporunity of a full defense; for this is his constitutional right, without which he cannot be convicted.'" In People v. Green the court gave a skeleton of the testimony and the issues of fact "to test the truth of the affidavits of counsel, to the effect that the time to which they were limited was insufficient." In that case the charge was robbery and the limitation put upon counsel for defendant was one hour, and the court held it to be an abuse of discretion. It is not possible to derive much benefit from a comparison of the facts in other cases with the one in question. The length of the trial and the quantity of testimony taken are not always or necessarily determinative of the question. Nor is it a safe guide for the judge to determine the limit by the time in which he might think he could adequately present the case fully for the defendant. The character of the testimony and the issues raised by it; its conflicting nature as well as the nature of the charge itself must be considered; as was said in People v. Keenan, supra: "It is difficult for a judge to determine what effect a given line of argument may have upon a jury, or some one of them, or what period may be necessary to enable counsel to present, in the aspect deemed by them important, the case of their client. The minds of men are so differently constituted that one advocate may require much more for the statement and elaboration of his views than another."

Where counsel are limited to a stated time deemed by them too short, they may find it necessary to omit points of importance in order to give more attention to others deemed of greater importance. Or the elaboration of essential points deemed important may be prevented in order to make all the points desired. Then, too, counsel, speaking under limitations of time which they feel to be wholly inadequate, are under constraints not conducive to their best efforts, and to the full protection of defendant's rights. The uncontradicted affidavit of counsel is that within the time limited it was "utterly impossible to present a full and fair argument of the cause to the jury" and that counsel were thereby "prevented from presenting to the jury many material points which would have been presented but for the order of the court limiting the time for argument." We cannot very well skeletonize the testimony in support of counsel's affidavit without to some extent indicating our impression of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and this we must avoid, as the case must go back for a new trial. Suffice it to say that the peculiar circumstances surrounding the case, as well as the nature of the charge; the many contradictory statements of material facts by witnesses for the prosecution; the tender age of the child, and the importance of her testimony given under conditions justly raising the question for the jury whether it could safely be considered by them in certain material respects; the conflict in the testimony of witnesses at the preliminary examination, and at the first trial, and at the last or present trial, and the alleged self-impeachment of important witnesses for the prosecution; the testimony as to the alibi claimed by defendant; the conflict in the testimony as to whether Enriquez truthfully repeated what witness Pete Rodiquez said to him about compromising the case which went into evidence to show bias of the witness; that the medical experts did not agree as to the results of a miscroscopical examination to discover spermatozoa on the child's clothing; the fact that much of the testimony was given by witnesses who could not speak or understand the English language, and testified by an interpreter; these and other considerations which might be suggested lead us to the belief that counsel's affidavit is true, and being uncontradicted by the district attorney, or by the condition in which we find the record, we must conclude, under the authorities cited, that there was prejudicial error in making the order complained of.

4. It seems to us that in view of the theory of the prosecution and of certain facts attending the alleged assault, for example, that previously thereto her assailant gave the child freely of wine to drink, instruction numbered 19 given for the people, to which objection is taken, should be more specific. It was as follows: "In a charge of assault to rape a female under the age of consent, it is not necessary to show that the defendant intended to gratify his passion, at all events, or to use force, but it is enough that he intended to have intercourse, and took steps to that end. The uncorroborated testimony of the female upon whom the assault is made, if you believe her testimony to be true, is sufficient to establish the charge." The objection of defendant is directed to the italicized portions of the instruction. The first point made is that the intention alone is not sufficient; that there must be in this, as in all crimes, a union of act and intent (Penal Code, § 20); and that there were in this case, as claimed by the people, several steps taken to the end sought which would not constitute an assault, or attempt to commit the crime, and yet the instruction might lead the jury to so consider them as justifying conviction. Attention is called to People v. Johnson, 131 Cal., at page 515, 63 Pac., at page 844, where similar language is used, but after the words "and took steps looking towards such intercourse," the following appears: "And laid hands upon her for that purpose, although he did not mean to use any force to complete his intent if it caused the child pain, and desisted from his attempt as soon as it hurt, he would yet be guilty of an assault with intent to commit the crime charged in the information." As the instruction reads something in itself short of touching the child might be understood by the jury as constituting an assault with intent to commit the crime charged. Force is not an element of an assault where the female is under the age of consent, but there must be contact of some sort with the child or taking hold of her in such a manner as to indicate the intent to have carnal knowledge of her. But this intent, of course, may be judged by the facts and circumstances.

The second point of objection brings the instruction dangerously near the cases of People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 289, 294, 39 Pac. 622, and People v. Barker, 137 Cal. 557, 70 Pac. 617, where the instruction read: "If you believe the prosecutrix it is your duty to render a verdict accordingly," and new trials were granted for the error. The principle is well settled that the defendant may be convicted upon the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecutrix, or, as in this case, upon the uncorroborated testimony of the female upon whom the assault was committed; People v. Fleming, 94 Cal. 308, 29 Pac. 647; People v. Gardner, 98 Cal. 127, 32 Pac. 880, and other cases; but the rule should be so stated that the instruction would not be obnoxious to the objection that it is a charge with respect to matters of fact. People v. Johnson, supra; People v. Barker, supra.

5. The claim is made that the court abused its discretion in allowing the child Stephini to testify, after her examination on her voir dire. It was said in People v. Craig, 111 Cal. 460, 44 Pac. 186: "The burden is upon the person who objects to the child being a witness, to show that he is incapable, and the determination of the judge upon such objection and an examination of the child, is not a matter for review, any more than his ruling upon the capacity of an adult who may be offered as a witness." In People v. Daily, 125 Cal. 104, 67 Pac. 16, the court seems to have regarded the question as one of discretion, inferentially holding that if abused, the appellate court might review it. However this may be, the case would have to be very clear before we should disagree with the trial judge as to the mental competency of a witness. His opportunity to pass upon the matter is much better with the witness before him than ours can be by reading the cold record. Although permitted to testify, the jury would, doubtless, take into consideration the immaturity of the child's mind in passing upon the weight of its testimony. We cannot say that in this instance the court erred in permitting the child to testify.

Other questions presented may not again arise, and we will therefore not notice them.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

I concur in the judgment: BUCKLES, J.

I concur, but base my concurrence wholly on People v. Keenan, and People v. Green, supra, which I deem as binding on this court: McLAUGHLIN, J.

1. Brokers — Action for Compensation — Sufficiency of Evidence.

In an action for compensation for the sale of real estate, evidence held sufficient to sustain findings that the plaintiff procured a purchaser who was ready, able, and willing to purchase, and thereby completed its services and earned its commission.

2. Same—Right to Commissions—Necessity for Actual Sale.

Under a contract whereby the owner of land gave plaintiff exclusive authority to sell it and agreed to pay a commission on any amount for which the property should be sold, the plaintiff was entitled to his commission on procuring a purchaser able, ready, and willing to purchase though the sale was not actually completed.

John S. Partridge, for appellant. Snook & Church, for respondent.

COOPER, J. This action was brought to recover $791.87 as commissions for the sale of real estate under a written contract. The case was tried before the court, findings filed, and judgment ordered and entered for plaintiff. Defendant has appealed from the order denying its motion for a new trial. The court found that, pursuant to the authorization contained in the contract, the plaintiff procured a purchaser for the lands therein described who was ready, able, and willing to purchase, and thereby completed its services and earned its commissions. The defendant contends that the evidence does not support the findings of the court in this regard. The findings are conclusive upon us if there is substantial evidence to support them, even though the evidence may be conflicting or may preponderate in favor of defendant.

The defendant was, at the times mentioned in the pleadings and findings, a corporation. Its capital stock was divided into 300 shares, and was, at the time the contract was made, owned and held by J. M. Wilmans, F. W. Wilmans, Lillian W. Wilmans, Clara E. Wilmans, and Martha J. Wilmans. J. M. Wilmans was the secretary and managing agent, and owned two-thirds of the shares of the capital stock of the corporation. Its assets consisted of about 1,400 acres of land situate in Stanislaus county in this state. The managing agent of defendant, J. M. Wilmans, spoke of the defendant's property as his own land and as being mortgaged for $75,000, or, in his language: "I owed $75,000 on the whole property." There is evidence to the effect that on May 21, 1903, Merle, the agent of plaintiff, was in Stanislaus county with one Witcher, who was looking at lands with a view of purchasing, and Merle was showing Witcher different tracts of land. They saw the lands belonging to the defendant, and Witcher seemed to be pleased with them, and to desire to purchase them, or at least a part of the land owned by the defendant. Merle procured from defendant, through J. M. Wilmans, its agent, with admitted power to act, a contract in writing, authorizing the plaintiff, exclusively, to sell a tract of land described therein, containing 310 acres, at $100 per acre, and another lot containing 2¼ acres at $300 per acre. The contract contained the clause: "If said property is sold, or a purchaser is found by E. P. Vandercook Co., or through their agency, we agree to pay the said E. P. Vandercook Co. 2½ per cent. commission on any amount for which said property shall be sold." The contract was to continue for one month from date, May 21, 1903, and was continued by written extensions to July 20, 1903. It contained a clause that it should be irrevocable until withdrawn by written notice.

Merle testified that he showed the property to Witcher and "Witcher said he would take that particular piece of property described in the contract. He was to take 310 acres for $100 an acre and 2¼ acres at $300 an acre. * * * Mr. Witcher said if everything was all right the abstract of title was correct, he would take that amount of land. He made no other objection than that the abstract of title should be correct. We had been at the ranch a couple of hours driving around the premises. This particular 300 acres was pointed out by Mr. Wilmans on the map and we drove down and saw the land. Mr. Witcher did not tell Mr. Wilmans at the ranch that he would take the land; he told him so at the hotel." Witcher testified that he was ready at the time the contract was made; that the purchase looked all right to him.

Now, after the plaintiff had procured for the defendant a purchaser for the land described in the contract who was able, ready, and willing to take the land, there arose some question in the mind of Witcher as to whether or not the amount of land described in the contract would be sufficient for his purposes. Wilmans suggested that he would sell Witcher a half interest in the whole ranch. Merle testified that, while this proposition was pending, he went to Wilmans and asked him as to the plaintiff's commissions in case Witcher purchased half the ranch instead of that described in the contract, and that Wilmans replied: "I will stand by my agreement; will pay you your commission as I agreed on the purchase price, which was $31,000." Witcher testified that he heard this conversation, and that Wilmans said: "We will pay the commissions on the sum of $37,675 at the rate of 2½ per cent., but that was in reference to the 312½ acres in reference to the first deal." Wilmans testified in regard to this conversation with Merle: "Then he asked about the commission; I told him that if the trade went through, if he made any trade, that I would see that he got his commission of 2½ per cent."

It therefore appears clear that the minds of the seller and purchaser were first brought together by the plaintiff on the sale of the lands described in the contract. It is admitted that Witcher was able to purchase. It is a significant fact that he gave Wilmans $2,400 while the contemplated sale under the contract was in progress. It is now claimed both by Wilmans and Witcher that this $2,400 was a loan and had nothing to do with the contract, but the claim that it was a loan seems to have been an afterthought. Witcher testified as to this payment: "This thing had been dragging along from May 23d to June 24th. Mr. Wilmans stated to me that he was in need of $2,400 to pay some money due in San Francisco. * * * I said to Mr. Wilmans, 'I have some idle money, I will lend you that $2,400; if I ever buy anything from you it can be applied to the price. If I don't, it is an ordinary loan to be returned to me when the note becomes due.'" The witness could not remember the length of time of the note, nor whether it was given by the corporation or Wilmans. Wilmans testified that he "owed some money in the bank, and I was anxious to pay it. I asked him if he would advance it and take may note for it, and if there was nothing went of this I had to pay him back." Wilmans did not remember whether he gave his personal note or the note of the corporation. No security was asked or given. The note was not produced in evidence. Before the sale of the lands described in the contract was completed the arrangement was changed at the suggestion of Wilmans, and Witcher agreed to buy the shares of capital stock of defendant corporation belonging to the Wilmans. He took an option on them in August, 1903, bought half of them in September and the balance in October of the same year. Witcher testified: "I think the suggestion that I should buy the stock of the corporation came from Mr. Wilmans." Witcher was asked: "Q. Mr. Witcher, if you had not bought the stock of the corporation, would you have purchased any part of the ranch? A. Well, I probably would have in time, though I never did get around far enough to close up the deal." Wilmans testified on the same point: "I suggested that he take the 500 acres, and he said he would entertain it about the 1st day of August. I suggested to him along about the 1st of August that he take stock in the company." It is a significant fact that, although the parties had been brought together by the plaintiff, and Witcher had given the defendant $2,400, after the suggestion of the sale of the stock to the contemplated purchaser, the sale of the stock was not made until the contract with the plaintiff had expired. The sale of the stock of the corporation to Witcher was, as to the owners of the stock, the equivalent of the sale of the ranch. The sale is spoken of by Wilmans as a sale of the land. He testified: "Some of that land is not worth any $100 an acre, while there is a portion of the property would be worth $110, and some down at $80. So in fixing it all up, in adjusting the value, I put it on that basis, $91.50 for the 1,400 acres."

At the time the plaintiff was employed the Wilmans were the owners of all the stock of defendant and thus owned all that defendant owned. Defendant owned the ranch of 1,400 acres and nothing else. The Wilmans were, for the purposes of this case, the corporation, and they desired to sell the lands described in the contract and pay their debts. They did, in effect, sell the lands described in the contract, together with all the lands owned by the corporation. They sold to the purchaser found by plaintiff. The defendant promised to pay plaintiff the commissions when it made the contract, and it again promised when the contract was changed so as to include other lands. It has not paid the commission, and it is no defense that the sale was made by a different mode from that contemplated in the contract. The purchaser produced by plaintiff has, in fact, become the owner of the lands which defendant desired to sell. It is true that Witcher, who purchased the land by purchasing all the shares of stock of defendant, was not a party to the contract, but he knew of it when he purchased the stock. He heard Wilmans promise to pay the commissions. He will not be allowed in this way to defeat the claim of plaintiff against defendant.

When the sale of the capital stock was completed Witcher retained $30,000 out of the amount to be paid by him "as a guaranty that the company was not further obligated than what the books showed." The company was under the obligation to plaintiff to pay the commissions due it, whether the books showed it or not. The transaction must be stripped of all its intricacies and viewed in the light of common sense. It was, in substance, a sale of the ranch of the Wilmans to Witcher. The corporation was only the instrument by which the title was held for the owners of the capital stock, and by its duly authorized agent it agreed to pay plaintiff for its services. The services have been performed and the defendant must pay for them. If the corporation had sold the ranch to Witcher and made its deed under its corporate seal, and he had paid the money to the corporation, the title would have passed. The title is now in the corporate name of defendant, but as Witcher holds all the shares of the capital stock of defendant he holds that which is equivalent to the title. We therefore conclude that the findings are supported by the evidence.

The contention of the appellant that the commissions were to be paid only out of the purchase money when an actual sale should be made is without merit. The agreement was to pay plaintiff "2½ per cent. commission on any amount for which said property shall be sold." This does not make the commissions payable only out of a particular fund. When plaintiff procured a purchaser, able, ready, and willing to purchase, defendant could not by its own act, in suggesting and carrying through a different scheme, take the benefit of the plaintiff's services without compensation. Courts will not readily lend their assistance to aid parties in escaping their just liabilities through technicalities.

The order is affirmed.

THOMPSON v. WHEELER. (Civ. 216.) (Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 27, 1906.) Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; W. B. Nutter, Judge. Action by Anna Thompson against C. M. Wheeler. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Submission set aside. A. H. Carpenter, for appellant. Ashley & Neumiller, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The submission is set aside and vacated, and the cause ordered to be placed on the next calendar for argument, especially upon the following points: (1) Was the delinquent tax list legally filed? (2) Did the lien given by statute rest in the purchaser? (3) To what extent and as to what facts connected with the sale is the deed conclusive evidence? (4) What constitutional limitations are placed upon the Legislature to make the facts recited in the deed conclusive evidence of the holder's title to the land? (5) Was it incumbent upon defendant to make proof of the ordinance under which the tax levy was made?

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. DAVIDSON.

(L. A. 1,850.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 11, 1906. Rehearing Denied Nov. 9, 1906.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—GRANTS OF FRANCHISES — CITY COUNCIL — VETO POWER OF MAYOR.

Act March 1, 1901 (St. 1901, p. 265, c. 103), provides that an applicant for a street railroad shall file with the governing body an application therefor, and thereupon such governing body shall advertise the fact stating the character of the proposed franchise, that sealed bids will be received therefor, and that such franchise shall be sold by said governing body to the highest bidder in gold coin, who shall thereupon be required to file within five days a certain described bond. Such act was amended Act March 3, 1903 (St. 1903, p. 90, c. 82), so as to provide that after filing the bond the said franchises shall be granted by ordinance to the person, firm, or corporation to whom it has been sold. The Los Angeles city charter provides that all legislative power of the city is vested in the council, subject to a veto by the mayor, and shall be exercised by ordinance; that every ordinance passed by the council, before it becomes effective, shall be submitted to the mayor; and that it shall not be operative unless approved by him, or unless upon his veto it shall be again passed by the council by a two-thirds vote. An applicant for a franchise to construct a street railroad made application to the city council, which application was duly advertised and sale of the franchise ordered, pursuant to which such franchise was struck off and sold to the applicant, who duly executed the statutory bond, which was approved by the city council, who thereupon passed an ordinance whereby the franchise was in form granted to the applicant, which ordinance was presented to the mayor and vetoed. No action was taken on the veto. Held, that the applicant did not acquire the franchise.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by the city of Los Angeles against A. N. Davidson. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. S. Chapman and Ward Chapman, for appellant. W. B. Mathews, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The plaintiff is a municipal corporation, and Tenth street is a public street lying within its boundaries. At the time of the commencement of this action the defendant was engaged in digging up part of the surface of said Tenth street, with the intention of constructing and operating thereon a street railroad, claiming to have the franchise for the construction and operation of such railroad; and this action was brought to obtain an injunction restraining defendant from digging upon said street and from constructing or maintaining a railroad thereon. A temporary restraining order was granted as prayed for. Defendant answered, setting up fully his said asserted franchise, and praying judgment that said franchise had vested in him, that he has the right to construct and operate the railroad along said street, that plaintiff be enjoined from interfering with the construction of said railroad by defendant and from hindering him from enjoying his franchise, etc. The case was tried upon the pleadings and a stipulated statement of facts, and the court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff, enjoining defendant as prayed for. From this judgment, defendant appeals.

The main question in this case is whether defendant had a franchise to construct and operate a street railroad along Tenth street. There is substantially no dispute about the facts, and the question here involved depends mainly on the meaning of certain legislative acts and provisions of the municipal charter of plaintiff. On March 11, 1901, an act of the Legislature was approved, entitled "An act providing for the sale of street railroad and other franchises in municipalities," etc. St. 1901, p. 265, c. 103. Section 1 of said act provides, among other things, that every franchise to construct or operate a street railroad upon any street or highway "hereafter proposed to be created by boards of supervisors, boards of trustees, or other governing or legislative bodies of any city and county, city or town within the state * * * shall be granted upon the conditions in this act provided and not otherwise." Section 2 provides that an applicant for such franchise shall "file with the governing or legislative body" an application therefor, and thereupon said governing body shall "in its discretion"—and must in case the application is accompanied with a certain petition of persons owning land along a street—advertise the fact of said application in manner as provided. The advertisement must state the character of the proposed franchise to be granted, that sealed bids will be received up to a day and hour named, and that the successful bidder must pay to the municipality 2 per cent. of the gross annual receipts of the use of the franchise. It shall further state "that the said franchise will be granted to the person, firm, or corporation who shall make the highest cash bid therefor," provided that when the bids are opened any person may raise the highest bid not less than 10 per cent., and it may again be raised by others, and "said franchise or privilege shall finally be struck off, sold, and granted by said governing body to the highest bidder therefor in gold coin." It is also provided that the successful bidder shall, within five days after the franchise shall have been sold and struck off to him, file a certain described bond. In accordance with the provisions of the said act of March 11, 1901, the defendant herein made an application to the city council of plaintiff for a franchise to construct and operate a railroad for a distance "along Vermont avenue to Tenth street, and thence along Tenth street to Western avenue." And on November 27, 1904, the council made an order that said franchise be sold for a period of 39 years. In advertising and conducting the sale all the provisions of said act were complied with, and on the 6th day of February, 1905, which was the day set for opening the bids, the bids were opened and defendant increased his bid 10 per cent. and bid $700 for the franchise; and there being no other bid the city council did on said 6th day of February accept the said sum of $700, and did thereupon strike off, sell, and award to the defendant herein the said franchise, and defendant immediately paid said sum of money, which was accepted by the council. (This money has, however, been tendered back to defendant and is at his disposal.) On the next day, February 7th, defendant duly executed and presented to the council the bond required by the statute, which was approved by the council, and thereupon, on said February 7th, an ordinance was passed by the council whereby said franchise was, in form, granted to defendant. This ordinance was presented to the mayor of the city, who returned it with his veto, putting his veto on the ground that certain amendments to the charter of the city, which limited the term of a street railroad franchise to 21 years, were approved by the Legislature of the state on said February 7, 1905. The council did not afterwards take any action on said veto.

The charter of plaintiff provides for, among other things, a city council, consisting of one councilman from each ward. It is provided in the charter that "all legislative power of the city is vested in the council, subject to the power of veto by the mayor as hereinafter given, and shall be exercised by ordinance." It is further provided that "the enacting clause of all of the ordinances shall be substantially as follows: 'The mayor and council of the city of Los Angeles ordain as follows.'" The said act of March 11, 1901, was amended by an amendatory act approved March 3, 1903 (St. 1903, p. 90, c. 82), so as to provide that after the filing of the bond of the successful bidder "the said franchise shall by said governing or legislative body be granted by ordinance to the person, firm, or corporation to whom it has been struck off, sold or awarded." The said amendatory act of March 5, 1903, also amends the act of 1901 in some other particulars: For instance, the word "granted" in section 5 of the act of 1901, is changed by the act of 1903 to "awarded." The first act does not provide for the granting of the franchise by an ordinance, but seems to assume that the franchise passes by the acts of the governing body by which it is "struck off, sold," etc., by the governing body, and provides that if the bidder fails to file the required bond "the award of said franchise shall be set aside," while the act of 1903 provides that upon the filing and approving of the bond "the said franchise shall by said governing or legislative body be granted by ordinance to the person," etc. The city charter provides that "every ordinance which shall have been passed by the council before it becomes effective," shall be submitted to the mayor, with the usual provisions that the ordinance shall not be operative unless approved by the mayor, or unless upon his veto it shall be again passed by the council by a two-thirds vote.

No doubt the legislative enactments and the charter provisions above referred to are a little confusing, and leave considerable room for the forcible argument of counsel for appellant that the franchise here in question vested in appellant by the act of the city council on February 6th striking off, selling, and awarding it to appellant. But the amendments to the act of 1901 by the act of 1903 must be construed in connection with the provisions of the city charter; and, so construing them, we think that the latest expression of the legislative will, as expressed in the act of 1903, was that the franchise here in question should finally pass from the sovereign to the individual only by an ordinance approved by the mayor. It is true that the provision in the act of 1903 is that the ordinance by which the franchise is to be granted shall be by "the governing or legislative body," without special mention of the mayor; but the provision must be construed in view of the legislative knowledge that by the charter all "legislative power" of the council must be "exercised by ordinance," that the form of an ordinance includes the mayor, and that no ordinance "becomes effective" until approved by the mayor, or passed over his veto. Otherwise the amendment of 1903, providing for the granting of the franchise "by ordinance," would have to be entirely disregarded.

We have disregarded the contention of respondent that the amendments to the charter alleged to have been approved by the Legislature on February 7th are conclusive against appellants, because there is no finding or evidence that said amendments were approved as early as February 7th. We have also disregarded the contention of respondents that, by the act of the Legislature approved March 27, 1897 (St. 1897, p. 190, c. 129), it is expressly provided that every ordinance of a municipality providing for the grant of a franchise "shall, before it takes effect, be presented to the mayor for his approval," because it is doubtful if such provision applies to a municipality having a freeholders' charter.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

DODGE et al. v. KINGS COUNTY.

(Sac. 1,258.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 8, 1906.)

1. COUNTIES — COUNTY BOARDS — EFFECT OF MOTIVE ON OFFICIAL ORDERS.

That a board of supervisors intended to discriminate against a publisher, in fixing a lower rate for the official publication of the delinquent tax list than for other county advertising, would not vitiate the order.

2. SAME — ACTIONS — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence, in an action against a county to recover for county printing, held to sustain a finding that there was good reason for fixing a lower rate for the publication of the delinquent tax list than for other public printing, and that the action of the board of supervisors in so fixing the rate was not arbitrary or unnatural.

Department One. Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by F. A. Dodge and another against Kings county. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment. Affirmed.

E. T. Cosper, for appellants. H. Scott Jacobs, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Appeal by plaintiffs from a judgment and an order denying a motion for new trial.

The action was brought by the appellants, printers and publishers of the Hanford Sentinel, a newspaper, to recover from Kings county the sum of $383.75 for printing and publishing the delinquent tax list of the defendant in June, 1901. The publication was made by direction of the tax collector. Under the provisions of subdivision 21, § 25, of the county government act (St. 1897, p. 464, c. 277), the tax collector had authority to procure such advertising at a price no greater than that fixed by the board of supervisors, who are required to annually fix the price of all county advertising. Journal Pub. Co. v. Whitney, 97 Cal. 285, 32 Pac. 237. In January, 1901, the board of supervisors had made an order reading as follows: "It is ordered that the following rates be, and they are, hereby established for county advertising during the present year, to wit: For first insertion, per square, fifty cents. For each subsequent insertion, per square, twenty-five cents. Said rate to apply to all county advertising except the publication of the delinquent tax list, the rate for which is hereby fixed as follows: For four insertions, fifteen cents per square." The court gave the plaintiffs judgment for $46.05, which was the amount due at the rate of 15 cents per square for four insertions, as fixed by the order of the board of supervisors. The claim of the plaintiffs, however, is that the order of the board, in so far as it purported to fix a less rate for publishing the delinquent tax list than for other county advertising, was void. The complaint alleges that the rates fixed for general county advertising are reasonable and just, that the work of printing the delinquent tax list is of the same general character, and that the rate fixed for publishing such delinquent list was so low as to entail a loss on any one publishing it at such rate. The distinction made between the two classes of printing is alleged to be arbitrary and without good reason, and it is charged that the board of supervisors adopted the two different rates for the purpose of discriminating against the plaintiffs.

So far as concerns the allegation of an intent to discriminate against the plaintiffs, the finding of the court was against plaintiffs; but, even if it had not been, it cannot be contended that the validity of the action of the board of supervisors should be made to depend upon the motives which actuated the members of the board. On the issues raised as to the reasonableness of the distinction between the two classes of printing, the court found that "there was good reason for excepting the publishing of the delinquent tax list from the general rates fixed for the other county advertising of a like general character; that the distinction so made by said exception was not arbitrary nor unnatural." The appellants contend that these findings are not supported by the evidence. While the bill of exceptions discloses considerable testimony tending to support the view that the cost of doing the work and the reasonable value of the service were the same in each case, there was evidence which, we think, supports the findings of the court. One of the plaintiffs' witnesses testified that the printing of the tax list is "much easier for the compositor than the general run of advertising, because it is descriptive matter, and to a certain extent it is table matter, and more or less figures." The tax collector himself testified that he had had a verbal offer to publish the tax list at the rate fixed by the supervisors. And the testimony of a member of the board was that the supervisors fixed the rate by "learning what it was printed for in other counties and what they offered to print it for here." The court accepted the statements of these witnesses, and, so accepting them, was justified in finding as it did on the facts in issue. It follows that the judgment and order must be affirmed.

We may add that we are not to be understood as holding that a different result could be reached if the evidence had shown conclusively that the rate fixed for publishing the delinquent tax list was arbitrary and unreasonable. The only authority which the law gave to the tax collector was to procure the advertising at a price no greater than that fixed by the board. It may well be argued that one who does work after a rate has been fixed accepts that rate, and is bound by it, or, in any event, that, if the order fixing the rate be void, no recovery can be had, since the fixing of a rate is the condition upon which, by the terms of the law, the liability of the county depends. To strike out of the order the rate fixed for publishing the delinquent tax list could hardly have the effect of making the general rate of 50 cents per square for the first insertion and 25 cents for subsequent insertions apply to the delinquent tax list. By such ruling the court would be making for the board a rate which it never intended to fix. In this respect, as well as in others, the case is very different from Van Harlingen v. Doyle, 134 Cal. 53, 66 Pac. 44, 54 L. R. A. 771, which dealt with a void and severable provision of an act of the Legislature of the state. In making these last suggestions, we desire to avoid any inference that might be drawn from a failure to notice the contention as to the effect of an arbitrary and unreasonable fixing of rates, rather than to decide a question which, in the view we take of the evidence, is not here involved.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

COHEN v. COHEN. (S. F. 3,277.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 20, 1906.)

1. DIVORCE—DEFAULT JUDGMENT—NONCONFORMITY TO PLEADINGS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 580, provides that the relief granted to a plaintiff where there is no answer cannot exceed the demand in the complaint. A complaint for divorce contained no averments concerning property or the husband's ability to pay alimony, and prayed for divorce and for such other relief as might be just and within the jurisdiction of the court. Held, that the part of a default judgment for divorce which awarded alimony was not void nor subject to collateral attack on the ground that the relief awarded was in excess of that prayed for.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, Divorce, §§ 594-596.]

2. JUDGMENT—DEFAULT—RELIEF.

A judgment by default granting more relief than is prayed for may be modified in the lower court only by proceedings under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, authorizing the court to relieve a party from a judgment, or by proceedings in equity.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, §§ 246, 324, 325, 803–806.]

3. Divorce — Alimony—Appeal — Questions Raised in Trial Court.

The court, on appeal from an order refusing to vacate the part of a default judgment for divorce which awards alimony, on the ground that justice requires its vacation because of the remarriage of the wife, cannot vacate the judgment on the ground that the relief is in excess of that prayed for.

4. Same—Modification of Judgment—Jurisdiction.

Under Civ. Code, § 139, providing that the court may, from time to time, modify its orders providing for the maintenance by a husband of his divorced wife, the court may change a judgment awarding as permanent alimony to a wife obtaining a divorce a specified sum per month so as to require the payments for a stated period only, and the court, on the wife remarrying, may vacate the decree as to alimony.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, Divorce, § 691–696.]

5. Same.

Where the complaint for divorce did not contain any allegations as to the property of the husband or his ability to pay alimony, it will be presumed, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that an allowance of alimony to the wife, on her obtaining a divorce, had no other foundation than the obligation to give her support, and that it was not based on any property rights possessed by her at the time of the divorce, so that, on her remarriage, the decree as to alimony may be vacated.

6. Same.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, declaring that it is presumed that things happen according to the ordinary course of nature and the ordinary habits of life, a husband liable to pay alimony to his divorced wife is prima facie relieved from such liability so as to entitle him to an order vacating the decree as to alimony on showing that the wife has remarried, for the presumption is that the second husband is able to support the wife, and in a proceeding by the husband to vacate the decree as to alimony, on the ground of the remarriage of the wife, the wife has the burden of proving that the support received from the second husband is not adequate to her needs.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, Divorce, §§ 696–699.]

7. Equity—Laches.

Delay for a time less than the period of limitation does not amount to laches, unless it occasions, or may be presumed to occasion, prejudice to the other party.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 19, Equity, §§ 212–214.]

8. Divorce—Alimony—Modification.

In January, 1898, a wife obtained a default judgment of divorce which awarded to her as alimony a specified sum per month. After the filing of her complaint, and before the rendition of the judgment, she agreed with her husband not to ask for alimony. After obtaining the divorce, she removed to another state and remarried. The husband, three years after the rendition of the judgment, discovered that alimony had been allowed, and he commenced proceedings by motion to vacate that portion of the judgment. No part of the alimony had ever been paid nor demanded. Held, that the husband was not barred by laches as against the wife from having the award of alimony set aside.

9. Same—Assignments of Sums Due Under Judgment—Rights of Assignee.

Since a judgment is not a negotiable instrument, a purchaser of sums alleged to be due a divorced wife under the decree awarding to her as alimony a specified sum per month acquires rights subject to the same attack in his hands as they would have been had the wife not assigned her rights.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, Divorce, § 727; vol. 30, Judgment, § 1526.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. C. Sloss, Judge.

Proceedings by George Knight White to recover alimony awarded his assignor, Pauline Cohen, in a suit for divorce by her against Meyer Cohen, and proceedings by Meyer Cohen against Pauline Cohen for a vacation of the judgment awarding alimony. From a judgment refusing to vacate the judgment, and directing that execution issue for sums accruing prior to a specified date, Meyer Cohen appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Henry H. Davis (W. R. Daingerfield and Jerome H. Kahn, of counsel), for appellant. H. M. Owens, T. C. West, and L. C. Pistolesi (George Knight White and Henry G. Tardy, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. Pauline Cohen, on January 4, 1898, obtained a decree of divorce from the defendant, Meyer Cohen, judgment being taken by default for his failure to appear or answer. The decree adjudged that Meyer Cohen should pay to Pauline, as permanent alimony, the sum of $10 per month thereafter. On October 4, 1898, Pauline was married to one Hoffman. On December 4, 1901, Pauline duly assigned to George Knight White all money due her under the decree. On December 13, 1901, White obtained an order in the case requiring the defendant to show cause before said superior court on December 20, 1901, why an execution should not issue against him for the money due. The matter was continued to January 17, 1902, and, in the meantime, the defendant served notice of a motion to vacate and modify the decree for alimony, upon the ground that, since the rendition of the decree, the plaintiff had become the wife of Hoffman and that equity and justice demanded a modification thereof. Both motions were heard together. The court refused to vacate the decree as to the amounts already accrued, but modified it by directing that the payments of alimony thereon should cease after January 15, 1902, and directed that execution be issued for the sums previously accrued, amounting to $490. From this order, the defendant appeals.

The complaint alleges a good cause of action for a divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty, but contains no averments concerning property, or concerning the husband's ability to pay alimony. The prayer is for a divorce and for "such other relief as may be just and meet in the premises and within the jurisdiction of the court." It is now contended that the judgment for alimony is void on the face of the record, because of the absence of any averments in the complaint of facts showing the husband's faculties, or of any prayer for that particular relief. There are two reasons why this claim cannot be upheld.

In the first place, the defect does not go to the jurisdiction; and hence does not render the judgment void. In Gaston v. Gaston, 114 Cal. 545, 46 Pac. 609, 55 Am. St. Rep. 86, this court said: "It is argued that the portion of the judgment requiring the payment of $45 per month for the support of plaintiff is void, because no statement of the husband's ability was contained in the complaint. The provision for support in such cases is ordinarily an incident of the judgment of divorce; the jurisdiction of the court (which is the extent of our concern at present) to make such provision is not dependent upon averments in the complaint of the husband's resources any more than its power to dispose of the children depends upon an allegation of the relative fitness of the parents for their custody." The following cases are to the same effect: Sprague v. Sprague, 73 Minn. 474, 76 N. W. 268, 42 L. R. A. 419, 72 Am. St. Rep. 636; McKensey v. McKensey (N. J. Ch.) 55 Atl. 1073; Seibly v. Ingham, 105 Mich. 584, 63 N. W. 528; Darrow v. Darrow, 43 Iowa, 411; 2 Bish. on Marriage, Divorce and Separation, §§ 1008, 1009. The judgment is not avoid on the ground that it gives relief in excess of that specifically prayed for. Section 580, Code Civ. Proc., providing that, where there is no answer, the relief cannot exceed that demanded in the complaint, does not make the judgment void in a case where the relief given is within the terms of a prayer for general relief and is germane to the cause of action stated, although it may not be authorized by the facts alleged. In such cases the judgment may be erroneous as to the excess and subject to reversal or modification on appeal, but it is not void, nor subject to collateral attack on that ground, nor has the lower court power to amend or modify it as to the excess, as an act done without jurisdiction. It can be modified in the lower court only by proceedings under section 473, Code Civ. Proc., or by proceedings in equity. It has, indeed, frequently been held that a judgment for more relief than is prayed for is not void as to such excess and cannot be attacked in collateral proceedings, although there is no prayer for general relief. Bond v. Pacheco, 30 Cal. 530; Chase v. Christianson, 41 Cal. 253; Mach v. Blanchard, 15 S. D. 439, 90 N. W. 1042, 58 L. R. A. 811, 91 Am. St. Rep. 698; Harrison v. Trust Co., 144 N. Y. 326, 39 N. E. 353; Ketchum v. White, 72 Iowa, 193, 33 N. W. 627; Jones v. Jones, 78 Wis. 446, 47 N. W. 728.

Secondly. The defendant did not move the court below to vacate this part of the judgment on the ground that it was void, but upon the ground that equity and justice required that it should be vacated because of the remarriage of the plaintiff, and the court below, having refused to set it aside, this court cannot, on appeal from the order denying that motion, go beyond the matter appealed from and vacate the judgment on a ground not presented to the court below, nor involved in the appeal, namely, that the judgment is void for want of jurisdiction. It is not an appeal from the judgment, and this court cannot, on the appeal from the order in question, inquire into the jurisdiction to render the judgment.

Upon the merits of the motion it is insisted that, upon the showing made, the court should have modified the judgment by an order releasing the defendant from any obligation to pay the sums accruing after the plaintiff's marriage to Hoffman. In this we think counsel is correct. The Code expressly gives the court power to modify, from time to time, its orders respecting permanent alimony. Civ. Code, § 139. The judgment, in the first instance, might have been made for a gross sum, or for periodical payments, either for a stated period, or, as in effect was done, during the life of the plaintiff. Id. To change this judgment so as to require the payments for a stated period only would not be an annulment of the original judgment, but only a modification thereof. Therefore, such modification would be within the power of the court, even if it were conceded that the power to modify did not give authority to vacate such order in its entirety. "Where a wife has obtained an absolute divorce carrying with it the privilege of a remarriage, and permanent alimony is decreed to her, it is generally held that the husband, upon her subsequent remarriage, may secure an order vacating the decree as to alimony." 14 Cyc. 787, citing Casteel v. Casteel, 38 Ark. 477; Brown v. Brown, 38 Ark. 324; Bowman v. Worthington, 24 Ark. 522; Stillman v. Stillman, 99 Ill. 196, 39 Am. Rep. 21; Southworth v. Southworth, 168 Mass. 511, 47 N. E. 93; Albee v. Wyman, 10 Gray (Mass.) 222; Bankston v. Bankston, 27 Miss. 692; Olney v. Watts, 43 Ohio St. 499, 3 N. E. 354; Brandt v. Brandt, 40 Or. 477, 67 Pac. 508. There is a qualification of this rule, generally adverted to in the cases cited, to the effect that such a remarriage does not authorize a vacation of the decree for alimony where it is given as a substitute for, or in lieu of, the wife's rights, at the time of the decree, in the property of the husband, or in the community property, or in property which he acquired from her by the marriage. This qualification does not affect this case, however, for there is no claim here that the allowance in question was based upon either of those grounds. In view of the absence of any allegations in the complaint as to his property and of any showing to the contrary on the hearing of the motion, it must be presumed that the allowance had no other foundation than the obligation to give her support and maintenance, which was a part of his marriage covenant, and that it was not based upon any property rights possessed by her at the time of the divorce.

In support of the defendant's motion, it was shown that the remarriage took place in Seattle, Wash., on October 4, 1898; that, after the filing of the complaint for divorce and prior to the decree, the plaintiff in writing promised the defendant that she would not ask alimony in the action; that the defendant had no actual knowledge of the allowance of alimony in the judgment until December 1, 1901, that he thereupon began proceedings upon the motion to vacate that portion of the judgment, and that no part of the allowance had ever been paid. No evidence was introduced by either party concerning the ability of the second husband to support the plaintiff. It was held in Southworth v. Southworth, supra, that the fact of remarriage gave the wife the right to claim support from another man, and throws upon her the burden of proving that such support is not adequate to her needs and is prima facie sufficient cause to revise the judgment for alimony. We think this rule is just and equitable. The presumption would be that the second husband was able to fulfil his marriage covenant and support his wife according to her station in life. This is the ordinary and normal condition of married persons, and such ordinary condition is to be presumed until the contrary is shown. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963. If, in fact, the second husband was unable to give his wife reasonable support, the wife would be better advised of the facts than the former husband, and justice would require that proof of such inability should be produced by her. It is to be gathered from the decisions in Re Spencer, 82 Cal. 110, 23 Pac. 37, and Ex parte Spencer, 83 Cal. 460, 23 Pac. 395, 17 Am. St. Rep. 266, that this court there held that the remarriage of a wife does not, of itself, avoid a previous decree for alimony. But we believe that the cases wherein the alimony should be continued after the remarriage are extremely rare and exceptional, particular where there are no children of the former marriage. Good public policy would not compel a divorced husband to support his former wife after she has become another man's wife, except under extraordinary conditions, which she should be required to prove. Unless such conditions are shown by her to exist, the court should, on the former husband's motion, cancel all payments accruing after the remarriage, in all cases where, as here, there are no children and the allowance is based solely upon the husband's probable earning capacity, or upon his breach of the marriage vows, and not upon existing property rights.

The delay of the defendant in proceeding for a vacation of the allowance does not, under the existing circumstances, constitute laches. Delay for a time less than the period of limitation does not amount to laches unless it occasions, or may be presumed to occasion, wrong or prejudice to the other party; an element entirely lacking here. Cahill v. Superior Court, 145 Cal. 46, 78 Pac. 467. He had no actual knowledge of the allowance. She did not, in her complaint, allege his abilities, or pray specifically for an allowance. Before the decree she made a conditional agreement with him that she would not ask alimony. Not long after the decree she removed to the state of Washington and was there remarried nine months after the divorce, and she never at any time before the assignment demanded any payment on account of the alimony allowed, or gave him any notice that she had obtained such allowance. She is certainly in no position to complain of the delay, and he was not called upon to proceed to avoid a liability which he had reason to believe did not exist and of which he was in fact unaware.

The defendant did not assign the judgment to the respondent White until December 4, 1901. The bill of exceptions recites that evidence was given that "the assignment was for a valuable consideration," but the price is not otherwise stated. It is, however, immaterial. The contention that the assignee, White, is an innocent purchaser for value, and that, therefore, the decree for alimony already accrued cannot be modified, as against him, cannot prevail. The judgment is not a negotiable instrument. No part of it had ever been paid, nor, so far as appears, had any demand ever been made for it. If an obligation could be dishonored by failure to comply with it, then certainly this obligation was so dishonored. It is eminently a case of the application of the maxim, "Caveat emptor." The purchaser got the right he bought and no more, and the decree is subject to the same attack in his hands as it would have been had it remained in the name of the original plaintiff.

The order appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

In re PFAHLER. Cr. 1,328.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 13, 1906.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — CHARTER — "INITIATIVE" PROVISION—DIRECT LEGISLATION BY CITIZENS—CONSTITUTIONAL GUARANTY OF REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT.

Const. U. S. art. 4, § 4, declaring that the United States shall guaranty to every state a republican form of government, is not violated by the "initiative" provision of the charter of Los Angeles (St. 1903, p. 572), authorizing direct legislation as to strictly local affairs by the citizens, in case the council refuses to enact the same.

2. Same.
The initiative provision of the charter of Los Angeles (St. 1903, p. 572), authorizing direct legislation by the citizens, is authorized by Const. art. 11, § 11, providing that any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits certain regulations; the term "city" not meaning some board or officers of the city, but the municipality, or the people in their organized condition as a body politic.

3. Same—Conflict of Authority.
It cannot be objected to the "initiative" provision of the charter of Los Angeles that by reason thereof there are two equal, co-ordinate lawmaking bodies in the city, each absolutely independent of the other; the electors having the veto power over the council, and the council not having such power over the electors.

4. Same — Suspending Exercise of Police Power.
The "initiative" provision of the charter of Los Angeles does not interfere with or suspend the exercise of the police power granted to the city by Const. art. 11, § 11, merely because it takes longer to amend or repeal a police regulation made by the people than one made by the council.

5. Same — Conflict in "Initiative" and "Referendum" Provision.
There is no conflict in the "initiative" and "referendum" provisions of the charter of Los Angeles, because under the referendum provision certain emergency ordinances adopted by the council take effect immediately, without opportunity for a protest by electors, requiring reference to the people, as in case of an initiative ordinance and an emergency ordinance on the same subject the provisions would be construed to make one or the other ordinance paramount.

6. Same — Preventing Exercise of Police Power.
The "initiative" provision of the charter of Los Angeles is not invalid on the ground that under it the proper exercise of the police power may be prevented, by reason of the absence of sufficient funds for the expenses of an election to repeal or amend an initiative ordinance, without which funds, under Const. art. 11, § 18, the election could not be had.

7. Same—Delegation of Power to Perform Municipal Functions.
Const. art. 11, § 13, prohibiting the Legislature from delegating to any special commission or private agencies power to perform any municipal functions, is not contravened by the "initiative" provision of the charter of Los Angeles; the electors as a whole, or those signing a petition for adoption of an ordinance, not constituting a special commission or a private agency, and such signing not being the performance of a municipal function.

8. Same — Inconsistency of Charter and Political Code.
It is immaterial that the "initiative" provision of the charter of Los Angeles is inconsistent with Pol. Code, § 4354 et seq., providing a general form of city government; they not being such general laws as city charters must be consistent with.

9. Same—Legislative Authority.
The "initiative" provision of the charter of Los Angeles, giving power to the electors to adopt ordinances, is not shown to be unconstitutional because of the words "legislative authority" being used by Const. art. 11, § 8, to designate the ordinary legislative body of a city, in providing for submission by legislative authority of the city of a proposed charter amendment to the voters of the city.

10. Statutes—Titles of Resolutions Approving Amendments of City Charter.
The approval as a whole by the Legislature of 13 amendments of the charter of Los Angeles ratified by the electors thereof at an election, by a single resolution, the title to which simply states it is a resolution "approving thirteen certain amendments to the charter of Los Angeles," does not violate the requirement that every act shall embrace but one subject, which shall be expressed in its title, but is in accord with Const. art. 11, § 8, providing that a city charter adopted by the electors shall be submitted to the Legislature for its approval or rejection as a whole, without power of alteration, and, if approved by a majority vote of each house, it shall become the charter, and that the charter may be amended by proposals submitted to and ratified by the electors, and approved by the Legislature as provided for approval of the charter.

McFarland, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Application by Andrew Pfahler for writ of habeas corpus, to be directed against the chief of police of the city of Los Angeles. Writ discharged and petitioner remanded.

Robert A. Todd (C. W. Pendleton, E. S. Torrance, Earl Rogers, and Luther G. Brown, amici curiæ), for petitioner. Wm. B. Mathews, Herbert J. Goudge, and Hunsaker & Britt (W. H. Davis, Wright & Wright, Allen G. Wright, Wm. J. Danforth, W. G. Burke, City and County Atty. for San Francisco, and W. D. Burchard, Asst. City and County Atty. for San Francisco, amici curiæ), for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The petitioner is held in the custody of the chief of police of the city of Los Angeles, under a warrant issued upon a complaint charging him with a violation of the provisions of a certain purported ordinance of said city, which ordinance prohibits, except within certain defined limits, the killing or slaughtering of animals, the flesh of which is to be sold or offered for sale or eaten. There is no claim that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to show a public offense under the provisions of said ordinance; nor is there, on the part of the petitioner, any claim that the ordinance, if legally enacted, was not a reasonable and valid exercise of the police power vested in such city. Petitioner's claim is that the purported ordinance has never been legally enacted. The ordinance was not adopted in the ordinary way, by vote of the city council and approval of the mayor, but by the electors of the city, at a general election, at which it was submitted for their approval or rejection; such submission having been compelled by a petition submitted to the council, signed by electors equal in number to at least 5 per cent. of the vote cast for all candidates for mayor at the last preceding election. The procedure was in strict accord with what is known as the "initiative" provision of the charter of Los Angeles, which, together with what is known as the "referendum," was made a part of such charter by amendments ratified by the people of such city at an election held December 1, 1902, and approved by the Legislature of the state on January 30, 1903 (see St. 1903, pp. 555, 572). The real question presented by this proceeding is, then, as to the validity of this provision of the charter.

The city of Los Angeles is a municipal corporation operating under a freeholders' charter, framed and adopted under the provisions of section 8, art. 11, of the Constitution, and approved by the Legislature January 31, 1889 (St. 1889, p. 455, c. 1). By that charter the legislative power of the city was vested in a council provided for by such charter, subject to the power of veto and approval by the mayor. The initiative amendment of 1902 and 1903, so far as material to the question here presented, provides substantially as follows: Any proposed ordinance may be submitted to the council by a petition signed by registered electors of the city. If such petition is signed by electors equal in number to 15 per cent. of the entire vote cast for all candidates for mayor at the last preceding general election at which a mayor was elected, and contains a request that said ordinance be submitted forthwith to a vote of the people at a special election, the council must either (1) pass such ordinance without alteration (subject to a referendary vote as elsewhere provided), and if, when passed, it is vetoed by the mayor, and on reconsideration fails of passage by the council, submit it to a vote of the people at a special election, or (2) call a special election, at which said ordinance, without alteration, shall be submitted to a vote of the people. If the petition is signed by electors equal in number to at least 5 per cent., but less than 15 per cent., of such vote, the ordinance shall be submitted to a vote of the people at the next general municipal election that shall occur at any time after 30 days from the date when the sufficiency of the petition is officially determined. "If a majority of the qualified electors voting on said proposed ordinance shall vote in favor thereof, such ordinance shall thereupon become a valid and binding ordinance of the city; and any ordinance proposed by petition or which shall be adopted by a vote of the people cannot be repealed or amended, except by a vote of the people. * * * The council may submit a proposition for the repeal of any such ordinance, or for amendments thereto, to be voted upon at any succeeding general election; and should such proposition receive a majority of the votes cast thereon at such election, such ordinance shall be repealed or amended, accordingly." The accompanying referendum amendment provides: "No ordinance passed by the city council (except when otherwise required by the general laws of the state or the provisions of the charter, respecting street improvements, and except an ordinance for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health or safety, which contains a statement of its urgency, and is passed by a two-thirds vote of the council, but no grant of any franchise shall be construed to be an urgency measure, but all franchises shall be subject to the referendary vote herein provided for), shall go into effect before thirty days from the time of its final passage and its approval by the mayor." It is further provided therein that a protest against such ordinance filed during said 30 days, signed by electors equal in number to at least 7 per cent. of such vote, shall have the effect of suspending the ordinance from going into operation and require the council to reconsider the same, and, if that body does not entirely repeal it, to submit it to the electors at a general or special election; the ordinance to go into effect or not as the majority of the electors voting thereon shall decide.

While no question as to the validity of the referendum amendment is directly involved here, we have briefly set forth its provisions, as the two amendments are simply part of one general plan or scheme looking to a more direct control of local legislation by the people of the city, and, so far as the principal objections here made are concerned, must stand or fall together. Those objections go to the question of the validity, under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States and our own Constitution and laws, of any provision in a municipal charter which authorizes the electors of the municipality to participate directly in the enacting of local laws. These two amendments, the initiative and the referendum, have the same effect in this respect. In each it is the vote of the electors at the ballot box that finally determines whether or not a proposed measure shall be a law at all, and it can make no difference, in principle, whether the proposition originates with electors or with the council. In each the electors by their vote at the ballot box directly exercise legislative power. By these amendments the electors are, except in certain specified cases, given an effectual veto power as to all ordinances approved by the council, and are clothed with authority, paramount to that of the council, to directly enact such local legislation as they may deem expedient, where the council declines to enact the same. The charter provision relative to the initiative, which is substantially similar to recently enacted provisions in the charters of other municipalities of the state, is vigorously attacked by counsel for petitioner and other attorneys appearing as amici curiæ, who claim to see in this curbing of the power of the ordinary legislative body of the city, this vesting in the electors of a municipality the power to enact measures which the legislative body refuses to approve, a violation of our own Constitution, and a forbidden departure from the republican form of government, guarantied by the Constitution of the United States.

The latter objection may appropriately be first considered. Its sole foundation is section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, which is as follows: "The United States shall guarantee to every state in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and, on application of the Legislature, or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened), against domestic violence." The contention here is, necessarily, that any attempt by a state to provide for a direct exercise of legislative power by the people, instead of by representatives of the people elected or appointed for that purpose, is, even in purely local affairs, inconsistent with the republican form of government guarantied by this provision, and ineffectual for any purpose; the theory being that such provision requires a purely representative form of government, not only in the state itself, but also in all its subdivisions, leaving no vestige of power of direct legislation in the people themselves. If we assume that this claim presents a judicial question, rather than a political one to be determined by the Congress of the United States (see, however, Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 1, 12 L. Ed. 581; Taylor v. Beckham, 178 U. S. 548, 20 Sup. Ct. 1009, 44 L. Ed. 1187), we are brought to a consideration of the question as to what was meant by this guaranty of a republican form of government. For all the purposes of this proceeding it is sufficient to hold, as we do, that it does not prohibit the direct exercise of legislative power by the people of a subdivision of a state in strictly local affairs. In saying this, we do not wish to be understood as intimating that the people of a state may not reserve the supervisory control as to general state legislation afforded by the initiative and referendum, without violating this provision of the federal Constitution. That they may do so has been decided by the Supreme Court of Oregon in the case of Kadderly v. Portland, 44 Or. 118, 74 Pac. 710, 75 Pac. 222, which appears to be the only case in which that question has been directly presented. See, also, Hopkins v. City of Duluth, 81 Minn. 189, 83 N. W. 536. However this may be, it is clear that the direct participation of the electors of subdivisions of a state in legislation as to local affairs was never intended to be prohibited by the framers of the federal Constitution, or the states adopting the same, and that such power has been exercised by them, where not inconsistent with provisions of their state Constitution, in innumerable instances, from the institution of our government to the present day, without interference of any kind on the part of the federal government.

As is universally recognized by courts and writers on constitutional law, it must be assumed that there was nothing in any of the forms of government prevailing in the various states at the time of the adoption of the Constitution that was violative of the provisions under discussion. Discussing this question, and speaking of the forms of government then existing in the various states, the Supreme Court of the United States said, in Minor v. Happersett, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 162, 175, 176, 22 L. Ed. 627: "These governments the Constitution did not change. They were accepted precisely as they were, and it is therefore to be presumed that they were such as it was the duty of the states to provide. Thus we have unmistakable evidence of what was republican in form within the meaning of that term as employed in the Constitution." It is unnecessary to here do more than to refer to the widely known and well-recognized form of local government that prevailed in several of the states at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, known as the 'New England town government,' under which all the inhabitants in town meeting directly exercised such legislative power as was essential to the conduct of local affairs. No difference material to the objection under discussion is to be found in the fact that they did this in public meeting, rather than by secret ballot at the polls, as under the provision before us. The objection here made is that, under the republican form of government guarantied by the federal Constitution, such power cannot be directly exercised by the people, and, so far as that objection is concerned, if the people may legislate directly in town meeting, they may do so by their votes at the polls. The constitutional provision was framed and adopted with full knowledge of this system of local government that then obtained in four of the states, and that system was continued under the Constitution, without any question as to its validity. It is still to be found, not only in several of the New England states, but also in other states (see 1 Bryce, Am. Com. pp. 594, 601, 605; 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 258). and we are not aware that any suggestion has ever been made that this form of local government is prohibited by the federal Constitution. Other instances practically without number of the direct exercise of legislative power by the people in local affairs authorized by the state might be noted. As suggested in the briefs, the forms of local government in this country have been most varied, running all the way from the pure democracy of the town meeting form of government up to such absolute control by the Legislature of the state as deprived communities of any voice in their local affairs. It is apparent from this condition of affairs, existing continuously from the moment of the adoption of the Constitution, that, if there is anything therein inconsistent with a republican form of government, within the meaning of these words as used in the federal Constitution, the constitutional guaranty was intended to apply only to the form of government for the state at large, and not at all to the local government prescribed by the state for its municipalities and other subdivisions.

Whatever may be said as to the former, the latter is undoubtedly true. It is clearly a question of local policy with each state what shall be its various political subdivisions for purposes of internal government, and what shall be the extent and character of the powers of those subdivisions and the manner of their exercise. The power of a state in such matters is absolute. See Claiborne v. Brooks, 111 U. S. 400, 4 Sup. Ct. 489, 28 L. Ed. 470; Forsyth v. Hammond, 166 U. S. 506, 17 Sup. Ct. 665, 41 L. Ed. 1095. Where the authority of the electors of a municipality or other subdivision of a state to directly legislate in a matter of purely local concern is denied by a state court, it is denied solely upon the ground that the state Constitution or statutes forbid the exercise of such power, as in Elliott v. Detroit, 121 Mich. 611, 84 N. W. 820, and many cases cited by petitioner. See Cooley's Const. Lim. (7th Ed.) pp. 165, 166; Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 44, and note. The extent to which the people of a municipality shall be allowed to directly participate in the governmental function of legislating therefor in local or municipal affairs is, therefore, purely a question of state policy, in the determination of which the state is not restricted by any provision of the federal Constitution. In thus speaking of the state, we mean, not the Legislature of the state, or the executive, or the judiciary, but the entire body of the people, who together form the body politic, known as the "state." Panhallow v. Doane's Adm'r, 3 Dall. (Pa.) 93, Fed. Cas. No. 10,925, 1 L. Ed. 507; Brown v. State, 5 Colo. 499.

Coming to a consideration of the contention that the initiative amendment is in violation of the Constitution and laws of this state: There is, of course, no doubt as to the possession by the municipality of Los Angeles of legislative power. By section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution, providing that "any county, city, town or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws," the people of the state "have made a direct constitutional grant of the police power of the state to every municipal corporation for local purposes." Denninger v. Recorder's Court, 145 Cal. 629, 631, 79 Pac. 360; Ex parte Lacey, 108 Cal. 326, 328, 41 Pac. 411, 38 L. R. A. 640, 49 Am. St. Rep. 93; Ex parte Roach, 104 Cal. 272, 276, 37 Pac. 1044. As to such local legislation as may not be included in this constitutional grant, if it be assumed that the legislative power of the municipality operating under a freeholders' charter finds its source in any grant from the Legislature, there is in this no forbidden delegation of the lawmaking power vested in the Legislature. As said in Stoutenburgh v. Hennick, 129 U. S. 141, 9 Sup. Ct. 256, 32 L. Ed. 637: "While the rule is fundamental that the power to make laws cannot be delegated, the creation of municipalities exercising local self-government has never been held to trench upon that rule. Such legislation is not regarded as a transfer of general legislative power, but rather as the grant of the authority to prescribe local regulations, according to immemorial practice, subject, of course, to the interposition of the superior in cases of necessity." While the power so granted by a Legislature may be called a delegated power, "the right to so delegate all powers of a municipal nature is expressly given to the Legislature, when, by the Constitution, it is authorized and directed to provide for municipal corporations." Hellman v. Shoulters, 114 Cal. 136, 149, 44 Pac. 915, 45 Pac. 1057. So that, if we assume for the purposes of argument that the Legislature, in approving by concurrent resolution a charter framed by any city containing more than 3,500 inhabitants under section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution, delegates to the city any local legislative power, it is a delegation of legislative power that is expressly authorized by the Constitution.

We do not understand that there is any claim that the city of Los Angeles, and by the term "city" we mean the municipal corporation, and not any officer or officers thereof, is not vested with legislative power, both under the constitutional provision quoted above, and the freeholders' charter framed by the Constitution and approved by the Legislature, except in so far as it is urged that the word "city," in such constitutional grant to "any county, city, town," etc., must be construed as meaning some board or officers of the city. Manifestly, there is nothing in this claim. The grant to the "city" is a grant to the municipal corporation itself (Denninger v. Recorder's Court, supra), the artificial body created by the laws made up of the people of the territory comprising the same organized as a body politic, and there is no authority that would warrant a different construction. The common council or other local legislative body and other charter officers do not constitute the "city," but are merely agents or officers of the city. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. [3d Ed.] §§ 21, 40. Legislative power has been properly granted or delegated by the state to the city. We are not here concerned, then, with the doctrine asserted by counsel for petitioner to the effect that the power to make laws conferred by the Constitution on the Legislature cannot be delegated by the Legislature. The question here is simply whether it is competent, under our Constitution and laws, to vest in the electors of a city, by the charter thereof, such right to directly participate in the exercise of the legislative power granted by the state to the city, as is given them by the initiative amendment of the Los Angeles charter.

It will not be questioned that the charter of the city, whether it be the special act of incorporation authorized by our old Constitution, the general municipal corporation act enacted under our existing Constitution, or the freeholders' charter, is the appropriate place in which to provide where the legislative power of the city shall be vested, and the manner of its exercise. One of the most important and essential offices of the charter is and always has been appropriate provision in this behalf. See 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 39. Our Constitution declares that, when a freeholders' charter is finally approved by the Legislature, it "shall become the organic law of the city" (section 8, art. 11), and such a charter has elsewhere been aptly termed the local constitution of the city. As such, provisions as to the distribution of the governmental functions, and the manner of their exercise, obtain, so far as the same are consistent with the Constitution of the state. It has already been held by this court that the manner of enacting municipal ordinances and resolutions is unquestionably a municipal affair (Morton v. Broderick, 118 Cal. 474, 487, 50 Pac. 644), and therefore, under section 6 of article 11 of the Constitution as amended in 1896, the provisions of a city charter in regard thereto are paramount to general laws of the state. When by section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution, every city containing more than 3,500 inhabitants is authorized to frame "a charter for its own government," which, when ratified by the electors and approved by the Legislature by concurrent resolution, "shall become the organic law" of the city, the city is authorized to make, subject to the approval of the Legislature, such provision as it deems best for the exercise of the legislative power confided to it by the state: the only limitation being that the provision made must not be a violation of our state Constitution. The provision so made may, of course, be changed by amendments to the charter, framed, ratified, and approved in the manner provided for the adoption of the original charter (section 8, art. 11, of the Constitution).

Wherein does the method prescribed by the initiative amendment violate any provision of our Constitution? The specific constitutional provisions pointed out by petitioner as violated by this amendment are two, namely, sections 11 and 13 of article 11. Section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution has already been quoted. It is the section granting the police power of the state to any municipal corporation of the state for local purposes. One of petitioner's points appears to be that this is a direct grant to the council or other legislative body of the city or town and that the direct exercise of legislative power by the people is inconsistent therewith. As already stated, the grant is to the municipality itself, the people in their organized condition as a body politic, and neither this nor any other provision of the Constitution intimates as to how this power is to be exercised. That is left to be provided for in the "organic law" of the city, and the power is vested just where it is placed by the charter, and is to be exercised as therein provided. It is solely by virtue of the provisions to that effect in the city charter of Los Angeles that the council of that city may exercise any of the legislative power of this city whatever (Odd Fellows' Cem. Ass'n v. City & Co. of San Francisco, 140 Cal. 226, 230, 73 Pac. 987), and it may exercise only such power in that regard as it is authorized to do by the charter.

The Odd Fellows' Cemetery Case, cited above, is cited by petitioner as authority for the proposition that the constitutional grant is to the council; this court having said therein: "All the legislative power of the city is by the charter vested in the board of supervisors. Article 11, c. 1, § 1. By virtue of this clause the constitutional grant of the police powers of the state to the city goes directly to and vests in the board, which thereby becomes possessed of the right to exercise within the city limits the entire police power of the state, subject only to the control of general laws." It is here pointed out that the San Francisco charter contained provisions relative to the initiative substantially similar to those of the Los Angeles charter, and it is claimed that the decision must be taken as declaring that all of the legislative power of the city was in the board of supervisors, notwithstanding the presence of other provisions in the charter giving the electors certain powers in that regard. There was no question in that case as to the validity of the initiative provision of the charter, and what was said therein was said solely with reference to the right of a city to exercise within its limits the entire police power of the state, notwithstanding a certain provision of the charter which was claimed to limit the power. It was held that nothing contained in the charter could affect the grant made by the Constitution, and that the city, under such constitutional grant, had the right to exercise the whole police power of the state so far as local regulations were concerned, subject only to the control of general laws. What was said in the case must be read in the light afforded by a knowledge of the precise question under consideration, and, so read, the quotation above set forth is direct authority upon the proposition that the legislative power of a city operating under a freeholders' charter is just where it is placed by the charter. The effect of the provisions of the Los Angeles charter, as amended, is to give the legislative power vested in the city to the council and mayor, subject to such control by the electors as is given them by the initiative and referendum provisions. The reserved power of the electors to directly enact such ordinances as the council refuses to enact, as well as their power to effectually veto ordinances adopted by the council, is made paramount to the power of the council and mayor, the council being without power to repeal or amend an ordinance so enacted, and the objection that under the initiative we have "two equal, co-ordinate lawmaking bodies, the one absolutely independent of the other," is therefore without foundation. This feature renders the decision in Ex parte Anderson, 134 Cal. 69, 66 Pac. 194, 86 Am. St. Rep. 236, a decision strongly relied on by petitioner, inapplicable; for the only thing decided therein was that there could not be, under our system of government, two equal, co-ordinate lawmaking powers, "each existing without any restrictions the one upon the other."

It is urged that the effect of the provisions of the initiative amendment is to interfere with and suspend the exercise of the police power granted by section 11 of article 11, in that as an ordinance adopted by the people is repealable or amendable only by the people, and as special elections on such questions can be held only at intervals of six months, and the council itself can submit propositions for repeal or amendment only at a general municipal election, the making of necessary changes in the local laws of a police nature may be unreasonably delayed. The amendment does not purport to restrict or suspend in the slightest degree the exercise of the police power vested in the municipality, having reference solely to the manner of its exercise. Any ordinance enacted by the people may at any time be repealed or amended in the manner provided in the charter. The rule against the suspension of the police power invoked by petitioner means no more than that the power is a continuous one, reposed somewhere, and one that cannot be barred or suspended by contract or irrepealable law, and never has been held to mean that a law enacted in the exercise of the police power must ever be open to instantaneous alteration. There are provisions in the nature of police regulations in the state Constitution itself, and these cannot be repealed or amended, except by the slow process of amending the Constitution. The Legislature of the state at each of its biennial sessions enacts numerous laws in the exercise of the police power of the state, which laws can be repealed or amended only at a succeeding biennial session, except in the rare case of an extra session. The freeholders' charters of the various cities of the state contain many provisions which are essentially police regulations, and these can be amended or repealed only with the assent of the majority of the electors at an election, which elections can be held only at intervals of two years (Harrison v. Roberts, 145 Cal. 173, 179, 78 Pac. 537), and with the approval of the state Legislature. So far as the objection here made is applicable to provisions in city charters, it was overruled in People v. Williamson, 135 Cal. 415, 417, 418, 67 Pac. 504. So far as this objection is concerned, there can be no distinction in principle between the case of a provision in the nature of a police regulation in the city charter and one to the same effect in an ordinance. In each case it is ever amendable or repealable in the manner provided by the organic law—in the one case, the organic law of the state; in the other, the organic law of the city. This, as said in People v. Williamson, supra, must satisfy the courts. The same objection might, as is suggested, be made with the same degree of force to the numerous provisions in freeholders' charters and acts of the Legislature relative to municipal corporations which prohibit the passage of an ordinance on the day of its introduction or prevent its taking effect until after publication. The claim that the power to make police regulations upon a subject covered by an ordinance adopted by the people is taken from the city by the adoption of such ordinance finds its source in the erroneous assumption, which is the basis of many of petitioner's arguments, that the city council is the "city."

It is urged that the initiative and referendum amendments are hopelessly in conflict, in that under the referendum amendment certain emergency ordinances take effect immediately on passage, and need not be referred to the people, while there is no exception declared in the initiative amendment. There is no claim that any emergency ordinance passed by the council is in conflict with the ordinance here involved, and it is unnecessary here to determine what the situation would be in such event. Obviously, however, the law would be construed either as making the emergency ordinance paramount, and precluding the application of the initiative to the subject-matter thereof, or as making the initiative ordinance paramount. We cannot see any legal objection to either method, or any unconstitutional interference by either with the exercise of the police power.

It is suggested that the proper exercise of the police power may be prevented by reason of the absence of sufficient funds to pay the expense of an election necessary to the adoption of an ordinance which repeals or amends some prior ordinance adopted by the people; section 18, art. 11, providing that no county, city, etc., "shall incur any indebtedness or liability in any manner or for any purpose exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors," etc. The same argument might with as much force be made as to a provision of law requiring the publication of an ordinance before its taking effect, or as to any requirement in connection therewith involving expense, however small. Surely a method adopted for the passage of ordinances cannot be declared unconstitutional upon any such ground. It is to be presumed that the municipality will provide the funds necessary for the administration of its government. If there be any offender against the rule invoked by petitioner in this connection, it is the constitutional provision cited by him.

The contention is made that the initiative amendment is in violation of section 13, art. 11, of the Constitution, which is as follows: "The Legislature shall not delegate to any special commission, private corporation, company, association, or individual, any power to make, control, appropriate, supervise, or in any way interfere with any county, city, town, or municipal improvement, money, property, or effects, whether held in trust or otherwise, or to levy taxes or assessments or perform any municipal functions whatever." So far, at least, as the prohibition concerning the delegation by the Legislature to any "special commission" to perform any municipal function is concerned, it is clear that the whole object of the provision was to prevent the state Legislature from interfering with local governments by the appointment of its own special commissions for the control of purely local matters. It was said in People v. Hoge, 55 Cal. 612, 618, that it was the manifest intent of this and other sections "to emancipate municipal governments from the authority and control formerly exercised over them by the Legislature." See 2 Deb. & Pro. Con. Convention, p. 1066. Certainly there is nothing in the language used which could be held to prohibit provision, in the organic act framed for the government of a city, for such commissions, special or otherwise, to be appointed or elected by the city, as might be deemed necessary for the proper conduct of municipal affairs.

Under no circumstances, however, could the aggregate body of qualified electors of a municipality be held to be a "special commission," within the meaning of the constitutional provision. Any claim to the contrary appears so frivolous as not to merit discussion. Nor is there anything in the claim that the electors signing the petition for the submission of a proposed ordinance to the vote of the electors either constitute a "special commission" or perform any "municipal function." Certainly they perform no act of legislation. Whatever "municipal function" is performed in the matter of the adoption of an ordinance under the initiative is performed either by the council, when it enacts the ordinance without submitting it to the electors, or by the electors when it is submitted by the council. As in People v. Ontario (Cal. Sup.) 84 Pac. 205, 207, the petition of the electors is merely an initiatory step, accomplishing no more than to compel a consideration of a proposed matter by those qualified to act and perform municipal functions, and does not itself constitute the performance of a "municipal function" in any proper sense of those words. Aside from the prohibition as to "special commissions" contained in this section of the Constitution, the utmost effect of the section is to prohibit the granting to private agencies, as distinguished from public agencies, the power to control in any degree the property or improvement work of a local subdivision or municipality, or to levy local taxes or assessments, or to perform any municipal function. Assuming the applicability of this provision to a freeholders' charter, as it is claimed was held in Yarnell v. Los Angeles, 87 Cal. 603, 25 Pac. 767, it is manifest that the electors of a municipality, in their capacity as such, do not constitute any such prohibited private agency.

It is earnestly urged that the initiative provision of the charter is inconsistent with the form of municipal government prescribed by title 3 of part 4 of the Political Code (section 4354 et seq). These sections constituted part of the original Code, and provided a general form of government for cities. By section 4355 the legislative power of the city was vested in a common council. It is said that this is a general law, with which the provisions of the freeholders' charter must be consistent. As to municipal affairs, it is sufficient if the provisions of a charter are consistent with the Constitution. As we have shown, the method of exercising the legislative power of a municipality is a municipal affair. But, were it otherwise, this provision of the Political Code could not be held to constitute one of the general laws with which charter provisions must be consistent. The old Political Code sections invoked were intended merely as a plan under which cities might be organized and governed, if so desired, and this was the sole object of their enactment. Ex parte Simpson, 47 Cal. 127. Except where specially made part of a city's charter by reference (Ex parte Mauch, 134 Cal. 501, 66 Pac. 183; Buck v. Eureka, 109 Cal. 504, 42 Pac. 243, 30 L. R. A. 409), they have not been held applicable. The sections of the title relative to refunding a bonded indebtedness, held applicable to Los Angeles in Los Angeles v. Teed, 112 Cal. 319, 44 Pac. 580, were part of a much more recent act of the Legislature, intended, as this court held, to have general application. The old sections of the Political Code as to the form of government of cities stand, then, in precisely the same class of laws as does the municipal corporation act of 1883, under which towns or cities may now organize at their option. The constitutional grant to a city to frame its own charter, which, when ratified and approved, shall become its organic law, necessarily assumes that the form of government to be provided therein need not be the same as that provided by the Legislature for municipalities generally, and it was for the very purpose of enabling cities to have such a local organization as their local needs demanded that the authority to frame a charter for its own government was given to every city of over 3,500 inhabitants. That such a charter was not subject to the municipal corporation act, even prior to the "municipal affairs" amendment of 1896, is too plain for discussion; but, if authority be needed, it is to be found in People v. Bagley, 85 Cal. 343, 24 Pac. 716.

Much stress is placed by petitioner upon the fact that in section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution the words "legislative authority" are used in designating the ordinary legislative body of the city. The use of these words is taken as indicating the intent of the Constitution that no legislative power could be exercised, except by some representative body, such as a council, etc., which should have supreme authority as to all matters of legislative nature. We see no force in this contention. It was doubtless recognized by the framers of the Constitution, as it must be by every one, that in the conduct of municipal affairs it would be impracticable to do without the presence of a local legislative body of some kind, which should possess such powers in that behalf as might be granted to it, and that such a body would exist in every municipality. The words "legislative authority," as here used, have no greater significance than such words as "common council or other legislative body" would have had. They were simply intended to designate the particular body, which it was recognized would exist under some name or other in every municipality, as the proper official agency to submit propositions for amendments to charters, and were not intended to define the powers of that body, or place it in a position where it would be beyond restrictions by the organic act of the city. Doubtless it is this body that is termed the "governing body" in section 1, art. 14, of the Constitution, relative to the fixing of water rates, and it may be that it is the "corporate authority" referred to in section 12, art. 9, of the Constitution, relative to the assessment and collection of local taxes. Bd. of Education v. Bd. of Trustees, 129 Cal. 599, 62 Pac. 173. But the use of these various terms in various constitutional provisions means no more than that the official body thereby referred to is to have the power or perform the duty specified.

That the electors of a duly organized local subdivision of this state may be authorized to directly participate in the exercise of the legislative power of such subdivision cannot, we think, be seriously disputed. There is certainly no provision of our Constitution which expressly or by reasonable inference prohibits it. There is no decision of this court which holds that it is forbidden. What was said in the majority opinion in Ex parte Wall, 48 Cal. 279, 321, 17 Am. Rep. 425, upon this point, was pure dictum. This was expressly pointed out by the later cases of People v. Nally, 49 Cal. 478, 480, and People v. McFadden, 81 Cal. 489, 22 Pac. 851, 15 Am. St. Rep. 66, in the latter of which cases it was stated that the real question in Ex parte Wall was "whether the Legislature could authorize the people of a given locality to suspend the operation, within such locality, of a general penal statute of the state." Page 493 of 81 Cal., page 852 of 22 Pac. In the case of People v. Ontario (Cal. Sup.) 84 Pac. 205, which is the latest case bearing on the question, it was held that the power to perform the legislative act of prescribing the boundaries of territory to be annexed to a municipality, which power, under our Constitution, could not be performed by the Legislature itself, but must by it be reposed elsewhere, could be given by the Legislature to the electors of the locality to be affected. We there said: "There is no constitutional provision that intimates that this power can be conferred only on some legislative body, and not upon the electors of the locality to be affected; and, in the absence of such a provision, the question as to whether it shall be given to the one or the other is purely one of policy, upon which the determination of the Legislature is conclusive." This appears to be the general rule as to legislative power which a Legislature is authorized to grant for local purposes to local subdivisions, and is expressly recognized by some of the cases cited by petitioner. For instance, in Clarke v. City of Rochester, 28 N. Y. 605, 634, it is said: "But while general statutes must be enacted by the Legislature, it is plain the power to make local regulations, having the force of law in limited localities, may be committed to other bodies representing the people in their local divisions, or to the people of those districts themselves. Our whole system of local government in cities, villages, counties, and towns depends upon that distinction." See, also, People v. Reynolds, 5 Gilman (Ill.) 1, approvingly quoted in Upham v. Supervisors, 8 Cal. 383. In the recent case of Hindman v. Boyd, 84 Pac. 609, 612, the Supreme Court of Washington upheld the right of the people of the city of Spokane to reserve to themselves, in their charter, the power to compel the submission to the electors of every proposed ordinance granting certain kinds of franchises, such submission to be had whenever a certain percentage of the electors petitioned therefor. It was conceded that the granting of a franchise was a legislative act. The court said: "It is clear, therefore, that the powers of the mayor and council are such as are granted by the charter. If the people choose to provide in their charter that the power to grant franchises of a given character shall not be given wholly to the mayor and council, but shall be reserved to themselves, can it be said that the granting thereof is such a legislative act as cannot be exercised by the people themselves? The power to make a charter is in a sense a legislative one. It is well known that charters so made often contain much that is legislative in its nature, such as the adoption of a complete scheme for making special assessments and other similar elaborate and detailed provisions."

We know of no state in which the right of the Legislature to grant to the people of a local subdivision the power to directly discharge legislative functions in local matters is denied, except where the Constitution of such state may reasonably be construed as forbidding such a grant, as may be held to have been the case in Shumway v. Bennett, 29 Mich. 451, 18 Am. Rep. 107, a case relied on by petitioner. Our own Constitution certainly cannot be so construed. We entirely concur in what was said by the Chief Justice in Ex parte Anderson, 134 Cal. 69, 75, 66 Pac. 194, 86 Am. St. Rep. 236, where, speaking of the constitutional grant to every county, city, etc., embraced in section 11 of article 11, he said: "This grant to the counties of the power of local legislation is, of course, a grant to the people of the respective counties. How they are to exercise the power, whether in their primary capacity by voting at the polls, as in the case of the adoption of a state Constitution or of amendments thereto, or by their chosen representatives in boards of supervisors, is purely a matter of legislative regulation; and I cannot see how it is possible, upon any recognized principle of constitutional construction, to deny to the Legislature the power to confer upon the qualified voters of the respective counties the right to make local laws which will be valid and effective within their territorial limits." This question, as already stated, was not determined by the majority of the court in that case. If the Legislature, in providing by general statute for the organization and government of municipalities, can grant such power to the people thereof, there can, of course, be no question that such power may be vested in the people of a city by the provisions of a freeholders' charter framed by the city, ratified by the electors thereof, and approved by the Legislature, under section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution.

Much that is said in the briefs of counsel assailing the initiative amendment goes rather to the question of the policy of investing the electors of a municipality with such general power of local legislation than to the question of the validity of the law accomplishing this result. There may reasonably be differences of opinion as to whether the method devised will prove beneficial or not. However, the extent to which the electors of a municipality shall be permitted to directly discharge legislative functions in local affairs is purely a question of policy, with which the courts have nothing to do. It is our duty to uphold the charter provision, if it be consistent with our federal and state Constitutions, and that it is we have no doubt.

The initiative amendment was one of thirteen amendments to the Los Angeles charter ratified by the electors of Los Angeles at a general municipal election. They were approved by the Legislature as a whole by a single concurrent resolution, the title to which simply stated that it was a resolution "approving thirteen certain amendments to the charter of Los Angeles," etc. There is nothing in the point made by amici curiæ that this was a violation of the requirement that every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title. The method pursued was strictly in accord with the provisions of section 8, art. 11, of the Constitution, relative to the approval of charters and amendments thereto, as we read the same.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

McFARLAND, J. (dissenting). I dissent; but I will not undertake to do more just now than to briefly outline the skeleton of the argument which leads me to the conclusion that the "initiative," as contained in the Los Angeles charter, is unconstitutional and void. I will not stop to discuss the forcible contention by counsel for the petitioner that the provision of the charter under consideration is violative of certain parts of our state Constitution, because, in my opinion, the provision is violative of that part of the Constitution of the United States which declares that "Congress shall guarantee to each state a republican form of government." It is, in my judgment, a narrow and incorrect view of that provision of the United States Constitution to hold that it concerns Congress alone, and that a state may violate it at its will so long as Congress does not choose to interfere. The provision declares a great constitutional principle, and must be observed by all coming within its purview. The correct construction is that given by the United States Supreme Court in Minor v. Happersett, 21 Wall. 162, 22 L. Ed. 627, where it is said: "The guaranty necessarily imposes a duty on the part of the states themselves to provide such a government." Therefore every act done by a state which is inconsistent with and violative of the theory of a republican form of government is invalid.

Now, what is a republican form of government? These words are not defined in the Constitution itself. Like other words used in that instrument, we must look for their meaning to the general and usual sources and authorities which determine the signification of English words and phrases. And an examination of those sources leaves no doubt as to the meaning of the phrase in question. It is defined in the Federalist, in legislative debates, in judicial opinions, in text-books of the law, and in the standard dictionaries of the language. I shall not quote from these authorities. The meaning of the phrase as derived from these sources is correctly and concisely stated in Webster's Dictionary as follows: "A state in which the sovereign power resides in the whole body of the people and is exercised by representatives selected by them." A republican form of government is one in which the people select those who are to make their laws, and is radically different from a pure democracy in which the people collectively and as their own original act make the laws. And whenever, under our American system of representative government, a state undertakes to destroy the representative system, and install in its place, as the lawmaking power, the people—either acting in a mass-meeting, or enacting laws by ballot—in their original capacity, it undertakes to do an unconstitutional thing, which is void. And it is to be observed that the initiative provision of the Los Angeles charter is not confined to merely reserving to the people the right to approve of measures which refer to one or two special subjects. It gives them full affirmative sway over the whole matter of municipal legislation. They may propose and pass by vote "any ordinance."

It is said that, although the state might not have power to take the lawmaking power of the state from a representative body and confer it upon the whole people, still it may do so as to part of the state organized as a municipality. But what the state cannot do itself, it cannot authorize a municipality to do. The act is one which the state cannot do at all, and therefore cannot make such act valid in any part of its territory. Moreover, the state cannot do indirectly that which it cannot do directly; and, considering the wide power of legislation which the people of the state have already given the municipalities, the latter are exercising lawmaking power almost equal to that of the state. The initiative in the Los Angeles charter embraces a large power of general legislation which usually belongs to the state. Already a municipality is independent of the state as to all legislation relating to municipal affairs; and we all know how difficult it is to determine how far legislation as to "municipal affairs" runs into general legislation. Moreover, considering the generosity with which the people of the state have given away their powers to municipalities, there is no telling how much further they may go in that direction. If this disposition continues, the time may come when California will be not much more than a shadow of a name—used to designate the territory within which exist certain almost free cities and independent municipalities. Why should the people of the state, with their present love of municipal power, restrict the legislative power of a municipality to "municipal affairs"? Why should not each municipality have its own substantive law in all ordinary matters of legislation, no matter what the law on any subject might be in other municipalities, or in other parts of the state? And the initiative would then cover substantially all the legislation in the state.

Of course, the expediency or wisdom of the law under consideration is not a judicial question; but it is well to remember that in a government republican in form representative legislators are persons who are presumed to have, at least, some special qualifications for legislative work. They are chosen some time before they are called to act. They meet and consult with each other. They are not too much hurried in their action, and take full time for consideration of proposed legislation. In a pure democracy, which is represented in part by the initiative, whenever demagogues, pseudo reformers, or promoters of discontent are able to "fool" the people for only a short "part of the time" by a mischievous proposition, they can by a hurried special election have the proposition voted into a law before there is an opportunity for a sober second thought. It admits the very evils which the representative form of government was intended to guard against. I cannot refrain from expressing regret at the apparent readiness of many of the people of this state to abandon prominent features of our American system of government, the wisest and best system ever yet devised and put into successful operation.

PEOPLE'S HOME SAV. BANK v. STADTMULLER. (S. F. 3,453.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1906. On Rehearing, Dec. 28, 1906.)

CORPORATIONS — STOCKHOLDERS — WHO ARE —DISTRIBUTEE OF STOCKHOLDER'S ESTATE.

A distributee of certain shares of corporate stock belonging to the estate of a decedent was not a stockholder of the corporation, as between himself and it, where section 324 of the Civil Code, requiring the transfer to be entered upon the books of the corporation, was not complied with.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, § 479.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Kerrigan, Judge.

Action by the People's Home Savings Bank against Anna Stadtmuller. From a judgment sustaining defendant's demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. S. Stratton and Stratton & Kaufman, for appellant. T. C. Coogan, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal from a judgment given after demurrer sustained to the fourth amended complaint of plaintiff. The complaint charged that one F. D. Stadtmuller subscribed for and received from plaintiff 100 shares of its capital stock, of the par value of $100 each, and that he continued to be the owner of this stock until the defendant in turn became the owner thereof; that Stadtmuller had paid in $33⅓ per share upon his stock, and was liable to the plaintiff for the sum of $66⅔ on each share whenever such unpaid portion should be called in and demand made therefor. The death of Stadtmuller and the proceedings in the administration of his estate are set forth, and it is averred that by these proceedings "the said 100 shares of the capital stock of the plaintiff were duly distributed unto the said defendant, * * * and that said defendant accepted said certificate, and ever since has and still and now does retain the same. Plaintiff alleges that ever since said 28th day of December, 1894, the defendant has been and still and now is the owner and holder of said 100 shares of said plaintiff's capital stock." It is then alleged that 12 days after the distribution to defendant—upon January 12, 1895—plaintiff became insolvent, and ever since that date has been insolvent, and that on the 30th day of September, 1895, "and after said defendant had accepted and received and became the owner of said certificate and said shares represented thereby as aforesaid," plaintiff duly called in all of its unpaid capital stock. Defendant has refused to pay $66⅔ on each of the shares so held by her, and judgment is prayed against her for that amount. It is admitted that no claim was ever presented against the estate of F. D. Stadtmuller upon this contingent liability, and it is also admitted that this defendant did not cause the stock to be transferred to her name upon the books of the corporation, nor do any act equivalent thereto, and that she does not appear as a stockholder upon the books of the company.

It is contended, however, by the appellant, that the acceptance as owner of the stock, under the circumstances alleged in the complaint, is sufficient to establish a privity between herself and the corporation, so that she becomes a stockholder thereof, subject to all the rights, duties, and liabilities of such stockholder. Respondent, in support of the judgment, contends that, as no claim was presented upon this contingent liability against the estate of Stadtmuller, this liability was barred forever (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1493, 1500; Verdier v. Roach, 96 Cal. 467, 31 Pac. 554), and that the distributee thus took the stock with the right of the corporation to call in the unpaid purchase price likewise barred forever; otherwise, it must be said that by the mere decree of distribution, which does no more than to designate the persons to whom the title of the estate belongs, and to stand for all the world as a muniment of such title, a liability was created against the distributee which had been forever barred against the estate. Interesting as a consideration of this question would prove, its determination becomes unnecessary, because the second proposition which respondent urges and argues is conclusive in favor of the judgment. That proposition is that upon the face of the complaint the defendant is not a stockholder, within the meaning of the law which renders a stockholder liable for the unpaid balance of the subscription price of stock.

Section 324 of the Civil Code, with other matters, declares that shares of stock, except as thereinafter provided, are personal property, and may be transferred by indorsement by the signature of the proprietor, his agent, attorney, or legal representative, and the delivery of the certificate; but such transfer is not valid, except as to the parties thereto, until the same is so entered upon the books of the corporation as to show the names of the parties, by whom and to whom transferred, the number of certificate, the number or designation of the shares, and the date of transfer. In People v. Robinson, 64 Cal. 373, 1 Pac. 156, this court, in construing the statute of 1853, which was identical as to the language under consideration with that of section 324 of the Civil Code, declared that this clause meant that a transfer of stock, until entered upon the books of the company, conferred on the transferee no rights as between himself and the company, no right beyond that of having such transfer properly entered, and that, whatever right the purchaser of a certificate of stock might acquire as between himself and his vendor, "it is well settled that as between himself and the corporation he acquires only an equitable title, and until he secures a transfer on the books of the company he is not a stockholder, and has no claim to act as such." As to a corporation organized under the Code provision as it now stands, this court said in Visalia Railroad v. Hyde, 110 Cal. 632, 43 Pac. 10, 52 Am. St. Rep. 136: "For the purpose of ascertaining those who are liable to it for the amount of the assessment, the corporation can look only to the list of stockholders as their names are registered upon its books." And, indeed, the rule is universal in states whose laws contain a provision such as that of ours, embodied in section 324 of the Civil Code, that the registered owner of stock is alone liable to the corporation until the transferee causes the transfer to be entered upon the books of the corporation, or in some other way, equivalent in the eye of the law, establishes the relationship of stockholder between himself and the company, and is thus accepted by the company as a substituted stockholder for the original holder. It is true, of course, that as between the transferror and the transferee, the transferror, who has been made to pay a call or an assessment upon the stock, has a right of recovery over against his transferee. But the corporation must proceed against the transferror, because he stands upon its books as a stockholder, and has no right of action against the transferee, because, as between him and the corporation, the contractual relation of stockholder has not been created. Thus says Cook on Corporations (4th Ed.) § 258: "Until a transfer is recorded in the transfer book of the corporation, the transferee, not being duly recognized as a stockholder, is not chargeable either with corporate debts or unpaid balances of the subscription. He is bound to protect and indemnify his transferror, but he is not liable to the corporation or corporate creditors or other stockholders." See, also, Clark & Marshall, Private Corp. § 588; Beach, Private Corp. § 130; Bates v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 479, 30 Pac. 605, 16 L. R. A. 745, 29 Am. St. Rep. 133.

Of course, the cases are numerous which hold that the provisions in the by-laws of a corporation as to the forms and procedure for effecting a transfer are provisions for the benefit of the corporation, so that errors or irregularities in complying with such forms and procedures will not avail a person in his attempt to deny his stockholder's liability. Likewise the cases are numerous where a party has been refused to be heard in his denial that he was a stockholder, upon the familiar grounds of equitable estoppel, as where he has accepted and receipted for dividends, has voted at stockholders' meetings and in various other ways has exercised a stockholder's privileges. None of these cases, however, go to the proposition that, where the law requires a transfer of stock before the relationship of corporation and stockholder exists, such relationship may be forced on one who has done no act to establish such privity. The mere fact that the distributee or legatee of an estate takes the paper certificate, and does nothing more, cannot be said to be a substantial compliance with the provisions of section 324 of our Civil Code. For, if so, those provisions are absolutely meaningless, and every unrecorded transfer of stock establishes against the transferee the relation of stockholder. Of course, the right of the corporation to proceed and sell the stock in case of delinquency is an entirely separate and distinct right, and one not here under consideration. This action deals entirely with the personal liability of the defendant because of her ownership of the stock under the circumstances above set forth. As to this we have seen that no such liability exists, and the judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.

On Rehearing.

In Bank. Response to petition for a rehearing.

BEATTY, C. J. Counsel for appellant in their petition for rehearing urge very strongly the argument that, as the complaint contains an allegation "that ever since the 28th of December, 1894, the defendant became and now is the owner and holder of said 100 shares of said plaintiff's capital stock," the fact so alleged is confessed by the demurrer, and therefore establishes defendant's liability. But this allegation is merely a conclusion of the pleader from the facts specifically alleged, viz. that the stock was distributed to the defendant (16 days prior to the confessed insolvency of the plaintiff), and that she "accepted" it. It is like an allegation of ownership of the demanded premises in ejectment, coupled with an attempted deraignment of title which shows that the title is defective. Here the demurrer is special, on the ground of uncertainty and ambiguity, in that it cannot be determined what is meant by "accepted," which may mean no more than that the defendant received the certificate of stock from the executor and retained it in her possession. In such a case I am satisfied she did not make herself personally liable for the unpaid portion of the subscription price of stock.

GREGG v. CAREY et al. (Civ. 266.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 16, 1906. Rehearing Denied Nov. 14, 1906.)

1. Brokers—Sale of Realty—Authority in Writing—Ratification of Agency.

A contract of sale of realty was made by one having no title nor authority in writing to execute such an instrument. The attorney for the purchaser was informed by the equitable owner that such person was authorized to sell, and was directed to see him in reference to the matter. Held that, under Civ. Code, §§ 2300, 2317, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3, such statement was a ratification of the agent's authority, which estopped the equitable owner from denying it.

2. Specific Performance—Contract for Sale of Realty—Inability to Perform.

Where defendants are unable to make the deed called for in a contract of sale, plaintiff cannot have complete specific performance of the contract of sale.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Specific Performance, §§ 30-32.]

3. Same—Damages Instead of Specific Performance—Amount.

Where specific performance of a contract for the sale of realty on which a payment has been made cannot be compelled because the vendor cannot make the deed contracted for, and th purchaser refuses to take such title as the vendor can give him, the purchaser should be given damages to the amount of the payment, but, payment having been tendered, no interest should be allowed on the payment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Specific Performance, §§ 415, 416.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Suit by Luisa A. Gregg against Samuel D. Carey and others to compel specific performance of a contract. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed.

T. R. Archer, for appellant. John W. Kemp, for respondents.

SMITH, J. Appeal from a judgment for the defendants, and from an order denying the plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The suit is brought for specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate alleged to have been made by the defendants, or for damages, in case performance cannot be had. The contract sued on is signed by the defendant Lewis only; but it is alleged that he was authorized in writing by the other defendants to sign it on their behalf. It is in the words and figures following: "Los Angeles, Cal., Feb. 11-05. Received from Luisa A. Gregg the sum of fifty dollars, being a deposit on lot one in blk. 28 Crenshaw's Arlington Hts. tract $1,000 cash with unlimited certificate of title and all street work in front of said lot to be done and paid for by first party within one year. The first party also agrees to conduct an adequate supply of water to said lot within a year. The first party also agrees to lay a temporary pipe to said lot conducting an adequate supply of water for domestic purposes within one week from completion of sale. First party agrees to furnish above title and deed to said lot within ten days from date hereof. Floyd F. Lewis."

At the time of the making of this document the legal title to the land was vested in Crenshaw and the equitable title in Carey, under a contract of sale subject to certain building restrictions and other conditions; and it is found that Lewis was not authorized in writing, or otherwise, by the other defendants, to execute the instrument sued on. It appears from the evidence, however, that, upon application to Carey by the plaintiff's attorney on her behalf, he was informed by Carey that Lewis was authorized by him to sell the lot, and the attorney was directed "to see defendant Lewis in the matter." This, it is claimed by the appellant, under authorities cited, was a ratification of Lewis' agency by Carey of such a character as to estop him from denying it, and this contention, we think, must be sustained. Civ. Code, §§ 2300, 2317; Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3; Donnelly v. S. F. Bridge Co., 117 Cal. 417, 49 Pac. 559; Scott v. Glenn, 87 Cal. 221, 25 Pac. 405; Id., 98 Cal. 170, 32 Pac. 983. Afterwards, the plaintiff applied to Lewis for a deed, and was offered a deed executed by Crenshaw, containing the building restrictions and other restrictions provided for in his contract with Carey, and without any provisions as to the street work and water piping referred to in the contract sued on. This she refused to receive, and demanded a deed without such restrictions and in accordance with her contract, which was refused by the defendants Lewis and Carey. Afterwards, at the close of the evidence, the plaintiff offered to accept a deed with the building restrictions as first offered by defendants.

The defendants Lewis and Carey, not being able to make the deed called for by their contract, it is clear that the plaintiff cannot have specific performance of the contract; or, at least, complete specific performance. Nor, in view of her previous definite refusal to accept the deed offered by the defendants and the time elapsing before her offer to accept such a deed, are we prepared to say that the court below was not justified in refusing to require the defendants to make the deed the plaintiff was ready to accept. It seems clear, however, that as to the defendants Carey and Lewis, the plaintiff has made a good case for damages, the measure of which in the present case should be the money paid on the contract (Civ. Code, § 3306). But, as it appears from the evidence that this money was once tendered without interest, therefore, the judgment should be modified by adjudging to the plaintiff the recovery of $50 from the defendants Carey and Lewis.

The order denying the plaintiff's motion for a new trial is affirmed. The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to modify the same as above indicated; and the judgment, thus modified, shall stand affirmed.

PETERSON v. PLUNKETT. (Civ. 262.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 25, 1906.)

1. JUDGMENT — DEFAULT — MOTION TO SET ASIDE—DISCLOSING DEFENSE.

A motion to set aside a judgment rendered in defendant's absence will be denied where defendant discloses no meritorious defense.

2. QUIETING TITLE — PLEADING — DEFENSE — TITLE—DENIAL OF PLAINTIFF'S TITLE.

Defendant in an action to quiet title need not allege in his answer his source of title, a denial of plaintiff's right being sufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

Action by H. D. Peterson against W. J. Plunkett to quiet title. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals from the judgment, order denying motion to set aside judgment, and order denying motion for new trial. Affirmed.

Bell & Straus and Edwd. G. Knapp, for appellant. Crawford & Crawford, for respondent.

BUCKLES, J. This is an action to quiet title of H. D. Peterson to a tract of land in Lake county. The case was set for trial.

The defendant failing to appear, a trial was had, resulting in a judgment for plaintiff on December 21, 1903. On March 21, 1904, defendant moved the court to set aside said judgment on the ground that it was taken against him "through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect." Defendant at the same time moved for a new trial. Both motions were denied, and this appeal is from the judgment, from the order denying motion to set aside the judgment, and from the order denying motion for a new trial.

The usual complaint to quiet title was filed. A general demurrer thereto was filed and overruled. Defendant answered, denying plaintiff's title, and for further defense alleges his own title to said lands to be a seizure in fee and entitled to possession, and that, while so seised and possessed and entitled to possession, the plaintiff entered and ejected him, and wrongfully, unlawfully, and without defendant's consent, withholds possession from defendant. The answer was filed November 16, 1903. On November 25, 1903, plaintiff filed an answer to defendant's cross-complaint, specifically denying the allegations thereof. This answer, according to admissions of Frank V. Bell, a member of the firm of Bell & Straus, attorneys for defendant, was served on defendant's said attorneys before December 11, 1903, to wit, about November 25, 1903. On December 7, 1903, the court made an order setting the case for trial on December 21st, and directed in said order that the clerk notify Bell & Straus, attorneys for defendant. On December 7, 1903, the clerk did notify said Bell & Straus by letter, they having their office in San Francisco, that the case was set for trial for December 21st. On December 11, 1903, Attorney Frank V. Bell wrote the clerk in answer to his said notice, saying: "The plaintiff has as yet failed to serve upon me any answer to my cross-complaint, and, as the demurrer has been withdrawn, the case is not at issue nor ready for trial. Under any circumstances, it would be impossible for me to try the case on the 21st, my engagements in courts in this county will prevent it. However, as the case is not at issue and cannot be tried, as soon as the answer has been served on me I will agree on some future day to try the case. Very truly, Frank V. Bell." Bell says in his affidavit on motion to vacate the judgment that at the time of writing said letter he believed he had not been served with said answer, but that he was mistaken in this belief, and did not discover his mistake until after December 21st, when for the first time he discovered said answer where it had been misplaced. On December 12, 1903, the clerk again wrote Bell & Straus, notifying them that the case was set for trial for December 21st, and added, at the bottom of the letter, the following: "I send this notice because I think that I failed to state in the first notice that the demurrer had been overruled." This letter was received by Bell & Straus about December 13th, according to Frank V. Bell's said affidavit. At the trial on December 21st there was no appearance for the defendant, and no other showing made to account for the nonappearance of Bell & Straus than the letter of Frank V. Bell of date December 11th, heretofore set forth, which was shown to, and considered by, the court. The showing made by defendant on the hearing of the motion to set aside the judgment consisted of the affidavit of the defendant, Plunkett, and the affidavits of his attorneys. The defendant, Plunkett, sets forth in his affidavit that Helen F. Peterson, the wife of the plaintiff, on the 14th day of July, 1900, filed a homestead on the land in controversy, and that, by reason of said homestead, the said Helen F. Peterson had or claimed some interest in said land, and that she is a necessary party to the action, and that there could be no complete determination of the action until she is made a party to said action. The affidavit of said attorney, in addition to the matters already referred to as tending to excuse their nonappearance at the trial, sets forth that he was and is prepared to introduce evidence to show that plaintiff was a resident of San Joaquin county at the date of filing said homestead, and that said homestead was void.

The trial court heard all the evidence, and was well acquainted with all the facts in the case, and was called upon to exercise its discretion in passing upon the motion to set aside the judgment. The evidence produced at the trial of the case was the United States patent to plaintiff for the land and the homestead declared and filed by Helen F. Peterson. There is no allegation in the answer, nor elsewhere, of defendant's source of title, and there was no showing at all made at the hearing of the motion to set aside the judgment, of any claim, right, title, or interest the defendant had in or to said land, and no offer made to prove such claim or interest. If he had a meritorious defense to the said action, he failed to disclose the same, and the court could not do otherwise than deny his motion.

Defendant need not allege in his answer his source of title; a denial of plaintiff's right being entirely sufficient to raise an issue to be tried by the court (Butterfield v. Graves, 138 Cal. 155, 71 Pac. 510; United Land Association v. Pacific Improvement Co., 139 Cal. 370, 69 Pac. 1064, 72 Pac. 988), but, upon a motion to set aside a judgment rendered in the absence of the defendant, in order that the court may know what his defense is, and whether he has a good or meritorious defense to plaintiff's cause of action, justice requires him to set forth what he can prove in support of the right of title he claims in his answer. This the defendant failed to do.

We discover no abuse of discretion on the part of the court.

Judgment, order denying motion to set aside judgment, and the order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; McLAUGHLIN, J.

MILLER v. GRIFFITH et al. (Civ. 262.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 16, 1906.)

APPEAL — RESERVATION OF GROUND — OBJECTIONS — INSTRUCTIONS.

A statement in an order granting a new trial that the verdict was against law meant that the verdict was contrary to the instructions of the court, and the instructions, not being set out in the record on appeal, the order would be presumed correct.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; B. F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by L. L. Miller against Griffith J. Griffith and another. From an order granting plaintiff a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jones & Weller, J. W. McKinley, Earl Rogers and Luther Brown, for appellants. Hunsaker & Britt, for respondent.

GRAY, P. J. This is an appeal by defendants from an order granting plaintiff a new trial. The action is brought by the assignee of a firm of attorneys to recover the sum of $20,000, alleged to be a reasonable attorney's fee in certain litigation wherein they acted as attorneys for the defendants. The verdict was in plaintiff's favor for $500. The motion for a new trial was based on the ground, among others, that the verdict is against law, and also upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding or verdict of the jury to the effect that the services of plaintiff's assignors were not worth more than the sum of $500. A new trial was granted by the court on the grounds that the verdict is against law, and is not supported by the evidence. The motion was heard on the minutes of the court, and the appellants attack the order granting the new trial upon the ground that no proper specifications of insufficiency of the evidence were stated. It is replied in the respondent's first point, in effect, that this is immaterial, for the reason that one ground of the order was that the verdict was against law, and as the instructions are not set out error in that regard is not made to appear by the record, and therefore the order must be affirmed. This position of the respondent we deem to be well taken. The statement of the court in its order that the verdict was against law means that the verdict was contrary to the instructions of the court. Emerson v. County of Santa Clara, 40 Cal. 543. In the absence of the instructions, how are we to determine whether the verdict is contrary to the instructions? It appears from the transcript that the court did instruct the jury, and, for all that we know, it may have instructed the jury to bring in a verdict for the plaintiff for a much larger amount than $500. If it did, certainly the verdict would be contrary to the instructions, and against law. All presumptions are in favor of the order granting or refusing a new trial, and the burden is on the appellant to make it affirmatively appear by a proper record that the order is erroneous. In the absence of the instructions, we must presume that the verdict was contrary to the instructions. The principle here laid down is analogous to that stated in Wyckoff v. Pajaro Valley Consolidated R. R. Co., 146 Cal. 681, 81 Pac. 17, Skinner v. Horn, 144 Cal. 278, 77 Pac. 904, and Power v. Fairbanks, 146 Cal. 611, 80 Pac. 1075. On the authority of those cases, the sufficiency or insufficiency of the specifications becomes immaterial.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

CROWELL v. EWING. (Civ. 269.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 17, 1906.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—INTERESTS IN REAL PROPERTY—CONTRACTS FOR COMMISSIONS.

Where defendant held an option for the purchase of a mine, and, though it had expired, he continued in possession and made improvements with the consent of the owner under an oral extension of the option, and, on resale of the premises by him, he was to receive a certain sum for his services in making the sale and for improvements, he had an interest in the property, so that his agreement to divide the commission was within Civ. Code, § 1624, subdivision 6, requiring contracts for the payment of commissions for the sale of real property to be in writing.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Frauds, Statute of, § 131.]

2. SAME—SUFFICIENCY OF WRITING.

A letter of defendant notifying plaintiff that defendant had told a third person to talk with plaintiff on commissions was not a sufficient memorandum to take an agreement between plaintiff and defendant for the division of commissions for the sale of real estate out of the statute of frauds.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by J. Irving Crowell against Thomas Ewing. From an order granting a new trial after verdict in favor of plaintiff, he appeals. Affirmed.

Munson & Barclay, for appellant. Bicknell, Gibson, Trask, Dunn & Crutcher, for respondent.

GRAY, P. J. This action is brought to recover $50,000 on an oral agreement made between plaintiff and defendant concerning the sale of certain mining property and the division between them of $100,000 commissions. The plaintiff had a verdict for $15,000, and the court granted defendant's motion for a new trial. The appeal is by the plaintiff from the order granting the new trial.

It is contended by appellant that an agreement made under the circumstances of this case for a division of commissions is not within subdivision 6 of section 1624 of the Civil Code, and the case of Gorham v. Heiman, 90 Cal. 358, 27 Pac. 289, is cited to sustain this position. The trial court, as we gather from its opinion, took the view that the defendant had an actual interest in the mining property which was sold, and that his contract with the plaintiff was that of employment as an agent or broker to sell real estate, and this view is fully sustained by the defendant's evidence. From this it appears without conflict that he had a written option on the property, which at the time of this sale had expired, but that thereafter, and up to the time of said sale, he remained in possession of the property, working upon and improving the same; that to that end he expended upon the mine about $20,000; that he did all this and remained in possession really under the written agreement, which was extended as to the time of its operation by oral agreement. This would give the defendant an actual interest in the property, and he seems to have dealt with it and finally sold it as if he was at least a part owner in it. These facts distinguish the case very clearly from Gorham v. Heiman, supra. In that case the defendant had no interest, but there was, in effect, a partnership between plaintiff and defendant for the sale of mining property generally as brokers and the division of the commissions for such sales. In the case at bar, however, while the defendant referred, in his conversations with plaintiff, to the $100,000 which he was to receive out of the property as commissions, and orally agreed to divide the same with plaintiff, it is still quite clear that this large sum of money which defendant was to receive for the mine was to compensate him, not merely as commissions on a sale, but for the work and labor performed in improving the mine, and for the interest acquired thereby, and by reason of the agreements with the owners thereof and the expenditure of money in the mines. In other words, this $100,000 was intended to pay defendant for his interest in the mine. The $50,000 that the plaintiff was to receive under the oral agreement was for commissions as such on the sale which he was to assist in making, and, as this was to be paid to him by a party interested in the property and for whose benefit the property was to be sold, the case comes clearly within the provisions of subdivision 6 of section 1624 of the Civil Code, and the oral contract is therefore invalid. The trial court on the evidence was warranted in so holding.

The appellant further contends that; conceding the case to come within said section of the statute of frauds, still there was a sufficient agreement or memorandum in writing, signed by the party to be charged, to take the case out of the statute. To substantiate this he quotes the following letter, written by the defendant to the plaintiff: "Needles, Cal., Feb. 22, 1902. Crowell: I enclose you Mr. Davidson's letter which makes me sick. I will be home Wednesday or Thursday. These gentlemen seem to be very much pleased and will talk to you on commissions so arrange with them. I simply told them they could adjust the matter with you as I should surely allow you a commission if I did them. Hope to see you soon. Ewing." This letter was written concerning parties who were negotiating for the purchase of the mine. We do not think that it contains a memorandum of any agreement to pay anything. It certainly does not constitute an agreement to pay commissions. It is no more than a notice to the defendant to enter into negotiations with some third parties concerning his commissions, and it cannot be construed into any kind of a promise from defendant, Ewing, to the plaintiff. We are of opinion that the case is not taken out of the statute of frauds, and that, for that reason, the court below properly granted a new trial.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

HESPERIA LAND & WATER CO. v. GARDNER et al. (Civ. 160.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 16, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 13, 1906.)

APPEAL—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—SUBJECT-MATTER OF ACTION—TITLE TO REAL PROPERTY.

The right of the owner of a water system to recover for water supplied therefrom does not involve the title to real property so as to give the right to appeal from a judgment of the superior court for $32.50 on appeal from a justice's court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, § 118.]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by the Hesperia Land & Water Company against George F. Gardner and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Dismissed.

J. W. Stephenson, for appellants. Mack & Light, Henry M. Willis, for respondent.

GRAY, P. J. This action was originally commenced in the justice's court by the plaintiff corporation to recover from the defendants the sum of $36.37 for water furnished and delivered to the defendants from the water system of the plaintiff. The case was tried in the justice's court, and plaintiff obtained judgment in the sum of $32.50. Thereafter the case was appealed to the superior court on questions of law and fact and tried anew, the superior court rendering judgment for $32.50 and costs in favor of the plaintiff. This appeal is brought here from the judgment of the superior court by defendants on the theory that the title of real property is involved in the action.

It has several times been held that water diverted from a natural stream into ditches and reservoirs is, when so contained in said ditches and reservoirs, the personal property, and not the real estate, of the owners thereof. Riverside Water Co. v. Gage, 89 Cal. 410, 26 Pac. 889; McGuire v. Brown, 106 Cal. 660, 39 Pac. 1060, 30 L. R. A. 384. The only matter presented in the justice's court and in the superior court related to the water furnished after it had been diverted by the water system of the plaintiff. This in no way involved any title or right in real estate, the water itself being personal property. The judgment appealed from involves nothing except the question whether the water was actually furnished to the defendants, and its value. The sum involved being less than $300, and there being no question of the title of real estate in any way connected with the case, the superior court had final jurisdiction of the case on appeal, and neither this court nor the Supreme Court has any jurisdiction whatever in the matter.

The appeal is therefore dismissed.

REDPATH v. EVENING EXPRESS CO.

(Civ. 256.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 18, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 13, 1906.)

1. Appeal—Harmless Error—Exclusion of Evidence.

On trial by the court, any error in the exclusion of a stipulation between the parties offered in evidence is immaterial, since the stipulation may be considered as of equal value to a finding.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 4197.]

2. Contracts—Action for Breach—Pleading.

In an action against a newspaper company for breach of a contract for carrier service, which provided that the carrier might sell his route subject to the right of the company to approve the purchaser, allegations that the carrier found purchasers who were willing to take the route, but whom the company dissuaded from taking it, but not alleging that assignments were actually made and that the company refused to approve them, did not state a cause of action.

3. Tender—Sufficiency—Effect.

Under Civ. Code, § 1500, providng that an obligation for the payment of money is extinguished by an offer of payment accompanied by a deposit in a bank and notice thereof to the creditor, an obligation is not extinguished by a tender unaccompanied by the deposit.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Taxation, § 55.]

4. Contracts—Breach—Effect.

Where a newspaper company, on the termination of the contract of employment of a carrier, by notice to him, became obligated under the contract to pay him $843, it was not relieved from the obligation by the carrier's refusal to deliver a list of names of subscribers which the company, within a short time, secured through other sources at an expense of not over $60.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by K. V. Redpath against the Evening Express Company. From a judgment in favor of defendant and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Stephens & Stephens, for appellant. Anderson & Anderson, for respondent.

SMITH, J. Appeal from a judgment for the defendant, and an order denying the plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The suit was brought for breach of a written contract of date September 12, 1898, between defendant as party of the first part and the plaintiff as party of the second part, of which the following are the material parts:

"The Evening Express Company, in consideration, etc., * * * does by these presents grant, bargain, sell and convey unto the said party of the second part, his executors, administrators and assigns, the carrier service of the Evening Express in the limits of the city of Los Angeles described as follows: [Here follows description and provisions as to copies of the Express to be sold to the party of the second part and as to services to be performed by him.] * * * It is further agreed by said second party that he will not sell, lease or otherwise dispose of said carrier service, or any part thereof, to any person or persons, without the previous consent and full approval in writing of the Evening Express Company, which reserves the right, in case the service of the papers to subscribers shall be unsatisfactory, or the work of canvassing and building up the list by said second party shall be inefficient, to repurchase back and resume control of all said carrier service by paying to said second party the sum of $1.50 per name for all names of bona fide subscribers on his books on the date of such notice of their intention to repurchase. It is further expressly agreed that the Evening Express Company shall be the sole judge of the satisfactory service of its papers, or of the efficiency of the work of said second party, and it agrees to give him thirty (30) days' notice of such intention to repurchase its carrier service in said territory hereinbefore described. But the said second party shall first have the privilege of selling said carrier service, or any part thereof, to a third party or parties at a higher rate per name, provided the third party be first accepted and approved by the Evening Express Company. * * * [Here follows a provision empowering the party of the first part to require the second party to subdivide the carrier district whenever in its judgment the territory is too large for him to serve and canvass efficiently, the second party agreeing within thirty days of such notice to sell such portion of the district as may be required by the first party to some person or persons satisfactory to it; and on failure of the second party to sell, reserves to the first party the right to repurchase such portion of the carrier district at the rate of $1.50 per name for each bona fide subscriber, etc.; and provisions as to the number of copies to be purchased by the second party and the terms of purchase, with some other provisions immaterial to the present controversy.] * * * The Evening Express Company reserves the right to solicit new subscribers within the carrier district limits defined herein, and said second party agrees to pay said Evening Express Company the sum of twenty-five cents for each bona fide new subscriber" thus secured for him, etc.

The complaint contains three counts, in all of which the contract is set out or made part by reference, and the sale of part of the district, the termination of the contract by the defendant, and the performance of its conditions by the plaintiff alleged. In the first count it is further alleged, in effect, that within a period of 30 days from the notice terminating the contract it was agreed by the plaintiff and one McIntyre that the latter should purchase the carrier service at the price of $3,000, provided McIntyre should be accepted and approved by the defendant; that McIntyre applied to the defendant to learn whether he would be accepted and approved; that by certain statements and representations made to him by the defendant with intent of preventing him from making the purchase, McIntyre was prevented from purchasing, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $3,000, etc. In the second count, similar allegations are made as to one Barton, who had agreed with plaintiff to purchase the route for the sum of $2,500. In the third count, besides the general allegations common to the three counts, the material allegation is as follows: "At the time of said notice hereinbefore referred to, so given by the defendant to the plaintiff, there were on the books of plaintiff 562 names of bona fide subscribers, and, by reason of said notice and the termination of plaintiff's interest under said contract by said notice, there became due to the plaintiff on the 5th day of November, 1901, the sum of $843, no part of which has ever been paid to the plaintiff and the whole thereof is now due, owing, and unpaid from the defendant to the plaintiff."

A general demurrer was interposed to each count of the complaint and sustained as to the first two. The answer to the third count consists of a denial of performance of the contract by the plaintiff without assignment of any particular breach, and of a counterclaim for the sum of $147.15, due to the defendant under the terms of the contract for papers sold to the second party.

Upon the issues thus made the court finds, in effect: (1) That the plaintiff has not performed all the obligations of the contract, but has failed and refused to perform "certain obligations and conditions of said agreement by him to be kept and performed"; (2) that it is not true "that there became due to plaintiff on the 5th day of November, 1901, or any other time, or at all, the sum of $843, or any other sum"; (3) that on November 5th the defendant tendered to plaintiff $1.50 per name for all bona fide subscribers to the Evening Express, and then and there demanded of plaintiff to turn over to the defendant the names of such subscribers, but the plaintiff refused to accept the tender or to turn over the names; and (4) that the allegations of the defendant's counterclaim are true. Upon a fair construction of these findings, it must be assumed that the only breach of the contract on the part of the plaintiff was the refusal to turn over the names of the subscribers referred to in the third of the findings enumerated, and in this connection, it appears from the statement on motion for new trial that "it was stipulated that the defendant paid out and incurred a sum not exceeding $60 to obtain through its own agency the list of subscribers on the books of the plaintiff." This stipulation was offered in evidence, but excluded by the court, the plaintiff excepting, and this is assigned as error by him. But the error, if any, is immaterial, as the stipulation itself may be considered as of equal value as a finding. The judgment is that the plaintiff take nothing by his action, and that the defendant recover the amount of its counterclaim.

The points urged by the appellant are that the demurrers to the first two counts of the complaint were improperly sustained, and that on the findings there should have been a judgment for the plaintiff.

As to the first point, it may be assumed, for the purposes of the decision, that the right of assignment given to the plaintiff by the terms of the contract was not a mere privilege thereafter to be conferred or not at the option of the defendant, but a substantial right regarded by the parties as valuable and as constituting part of the consideration of the contract; that the condition imposed by the contract of acceptance and approval by the defendant was inserted merely for the purpose of protecting the defendant against an assignment to an inefficient or otherwise objectionable purchaser; that this power could be exercised for that purpose only, and not arbitrarily for the purpose of evading the provisions of the contract; and hence, that in the present case, under the circumstances alleged, the defendant was under obligation upon demand to accept and approve the purchasers referred to in the complaint. But the fault of the complaint is that it is not alleged that assignments to the purchasers as distinguished from agreements looking to that end were in fact made, or that the acceptance and approval of the assignments were either demanded of, or refused by, the defendant. The most that can be gathered from the complaint is that the defendant, by certain representations or statements—which were not in themselves actionable—prevented or persuaded the intended purchasers from making the purchases, from which it must be inferred, either that there were no actual contracts between them and the plaintiff, or that the latter voluntarily released them. Had the assignments been consummated and presented to the defendant for acceptance and approval, and such acceptance and approval been refused by the defendant, a different case would be presented. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the demurrers to the first two counts of the complaint were rightly sustained.

As to the second point, it would seem clear on the express allegations of the complaint showing an indebtedness at the time of the termination of the contract from the defendant to the plaintiff in the sum of $843 for the "562 names of bona fide subscribers" then on the books of the plaintiff—which are not denied by the answer—that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for that amount, less the sum of $147.15, counterclaimed by the defendant, with damages, not exceeding $60, for expenses incurred by the defendant in getting the names of the subscribers, and we are at a loss to understand upon what principle this relief was denied to him. It is clear, however, that the judgment must rest on one of two propositions: The one, that the admitted obligation of the defendant to pay the amount alleged was extinguished by the tender found to have been made by it; the other, that the obligation was extinguished by the refusal of the plaintiff to turn over to the defendant the names of the subscribers. But we are of the opinion that neither of these propositions can be maintained. As to the first, an obligation for the payment of money is not extinguished by a tender, unless the money is deposited with some bank as prescribed in section 1500 of the Civil Code. As to the second, it may be assumed that the plaintiff was under obligation to turn over to the defendant the names of subscribers, and that in refusing to do so he was guilty of a breach of the contract, and further, that, until this information was given to the defendant or otherwise obtained by it, it would be justified in refusing to perform. But here it appears by stipulation that the information was in fact obtained by the defendant at an expense of not more than $60 within a short period after the plaintiff's refusal and before the commencement of the suit—which did not occur until about nine months afterwards. The case presented is, therefore, that the defendant had received from the plaintiff under the contract the sum of $843, which it was under admitted obligation to pay, and the contention is that, by reason of the plaintiff's breach of the contract—by which it was not damaged in excess of $60 and which could be fully compensated by that amount or less—the obligation was extinguished and the right of the plaintiff forfeited.

This contention can be maintained only upon the broad ground that any breach of the terms of a contract by a party deprives him of the right to maintain an action against the other party to enforce the obligation of the latter. But this is not the law, nor has it ever been, either at law or in equity. At law it was only where the obligation broken by the plaintiff was a condition precedent to defendant's obligation that the breach was a defense. Nor was any obligation of the contract regarded as a condition precedent unless made so by the express terms of the contract, or by necessary implication. 1 Chitty's Pl. 321, 322; Civ. Code, §§ 1439, 1498; Code Civ. Proc. § 457; Anson on Contracts, 376 et seq., 287, 303 et seq., 308 et seq. But here the obligation broken is not expressed in the contract, and was probably not thought of by the parties, but is a merely implied obligation added to the contract by construction of law. Civ. Code, §§ 1656, 1655, 1643. It could not, therefore, have been regarded by the parties as a condition precedent to the defendant's obligation. But, under our system, the distinction between legal and equitable suits has been abolished, and in any suit the plaintiff is entitled to either legal or equitable relief, or both, as may be required by the case made (Grain v. Aldrich, 38 Cal. 514, 99 Am. Dec. 423), and, where equitable principles will apply, they will be determinative of the case. Hence, in our system the rules formerly prevailing at law have been essentially modified by the principles of equity, and, to the extent the latter will apply, superseded. But in equity the failure to perform an obligation of the contract, whether a condition precedent or otherwise, where "it is only partial and either entirely immaterial or capable of being fully compensated" has always been regarded as insufficient to constitute a defense. Civ. Code, §§ 3392, 3386. And this, under our system, has become a general principle of the law. Nor, in view of the settled principles of equity, could it be otherwise, for in case of a partial breach of the contract, as in this case, the defendant has received and voluntarily retains so much of the consideration, and has become subject to a corresponding obligation; and hence, in cases to which the strict legal rule would apply, if any, a forfeiture of the plaintiff's corresponding right would occur, against which equity on other principles would relieve. Civ. Code, §§ 3275, 1477.

We are of the opinion, therefore, that judgment should be entered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $843, less the sum of $147.15, and less, also, the sum of $60—if the plaintiff be willing to admit that to be the amount of the expenses incurred by the defendant in obtaining the names of subscribers—and otherwise, the amount of such expenditures as may be found by the court, together with interest on the balance from the date of the commencement of the suit, or from the date of such expenditures, as the case may be.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

LUDINGTON EXPLORATION CO. et al. v. LA FORTUNA GOLD & SILVER MINING CO. et al. (Civ. 263.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 18, 1906.)

1. VENUE—RESIDENCE OF PARTIES—FOREIGN CORPORATIONS.

The right to sue nonresident corporations in any county of the state does not exist where there are other resident defendants.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Venue, § 40.]

2. SAME—CHANGE OF VENUE—PARTIES ENTITLED.

Where all the defendants in an action are nonresidents of the county in which the action is brought, defendants residing in another county in the state are entitled to a change of venue.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Action by the Ludington Exploration Company and others against the La Fortuna Gold & Silver Mining Company, an Arizona corporation, and others. From an order denying the motion of certain of the defendants to change the place of trial, they appeal. Reversed.

E. J. Baumberger, for appellants. A. D. Warner, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Appeal from an order denying the motion of corporation defendants and Neumann to change the place of trial from the county of Los Angeles to the city and county of San Francisco. It appears from the defendants' affidavits that the two corporations have their principal place of business in the city of San Francisco, and that that is the place where the contract was made and is to be performed; that defendants Neumann and Oliver are both residents of San Francisco, and were so at the time of the beginning of this suit; and that the fictitious defendants are not, nor is any one of them, a necessary party to this action, nor have they any interest therein. The briefs of the counsel are largely devoted to the proposition of the respondents, that the corporation defendants are nonresidents of the state and may therefore be sued in any county which the plaintiffs may designate. But assuming that this is the case, the right of the plaintiffs to sue them in any county could exist only in a case where they were the only defendants (Code Civ. Proc. § 395), and here it appears that there are two other defendants, Neumann and Oliver, both of whom are residents of the state. We may disregard, also, as a point that need not be decided, the claim of the appellants that, under the provisions of article 12, § 16, of the Constitution, these corporations have a right to a trial of the case in the city and county of San Francisco; and, on the other hand, the fictitious defendants named in the complaint may be disregarded as not being parties to the action, or, at least, as not being necessary or proper parties, or interested in the action. Of the remaining defendants, Oliver does not join in the motion; but it appears that he, as well as Neumann, the moving defendant, is a resident of the city and county of San Francisco. The case, therefore, comes directly within the decision in Wood, Curtis & Co. v. Herman Mining Co., 139 Cal. 713, 73 Pac. 588, where it is held that where all the defendants in an action are nonresidents of the county in which the action is brought, any of the defendants residing in another county are entitled to a change of the place of trial, notwithstanding the opposition of the other defendants; and upon the authority of this decision, the order appealed from must be reversed. It is so ordered.

CHURCHILL v. MORE. (Civ. 228.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Aug. 14, 1906. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 11, 1906.)

1. FIXTURES—BETWEEN LANDLORD AND TENANT—LEASE—RIGHT TO REMOVE.

A lease provided that the lessee should have the right to remove fixtures placed on the premises at any time. A contractor was engaged to bore an oil well for the lessee, the lessee to furnish the casing, and the contractor to pull it from the well, if abandoned. The lessee abandoned the well, and the contractor sued for a balance due him, obtained judgment, and sold the casing on execution to plaintiff. Nearly a year after such sale, the lessor terminated the lease, and sold the property to defendant, who knew of plaintiff's purchase, but refused to let him remove the property, and plaintiff brought replevin. Held, that the casing was not a fixture which passed to defendant.

2. PROPERTY—OWNERSHIP—POSSESSION.

Where casing is placed in a well by direction of a lessee under a lease authorizing him to remove it, possession of the casing by a corporation entering into possession of the leasehold is prima facie proof of ownership.

3. REPLEVIN—EVIDENCE—OWNERSHIP.

A lease permitting the removal of fixtures placed on the land by the lessee, the assignment of the lease, the execution on a judgment against the last assignee, and the sheriff's certificate of sale of the fixtures under the execution, are admissible in evidence in replevin by the execution purchaser against the grantee of the land, as showing right of removal of the fixtures, ownership, and right of possession.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Replevin, §§ 285, 289.]

4. SAME—DEMAND.

Formal demand for property in possession of defendant is not necessary before bringing replevin, where defendant notifies plaintiff that the property cannot be removed without defendant's consent, and defendant's agent notifies plaintiff that he cannot go upon the land where the property is.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Replevin, § 88.]

5. TRIAL—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—FAILURE TO OBJECT—STRIKING OUT.

It is not error to refuse to strike out evidence received without objection.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 242.]

6. REPLEVIN—EVIDENCE—OWNERSHIP.

A corporation as lessee placed property on the leasehold which subsequently passed into the possession of another corporation, and the property was sold on execution against the latter corporation. The purchaser brought replevin against the grantee of the land to recover possession of the property. Held, that evidence as to the identity of the two corporations was admissible as bearing on the question of ownership.

7. APPEAL — PRESUMPTIONS — INSTRUCTIONS —FAILURE TO INCLUDE IN RECORD.

Where instructions given and refused do not appear in the record, it will be assumed that an instruction objected to, taken with those given and refused, properly presented the law of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3750.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; J. W. Taggart, Judge.

Action by Frank Churchill against John F. More. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. G. Griffith, for appellant. C. F. Carrier and Richards & Carrier, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Appeal by defendant from a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial in an action of replevin.

The record discloses that one Mrs. Rowe, in March, 1901, then the owner of certain real estate, executed thereon what is popularly known as an "oil lease" to one Ayers, who assigned the same to a corporation known as the "Mescalitan Island Oil & Development Company." This lease provided, among other things: "The party of the second part shall have * * * the right to remove all machinery and fixtures placed on the premises by him at any time." Further: "That if oil or other metals or minerals are not found in paying quantities within one year * * * this lease shall become void." Further: "That the parties of the first part shall maintain the party of the second part or his assigns in the full and free possession of said premises during the life and term of this lease." Further: "That a cessation of work for more than sixty days consecutively shall invalidate this lease, unless by written consent of the parties of the first part." Acting under this lease, the corporation before mentioned entered into a contract with J. W. Churchill, the father of plaintiff, to bore an oil well on said leased premises, it being stipulated that the corporation should furnish all casing and, if the well was abandoned, Churchill should pull the same, or as much as could be taken from the well with reasonable effort. Churchill proceeded to bore a well to a depth of 1,360 feet, using therein four strings of casing of various diameters, furnished by the corporation until the well had attained a depth of about 900 feet, when another corporation, designated as the "Seaboard Consolidated Oil Company," entered into possession of the leasehold and continued sinking the well to an additional depth of 400 feet, furnishing casing therefor, Churchill during all of this time performing the work of sinking the well. About February, 1902, this last-named corporation abandoned the well, and there remained unpaid to Churchill on account of his work thereon $1,118.75, who brought his action against the Seaboard Company, and obtained a judgment therefor. An execution was issued out of such judgment, and the casing, which is the subject of the controversy in this action, was sold in October, 1902, to the plaintiff, and a sheriff's certificate duly issued. Afterwards, in September, 1903, Mrs. Rowe caused to be recorded a notice that she elected under said lease to terminate the same, and in October following conveyed the premises to defendant More. After More acquired the real property, plaintiff undertook the removal of certain personal property thereon, at which time More said: "I will not allow you nor even the President of the United States to take anything away from that well without my permission." Subsequently, however, he said to his foreman: "You can let him have those two large bitts. They are too large to use in the well. We will not need them." There is evidence in the record to the effect that it was practicable to remove this casing from the well; and further, that Churchill made preparation to remove the casing, and was notified by Mr. More's man that he would not allow him to go on the premises. There is no evidence of Mr. More having any other man in his employ other than a certain foreman, to whom Mr. More gave instructions as to what property on the leasehold Churchill should be permitted to take. Without further demand, plaintiff instituted this action, and judgment was rendered for the return of the casing or the value thereof. Upon the trial, there was evidence tending to show that More, before he purchased the premises, knew of the execution sale and of the plaintiff's claim to the property; and at one time the proposition for More to purchase the casing from plaintiff was under consideration. There is no evidence in the record tending to show an assignment of the leasehold to the Seaboard Company, nor of its ownership, other than the presumption to be drawn from the possession of the leased property by such corporation, and the circumstances attending the operation of the work.

The chief contention of the appellant is that the casing in controversy is shown to have been so affixed to the soil that, by the conveyance to More, the same passed to him by the deed under the recognized rule that chattels attached to the freehold by the owner and contributing to its value and enjoyment pass by the grant. This rule, however, is that applying between vendor and vendee in the absence of a contract to the contrary. But it has long ago been modified as applying to the rights of landlord and tenant (Fratt v. Whittier, 58 Cal. 130, 41 Am. Rep. 251), and was never a proper rule between any class when its enforcement would be to impair the obligation of a contract with reference to the right of removal. In the case under consideration, were ambiguity in the contract conceded, its construction should be in favor of the lessee. Civ. Code, § 1069. But, we think, giving effect to the words "at any time" as employed in the lease, they were intended to and did give the right of removal to the lessee of the property placed thereon, even were such right not exercised during the life of the lease. More is shown to have accepted the conveyance with notice of the plaintiff's claim, and in fact is shown to have recognized the same at one time after acquiring title to the land.

Appellant contends further that, there being no proof of an assignment of the lease to the Seaboard Company, no ownership in the casing is shown in said company; hence no title thereto passed to plaintiff by the sheriff's sale on execution. There is evidence, however, that the possession of all this casing was in the Seaboard Company long before the suspension of work, and at the date of the levy of the execution. This is prima facie proof of ownership. Goodwin v. Garr, 8 Cal. 616; Kelly v. Mack, 49 Cal. 524; Hewitt v. San Jacinto, etc., Irr. Dist., 124 Cal. 191, 56 Pac. 893.

We find no error in the admission in evidence of the lease to Ayres and its assignments; nor the admission of the execution and certificate of sheriff's sale. These instruments were competent as tending to show that the casing was agreed to be and remain personal property with right of removal, and as evidence in support of the issue of ownership and right of possession. There was some evidence which supports the verdict of the jury in finding in favor of the plaintiff upon the issue of demand before suit; yet, even in the absence of such testimony, it is clear that More personally, and through his agent, notified Churchill that none of the property could be removed without More's express consent; and the agent of More notified him that he would not be allowed "to go on there," evidently referring to the leasehold. This conduct on the part of More obviated the necessity of formal demand. Mrs. Rowe, without objection, testified: "I know in a general way, but I don't know when the Mescalitan Company was absorbed or merged into the other." There was no error in refusing to strike out this evidence, received without objection. Evans v. Johnston, 115 Cal. 183, 46 Pac. 906. The question of identity of the corporations was not immaterial as affecting ownership of the property, and nothing appears in the record justifying the statement that her knowledge was hearsay only.

Instructions given and refused not appearing in the record, it will be assumed that the single instruction objected to, taken with those given and refused, properly presented the law of the case to the jury. Harris v. Barnhart, 97 Cal. 548, 32 Pac. 589.

We have examined the other points raised by appellant, and perceive no prejudicial error therein; and the judgment and order are affirmed.

John D. Pope, for appellant. Scarborough & Bowen, for respondent.

SMITH, J. Appeal from a judgment for the defendant, an order denying the plaintiff's motion for a new trial, and an order denying the plaintiff's motion to vacate the judgment and to enter a judgment in its favor. The suit was brought for breach of an agreement of the defendant with plaintiff's assignor, of date October 1, 1903, for the lease of a lot of land in the city of Los Angeles near the northeast corner of Third and Olive streets with a hotel building thereon to be constructed, according to the plans and specifications specified, under the following provision of the contract: "Said first party agrees to complete said building and have it ready for occupancy by the 1st day of February, 1904, unless he shall be prevented by strikes, accidents, or other causes beyond his control, and if, for any reason, said first party shall not have completed said hotel by the first day of February, 1904, he agrees to complete it and deliver possession thereof as soon thereafter as possible."

The agreement sued on is in the form of a lease, delivered in escrow to the Title Insurance & Trust Company, for delivery to the plaintiff within 30 days after the completion of the hotel, upon the execution of a mortgage specified in the escrow agreement. The hotel building provided for, according to the specifications, would be about 65 feet in height on Olive street and 119 feet at the rear end of the lot, with an addition thereto of a café 10 feet in height on the top of the house and a tower 28 feet square by 73 feet in height above the roof of the café. The construction of the building by the defendant was prevented by an ordinance of the city of Los Angeles passed by the city council October 8, 1903, to the effect following: "Section 1. That it shall be unlawful for any person to erect or to cause to be erected, any frame building in the city of Los Angeles, the height of which, at any point, exclusive of the flag pole, shall be more than 65 feet above the natural surface of the ground." This ordinance was subsequently modified by another ordinance of date October 26, 1903; but this, also, in its effect, prohibited the erection of the building contemplated. Assuming these ordinances to be valid, the defendant was excused for nonperformance of the contract, not only "by the operation of law" (Civ. Code, § 1511), but by the express provisions of the contract, and the only question involved is as to the validity of the former ordinance, which, it is contended by the appellant, is void for three reasons: "(1) It applied to all kinds of frame buildings, whether churches, icehouses, elevators, water towers, oil derricks, or windmills, as well as to private residences, rooming houses, and hotels. (2) It applied to any building of any kind erected a mile from any other structure, with the same force and effect as if it were in the thickly settled portions of the city. (3) It applied to a building erected on the side of a hill, as the hotel mentioned in the lease was to be, and did not permit the front of the hotel to extend even one story above the sidewalk on Olive street."

These objections, it may be observed, may be summed up in the one general objection, that the ordinance, under certain special circumstances, would be unreasonable. But "there is nothing pleaded de hors the ordinance by virtue of which petitioner claims that the same is unreasonable, oppressive, or void as applying to his property distinguished from other property within" the city, and, in the absence of such a showing, we are not in a position to review the action of the council. In re Newell (Cal. App.) 84 Pac. 226. It was so, in effect, held in the case cited, and we see no reason for departing from the principle announced in that decision. We have no general jurisdiction to review the action of the legislative body of a city any more than to review that of the state Legislature. Nor have we any jurisdiction at all, except in so far as may be incidentally necessary to protect the constitutional rights of litigants from violation by unreasonable legislation. Ramish v. Hartwell, 126 Cal. 443, 58 Pac. 920. It follows that our jurisdiction will extend only to determine whether the constitutional rights of the individual litigant before us have been violated, and in no case can our decision go further than to hold the affirmative of this proposition.

We are of the opinion, therefore, that the judgment and orders appealed from must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PERRINE et al. v. SAN JACINTO VALLEY WATER CO. (Civ. 165.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 19, 1906.)

MANDAMUS—SUBJECT OF RELIEF—CONTRACTS.

Where a contract with an irrigation company specified that plaintiffs should receive a continuous flow of 10 inches of water during a given period, and that they might accumulate the flow at any one month or more of the period, mandamus would not lie to require the company to deliver water in accumulated quantities twice a month, since mandamus will lie only to compel performance of acts specially enjoined by law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Mandamus, §§ 268, 272.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Action by M. E. Perrine and others against the San Jacinto Valley Water Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Frank W. Burnett, for appellant. Gill & Densmore, for respondents.

SMITH, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in a mandamus suit, adjudging that the plaintiffs, under the water certificate set out in paragraph 3 of the complaint, are "entitled to receive thereunder a continuous flow of ten (10) inches of water * * * for and during the seven summer months, as therein mentioned, * * * and of the further right to cumulate the use of said water in the way and manner set forth in the findings filed herein, and to receive from such corporation such cumulated flow of water to which they were and are so entitled twice a month in a head of flow not exceeding sixty (60) inches of water, constant flow, for such period, each time, as will be necessary to approximate the water then accumulated by them," and "commanding said corporation, its officers, attorneys, and agents, and each and all of them, to so deliver to said petitioners, in way and manner as aforesaid, the cumulated water to which they are so entitled." The certificate of stock mentioned, so far as material, is as follows: "These fifty certificates, issued by the San Jacinto Valley Water Company, a corporation, to M. E. Perrine, for fifty acres, are guaranteed by said company to entitle the holder thereof to receive a continuous flow of one-fifth of an inch of water to each acre of land to which the same shall be devoted, or multiple thereof, as designated on the face thereof, for the seven summer months commencing on March 15th and ending on October 15th of each year, upon payment to said company, in advance, of the sum of three dollars ($3.00) per acre for the use of water during each irrigating season. * * * The holder of this certificate may elect to cumulate the use of water thereunder at any one month or more of said seven months, the aggregate in any one month not to exceed one-fourth of the whole for that season. * * * The holders of these certificates are subject to the usual rules and regulations of said company for the distribution of water."

Under these provisions no question can be made as to the plaintiffs' right to a continuous flow of 10 inches of water during the period named in the judgment. But we can find nothing in the provisions of the contract entitling them to cumulate the water otherwise than as therein provided, which, according to the construction we place upon the contract, is at periods of "one month or more." The writ of mandamus will lie only "to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins." Code Civ. Proc. § 1085. And here the only duties enjoined upon the defendant are the obligations incurred by its contract, which, according to its terms—except as modified by the rules and regulations of the company—are: To deliver to the plaintiffs a continuous flow of 10 inches of water during the period specified in the judgment, or to deliver the same in cumulated quantities at periods of not less than one month. It may be that in a proper proceeding the court, as a court of equity, would have the power, under appropriate circumstances, to direct the delivery of the water in such cumulated quantities as justice and equity might require. But, in the present proceeding, the court has no such power. Alhambra Water Co. v. Richardson, 95 Cal. 490, 30 Pac. 577. In this regard the case differs from that of Hewitt v. San Jacinto, etc., Irr. District, 124 Cal. 186, 190, 191, 56 Pac. 893. There the agreement was to deliver "an amount of water equal to one irrigating inch of water to each seven acres," and it was held that this provision should be construed "in the light of usage and the practice of the parties." But here there is no proof or averment of usage, or, rather, it appears that the usage has been different; and the special provision as to cumulation, and the provision that the holders of certificates are subject to the usual rules and regulations of the company for the distribution of water, seem to exclude any right in them to cumulate the water otherwise than as thus provided.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Nellie L. Allen against W. S. Bryant and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Walpole Wood and Jesse F. Waterman, for appellants. Bicknell, Gibson, Trask, Dunn & Crutcher, for respondent.

SMITH, J. Appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff, on the judgment roll, with bill of exceptions. The suit was brought to quiet the plaintiff's title to an undivided one-half of the tract of land described in the complaint, and referred to in the answer, as the "Cherrioto Ranch." The plaintiff derived her title to an undivided one-half of the land in question under a deed of gift from her husband, Charles Allen, to whom it had been conveyed by the defendants by deed of date July 22, 1904. The defense is that this deed was fraudulently obtained under the circumstances set up in the answer.

The case as presented by the pleadings, findings, and stipulations of the parties, is as follows:

1. The tract described in the complaint was purchased by Bryant from one Cher-rioto, who conveyed the same to him by deed of date January 9, 1904, subject to a mortgage executed by him and his wife to secure the purchase money thereon, amounting to the sum of $22,500, with interest. There were some other instruments subsequently executed to correct mistakes or supposed mistakes in the deed and mortgage, but these need not be regarded.

2. At this time Bryant and Allen were associated together in the business of subdividing and selling a tract of land known as the "Pardee Tract" under an agreement entered into by them of date December 14, 1903. This tract belonged to Bryant, and, by the terms of the contract, Allen was to have charge of the subdivision and sale of the tract, and the proceeds of the sales of lots, after payment of the expenses and amounts due thereon to Bryant, were to be equally divided between the two parties.

3. This being the relation of the parties, Bryant and Allen, it is alleged in the answer, entered into another contract that Bryant should convey to Allen an undivided one-half of the ranch, subject to the mortgage, to be operated, and ultimately subdivided and sold, on joint account, and for the joint benefit and profit. There is no finding on this allegation, but its truth is established, without contradiction, by the evidence, and the effect of the failure to find upon it is, for the purposes of this appeal, to be regarded as equivalent to an affirmative finding.

4. Accordingly, by deed of date January 16, 1904, the Bryants conveyed to Allen an undivided one-half of the ranch, subject to the mortgage.

5. Thereafter, by deed of July 22, 1904, which is the deed in controversy, Bryant conveyed to Allen the remaining undivided one-half of the property. The consideration stated in this deed does not appear, but it is alleged in the answer, and it appears from the evidence of Bryant, which is uncontradicted, that the consideration was Allen's note for $1,500 and the sum of $989.97, claimed to be due to him from Bryant on account of the ranch. On this allegation there is no explicit finding, but it is found that the consideration of the deed, and of a transfer of "certain personalty" to Allen was "a release of all indebtedness to him, being a balance due said Allen on account of moneys laid out and expended on and in connection with said real property, under an agreement between said Allen and the said * * * Bryant," and a promissory note given by Allen to Bryant for the sum of $1,500, payable with interest at 6 per cent. per annum four years after its date. And it is further found that Allen afterwards satisfied the note "by paying and delivering to the said * * * Bryant one hundred tons of hay at fifteen dollars per ton." In explanation of this finding, it is to be observed that at the time of the conveyance Allen rendered to Bryant a statement of the account of their affairs, including the operation of the Cherrioto Ranch and the Pardee Tract and some personal matters, to which there was attached the following on a slip pinned to the statement:

"The item of $989.97 is this day settled as part of the consideration for the purchase of Mr. Bryant's interest in said ranch. Charles W. Allen." This account, omitting the items, is as follows:

Paid Out Act. Cherrioto Ranch.

	By Charles W. Allen.	By W. S. Bryant.
* * * * * *
Total	$1,353.57	$363.60
Pardee Tract.
* * * * * *
Totals	$3,188.00	$3,488.95
Balance due Allen, $300.95.
Advancements Made W. S. Bryant.
* * * * * *
Total		$211.88
Due Allen.		Sum Totals.
From Ranch		$989.97
" Pardee Tr.		300.95
" W. S. Bryant		211.88
Total		$1,502.80

From this account it is apparent that the amount due from Bryant to Allen was one-half only of the $989.97 due "from ranch." But Bryant testifies that, prior to the delivery of this statement, Allen went over the books with him and told him (Bryant) that the amount of $989.97 was due from him to Allen, and then proposed to him "to deed him [Allen] another quarter interest in the Cherrioto Ranch for it." From Bryant's evidence it also appears that Allen then offered to buy Bryant's one-half interest in the ranch and give him a receipt for the account, "nine hundred eighty-seven dollars and some cents, and two thousand dollars besides." Bryant, he says, was then proposing to sell his store, for which he had an offer pending, to pay this indebtedness, but being disappointed in the sale, he notified Allen that he would accept his offer. But Allen then refused to give more than $1,500, in addition to the amount due him, to which Bryant acceded. It appears, therefore, if Bryant's statement was true, that the actual consideration was the $1,500 note and the sum of $989.97, claimed by Allen to be due to him from Bryant, but of which he was entitled to only one-half. On the other hand, if Bryant's testimony was false and the account was understood by him as it should have been, the consideration was the note and one-half of the $989.97. There was thus raised a very sharply defined and material issue, and upon this issue the finding of the court leaves us in doubt whether it was intended to negative the testimony of Bryant. If so, we are of the opinion, for reasons to be stated presently, that the finding would be in conflict with the evidence.

In some other particulars, also, the finding is clearly in conflict with the evidence. The court finds the transfer of "certain personalty" to Allen by Bryant, and that the note was satisfied by the payment and delivery to Bryant of 100 tons of hay at $15 per ton. But, on looking at the evidence, we find that the only transaction of the kind was a bill of sale of July 15, 1904 (seven days before the execution of the deed), transferring to Allen Bryant's interest "in all hay now cut or that shall be cut this year on the ranch, * * * authorizing him to dispose of same to the best advantage he may be able; the intention being that he may repay himself for money expended in care of said ranch out of said hay, if possible." The hay referred to as used in the payment of the note was the hay on the ranch covered by the bill of sale. Prior to the time of the supposed payment, it had been baled by Allen, and, from the ordinary course of the seasons, and agriculture in the country, it may, perhaps, be assumed that it had been cut, if not baled, prior to the date of the deed and the date of the bill of sale. But, however this may be, it had been transferred by Bryant to Allen prior to the date of the deed, and thus became personalty in the hands of Allen upon the trusts specified. Davis v. McFarlane, 37 Cal. 634, 99 Am. Dec. 340; O'Brien v. Ballou, 116 Cal. 318, 48 Pac. 130; Bank of Woodland v. Heron, 120 Cal. 614, 616, 52 Pac. 1006. The hay, therefore, did not pass to Allen by the deed subsequently made to him. It appears, therefore, that one-half of the hay with which the note was satisfied was the property of Bryant, and that he in fact received only one-half of the amount due on the note. But the significance of this transaction is much broader. It shows the helplessness of Bryant at that time in business matters, and the willingness and disposition of Allen to take advantage of his infirmity, and from this may be inferred a similar weakness on the part of Bryant and a similar disposition on the part of Allen at the time of the conveyance of the land; thus strongly confirming the testimony of Bryant as to his understanding of the matter. Nor, independently of this confirmation, do we see any reason to doubt Bryant's testimony in this regard. On the contrary, it is strongly confirmed by its consistent circumstantiality, and also by the slip attached to the account, which, though susceptible of a different construction, was more calculated to be understood by Bryant as asserting an indebtedness of the amount stated to Allen; thus confirming the impression previously received from Allen's representations.

6. It is also found that on or about the 5th day of August Allen sold and conveyed to one Funk an undivided one-half of the Cherrioto Ranch, subject to the mortgage, for the sum of $5,000, Funk agreeing to assume and pay one-half of the amount then due under the mortgage. But it appears from the record that the sale was made on the 3d day of August, just 12 days after the execution of the deed of Bryant to Allen. One of the facts set up in the answer as constituting the fraud complained of is that at the time of the execution of the deed from Bryant to Allen, Allen was in negotiation for the sale of the ranch at a large profit, and from the evidence it fairly appears that this was the fact, and that the pendency of the negotiation was concealed from the defendant. But there is no direct finding on this point.

7. It is, however, found that Allen, in none of his transactions with the defendants in relation to the said real property or personalty, made any false or fraudulent representations or concealments whatsoever, or designed or intended to, or did, cheat said defendants, or either of them. But, in view of the admitted facts, and of the uncontradicted evidence, and of the relations existing between the parties, we are of the opinion that this finding cannot be sustained, and, on the whole, we are of the opinion that the consent of the defendants in the deed from them to Allen was the result of a mistake as to the amount due to Allen; that this mistake was known to Allen, if not produced by his misrepresentations made with the view of obtaining the deed; and that the deed was obtained by undue influence. Civ. Code, §§ 1565, 1567, subds. 3, 4, 5, 1575, 1577.

For these reasons, we are of the opinion that the judgment should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—ELEMENTS OF FORCIBLE ENTRY—BREAKING OPEN.

A person who fraudulently and without right entered into a dwelling house by means of a false key was liable for forcible entry, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1159, subd. 1, making every person guilty of forcible entry who, "by breaking open doors, windows, or other parts of a house, enters upon or into any real property."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Forcible Entry and Detainer, §§ 15–19.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; G. A. Gibbs, Judge.

Action by Jennie M. Winchester against A. E. Becker. From a judgment for plaintiff and order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Modified, and remanded to the lower court, with directions to grant new trial unless plaintiff, within 10 days, consents to the modification, and, upon filing of such consent, judgment and order denying a new trial affirmed.

G. P. Adams, for appellant. J. L. Murphey, for respondent.

SMITH, J. Appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

This is a suit for forcible entry on the plaintiff's land. The premises in controversy consist of a lot of land situate in the city of Los Angeles, with a six-room dwelling house thereon. On the record before us there can be no question as to the defendant's hostile entries upon the land in question on two several occasions, and that the entries were without justification, or that the land was owned and in the actual possession of the plaintiff at the time of the defendant's entries; at which time, also, it appears that the house was securely locked and the keys in the possession of the plaintiff, except the key of one back door, which was secreted over the door. The first entry was in the absence of the plaintiff through the back door with this key and on the 10th day of June. On the 12th the plaintiff found an agent of the defendant on the premises and, taking from him the key, ordered him off. The defendant then, through his agent, applied to plaintiff for the key, proposing to enter under a pretended agreement for a sale of the land on which a deposit of $100 had been paid. But the plaintiff repudiated the agreement and forbade the defendant's entry. This agreement contained no authority for the defendant to enter. The defendant thereupon again entered upon the premises through the front door, which he unlocked by means of a false key, and the finding of the court, which is fully sustained by the evidence, is that the defendant on the occasion mentioned "fraudulently and without right * * * went upon said premises and with force unlocked the doors of said house," etc., which is to be construed as, in effect, that he entered in the manner shown by the evidence as above stated. Other facts are alleged and found, but, leaving these out of view, the question is presented whether the defendant's entry made in the manner stated comes within the provisions of the first subdivision of section 1159 of the Code of Civil Procedure, by which every person is to be held to be guilty of a forcible entry, who "by breaking open doors, windows, or other parts of a house * * * enters upon or into any real property." This question we think must be answered in the affirmative. The meaning of the provision is that any opening of a closed door or window involving the use of force is to be regarded as "breaking open" the door or window or house. This was the construction given to the term "break" as entering into the common-law definition of burglary, and we see no reason why a different construction should be given to it in the provision now under consideration. Abbott's Law Dict., word "Break"; see, also, Webster's Dict., in the expression: "Open the door or I will break it open;" and also the definition of "House Breaking" in Pen. Code, § 461, as originally enacted, and in Act Feb. 27, 1864, St. 1863–64, p. 104, c. 114.

We do not find, however, any evidence in the record to sustain the finding of the court that the plaintiff suffered damage by reason of the taking and retaining of the possession of the premises in the sum of $150, or in any amount in excess of the sum of $45, which the court, in effect, finds was the value of the use and occupation during the month the premises were occupied by the defendant. The judgment should, therefore, be modified by striking therefrom "the sum of four hundred and fifty (450) dollars," as the amount adjudged, and inserting in lieu thereof "the sum of one hundred and thirty-five (135) dollars."

The case is remanded to the lower court, with directions to the court to grant a new trial, unless the plaintiff shall, within 10 days after the filing of the remittitur, file a written consent to the modification of the judgment, as above indicated, and, upon the filing of such consent, the judgment and order denying a new trial shall stand affirmed.

I concur: ALLEN, J.

GRAY, P. J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment of the court and in the suggested modification of the judgment of the court below. I place my concurrence, however, upon the ground that it seems to me that the evidence discloses that the defendant did not take forcible possession of the house in question, but that he entered the same without any lawful right so to do, and that there is evidence contained in the testimony of Miss Winchester to uphold the findings and decision of the court to the effect that, after this entry, without right he held possession of the house by force. The plaintiff testifies: "I did not see Mrs. Becker at the time I was talking to Mr. Becker at the house. He showed me the receipt and stepped out and kept forcing me out of the door onto the porch, and I was standing on the porch and the door was closed when he showed me the check with my signature." In my opinion, this is sufficient evidence of force to uphold the finding of forcible detainer.

HATCH et ux. v. McCLOUD RIVER LUMBER CO. (S. F. 3,641.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 14, 1906.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT—DEFECTS IN PREMISES—INJURIES TO OCCUPANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

Occupants of premises under a lease assumed the risk of injury from a wire extending from an electric light pole without the premises to an anchor about two feet within the premises which was so located at the time of the lease and was known to them.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Landlord and Tenant, § 630.]

2. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where a tenant and his wife had been in possession of premises for 16 months and knew of a wire extending from an electric light pole without the premises to an anchor about two feet within the premises and there was nothing to require the wife to go near the wire, she was guilty of contributory negligence in running against it in an evening, precluding any right to recovery for injuries therefrom.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco.

Action by Kimball I. Hatch and wife against the McCloud River Lumber Company. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Edward C. Harrison, for appellants. F. D. Madison, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an action to recover damages to the plaintiff Emma F. Hatch, wife of the plaintiff Kimball I. Hatch, arising from an injury alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained in the court below, and judgment rendered accordingly. The sole question presented by this appeal is the sufficiency of the complaint.

On May 29, 1900, the defendant let to the plaintiff Kimball I. Hatch a dwelling house and the lot on which it stood. The plaintiffs immediately took possession and remained in the occupancy of the premises until the injury occurred, which was on October 7, 1901. At the time the house was leased, an electric light pole was standing in the street, on the sidewalk, in front of the lot. From the top of this pole a stay wire or rope extended to the ground, within the lot so leased, at a point 2½ feet inside of the front line thereof, where it was fastened to an anchor fixed in the earth. This wire inclined at an angle of 45 degrees from the top of the pole to the ground, and crossed the front line of the lot about 2½ feet above the surface of the ground. The plaintiffs knew of the existence and position of this wire at the time of the lease. It was, of course, plainly visible in the daytime. The pole and wire belonged to the defendant, constituted no part of the leased premises, and was under the control of the defendant as a part of an electric lighting system maintained by it in the town where the premises were situated. At the point where the wire was fastened to the anchor, and a few inches above the ground, several sharp points or ends of wire protruded, which were dangerous to any person who might come in contact with them. They were so small and so near the ground that they were not easily discernible. On the 7th of October, 1901, between 7 and 8 o'clock in the evening, the plaintiff Emma F. Hatch, while leaving the premises, came in contact with the wire rope, was thereby tripped and caused to stumble and fall over the same, and in so doing, struck the protruding points aforesaid and was thereby injured severely. She was not aware of the existence of said points, until she came in contact with them, but she knew of the wire, and it is alleged that at the time she was "using all due care to avoid the same."

Under these circumstances, we are of the opinion that no actionable negligence on the part of the defendant is shown. So far as the wire rope is concerned, as distinguished from the small ends near the ground, the defendant was under no duty whatever to advise the plaintiffs regarding the danger therefrom, or to guard them from coming in contact therewith. The rope was on the premises at the time the lease was made, and the plaintiffs lived in the house for 16 months thereafter before the injury occurred, and they must have become extremely familiar with its location and appearance. The premises were let to the plaintiffs without guaranty or warranty in regard to this rope. Under such circumstances, the tenant in taking the premises assumes all risk arising from dangers which are obvious to ordinary observation. Gately v. Campbell, 124 Cal. 520, 57 Pac. 567; Brewster v. De Fremery, 33 Cal. 341. With regard to the sharp points or ends near the ground, it is apparent, from the facts stated in the complaint, that whatever injury the plaintiff, Emma, received therefrom was caused in part by her own negligence contributing thereto. Whatever injury was received from these sharp points was caused primarily by the fall, which occurred because of her walking against the wire rope. This fall was manifestly occasioned by her own negligence. The allegation that she was using all due care to avoid the wire is incompatible with the fact shown by the complaint that she had been for a long time familiar with the position of the wire. Being so familiar, it is apparent that, unless some extraordinary circumstances intervened, which made it necessary for her to walk close to the wire, it was entirely unnecessary for her to come in contact with it. No such extraordinary circumstances are alleged. The fact that, knowing the position of the wire, she nevertheless walked against it, when there was no necessity for going near it, proves that she could not have used due care to avoid it. The allegation of due care is, therefore, unavailing, and must be disregarded. It was her own neglect that caused her to fall, and that neglect contributed to the injury which she received from the sharp points at the bottom of the wire.

Conceding, though not deciding, that defendant was also guilty of neglect in allowing the points near the ground at the end of the wire to remain, without protection or guard, the case merely becomes one where the contributory negligence of the plaintiff in part caused her injury. In such cases the plaintiff cannot recover for the portion of the injury caused by the defendant's negligence.

The judgment is affirmed.

TITLE & DOCUMENT RESTORATION CO. v. KERRIGAN, Judge.

(S. F. 4,646.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 7, 1906. Rehearing Denied Jan. 5, 1907.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — DUE PROCESS OF LAW—SERVICE OF PROCESS.

Act June 30, 1906 (St. Extra Sess. 1906, p. 78, c. 59), providing for the establishment and quieting of title to real estate in case of the loss or destruction of public records by fire, flood, or earthquake, provides that one claiming an estate in real estate may bring an action in rem against all the world, describing the defendants as all persons claiming any interest in or lien upon the land described, provides for the issuing of a summons directed to all persons claiming an interest in or lien upon the real property described, and requiring them to appear. Plaintiff is required to file an affidavit setting forth the character of his interest, and that he does not know and has never been informed of any other person claiming any interest, or, if he does know and has been so informed, then the name and address of such person. The summons is required to be published in a newspaper of general circulation in the county, and there must be appended to the summons a memorandum giving the names of any persons who are known to the plaintiff to claim an interest adversely to him. If the affidavit discloses the name of any person claiming an interest adversely, the summons must be personally served on him, if he can be found in the state, and, if he resides out of the state, a copy of the summons must be sent to him by mail. If he resides within the state and cannot be with due diligence found therein before the expiration of the period of publication, notice must be mailed to him, and in addition to the service by publication and personal service and mailing a copy of the summons must be posted in a conspicuous place on each parcel of the property. On the completion of the publication, etc., the court is given complete jurisdiction to determine the title. Held, that the statute is not unconstitutional as not affording due process of law either because of the service provided for, or on the ground that the proceedings are not judicial.

2. SAME — DISTRIBUTION OF GOVERNMENTAL FUNCTIONS—JUDICIAL POWERS.

The statute is not invalid as violative of Const. art. 3, § 1, dividing the powers of government into three departments, legislative, executive, and judicial, and prohibiting the exercise by one department of the functions appertaining to either of the others, on the theory that the action provided for is not judicial.

3. STATUTES—SPECIAL LAWS—JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS.

Neither because the procedure provided for is distinctive, nor because the statute applies only where the records have been destroyed by earthquake, fire, or flood, is the statute violative of Const. art. 4, § 25, subds. 3, 33, prohibiting the Legislature from passing any local or special laws regulating the practice of courts, and in cases where a general law can be made applicable.

In bank. Petition by the Title & Document Restoration Company for mandamus to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, and the Honorable Frank H. Kerrigan, as judge thereof, to compel the making of an order for publication, under the act of June, 1906, in relation to the establishment and quieting of title to real estate in case of the loss or destruction of public records. Peremptory writ issued.

Garret W. McEnerney, Walter Rothchild, Joseph H. Mayer, Joseph Hutchinson, and James S. Hutchinson, for petitioner. Charles S. Wheeler, J. F. Bowie, Van Fleet & Mastick, William H. H. Hart, and Bishop & Hoefler, amici curiæ. John Garber, Gaillard Stoney, and John J. Lermen, for respondent. Page, McCutchen & Knight, A. E. Bolton, C. S. Farquar, and William B. Beaizley, amici curiæ.

SLOSS, J. In June, 1906, the Legislature of this state, having been convened in extraordinary session to legislate concerning certain needs developed by the disaster of April 18, 1906, enacted, among other statutes, one entitled "An act to provide for the establishment and quieting of title to real property in case of the loss or destruction of public records."

The present proceeding is an application for a writ of mandate. The petitioner herein filed a complaint, as provided by the act above referred to, and applied to the respondent, judge of the superior court in which its complaint had been filed, for an order for publication of summons. The respondent declined to make the order upon the ground that the act in question violated certain provisions of both the federal and state Constitutions. The purpose of this proceeding being to compel the judge of the lower court to make the order for publication, as requested, the real, and substantially the only, question here involved is whether or not the above-mentioned act is a valid exercise of legislative power. The facts alleged in the petition are not denied, and the matter now comes before the court upon a demurrer to the petition. In order to properly state and discuss the constitutional points made in support of the demurrer, it will be well to give a somewhat full statement of the provisions of the act in question.

The act provides that whenever the public records in the office of a county recorder are lost or destroyed, in whole or in any material part, by flood, fire, or earthquake, any person who claims an estate of inheritance or for life in, and who is by himself or his tenant, or other person, in the actual and peaceable possession of any real property in such county, may bring and maintain "an action in rem against all the world" in the superior court of the county where the land is situate "to establish his title to such property and to determine all adverse claims thereto." Section 1. The action is commenced by the filing of a verified complaint in which the party commencing the same is named as plaintiff, and the defendants are described as "all persons claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof." The complaint is to contain a statement of the facts enumerated in section 1 of the act, together with a particular description of the real property, and a specification of the estate or interest of the plaintiff therein. Section 2. The act provides for the issuing of a summons upon the filing of the complaint. The summons is directed to "all persons claiming an interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof," and requires them to appear within three months after the first publication of the summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, they have upon the real property in question, a description of which is to be contained in the summons. At the time of the filing of the complaint the plaintiff must file with the same his affidavit, fully and explicitly setting forth and showing (1) the character of his interest, the duration of its existence, and from whom it was obtained; (2) whether or not he has ever made any conveyance affecting the property, and, if so, when and to whom, and a statement of any and all subsisting mortgages, deeds of trust, and other liens thereon; (3) that he does not know and has never been informed of any other person who claims or may claim any interest in or lien upon the property adversely to him, or, if he does know and has been informed of any such person, then the name and address of such person. If the plaintiff is unable to state one or more of the matters required, he shall set forth and show fully and explicitly the reasons for such inability. This affidavit is made to constitute a part of the judgment roll. Section 5. The summons is required to be published in a newspaper of general circulation published in the county in which the action is brought, the particular newspaper to be designated by an order of the court or a judge thereof. The summons is to be published at least once a week for a period of two months, and to each publication there must be appended a memorandum giving the date of the first publication of the summons. There must also be appended to the summons a memorandum giving the names of any persons who are known to the plaintiff to claim any interest in the property adversely to the plaintiff, if the names of such persons appear in the affidavit filed with the complaint. Section 4. If the affidavit discloses the name of any person claiming any interest adversely to the plaintiffs, the summons must be personally served upon such person, if he can be found within the state, together with a copy of the complaint and a copy of the affidavit and memoranda provided for in section 4, and, if the person disclosed by the affidavit resides out of the state, a copy of the summons, memoranda, complaint, and affidavit must be sent to him by mail within 15 days after the first publication of the summons. If he resides within the state and cannot with due diligence be found therein before the expiration of the period of the publication of summons, then the copies shall be mailed to him forthwith upon the expiration of the period of publication. Section 6. In addition to the service by publication and the personal service and mailing above spoken of, the act provides that a copy of the summons and of the memoranda referred to shall be posted in a conspicuous place on each separate parcel of the property described in the complaint within 15 days after the first publication of the summons. Section 4. Upon the completion of the publication and posting of the summons and its service upon and mailing to the persons, if any, upon whom it is directed to be personally served, "the court shall have full and complete jurisdiction over the plaintiff and the said property and of the person of every one having or claiming any estate, right, title or interest in or to, or lien upon, said property or any part thereof, and shall be deemed to have obtained the possession and control of such property for the purposes of the action and shall have full and complete jurisdiction to render the judgment therein which is provided for in this act." Section 7. Any person having, or claiming, any estate, right, title, or interest in, or lien upon, the property, may, at any time within three months from the first publication of the summons, appear and make himself a party to the action by pleading to the complaint by a verified answer setting forth the estate or interest claimed. Section 8. The plaintiff and every defendant claiming any affirmative relief must at the time of filing his pleading record in the office of the recorder a notice of the pendency of the action containing a particular description of the property affected, and this notice is to be recorded in a book devoted exclusively to the recordation of said notices, and is to be entered upon a map of the land, to be kept by the recorder for that purpose, with a reference to the date, book, and page of the record of such notice. Section 9. No judgment is to be given by default, but the court must require proof of the facts alleged in the pleadings. Section 10. The judgment, when given, "shall ascertain and determine all of the estate, rights, title, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, or whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description, and shall be binding and conclusive upon every person who at the time of the commencement of the action had or claimed any estate, right, title or interest in or to said property, or any part thereof, and upon every person claiming under him by title subsequent to the commencement of the action." A certified copy of the judgment is to be recorded in the office of the recorder. Section 11. All provisions and rules of law relating to evidence, pleading, practice, new trial, and appeal applicable to other civil actions are, except as otherwise provided in the act, made applicable to this action. Section 12. The act provides that, where one judgment under it has been entered as to any real property, no other action relative to the same property shall be tried until proof is first made to the court that all persons who appeared in the first action have been served with the papers in the new action, at least a month before the expiration of the time to plead. Section 14. Executors, administrators, guardians, or other persons holding the possession of property in the right of another may maintain the action as plaintiff, or appear and defend. Section 15. The remedies provided for by the act are to be deemed cumulative, and in addition to any other remedy now or hereafter provided by law for quieting or establishing the title to real property. Section 17. All actions authorized by the act must be commenced before July 1, 1909. Section 18.

The general purpose of the statute is plain. It was intended to provide a method whereby owners in possession of real estate in counties where the records are destroyed to such an extent as to make it impossible to trace a record title may secure a decree which shall furnish a publicly authenticated evidence of title. It is hardly necessary to point out that under the system of registration of land titles, which has grown up in all of the states of this Union, it is practically essential to the security of ownership in real property that there exist some method by which the title can be made clear of record. Without regard to the effect of duly recorded instruments as constructive notice, whether or not the record remains in actual existence, the registration of titles has become so thoroughly imbedded in our system of dealing with lands that a title which cannot be traced and established by some form of public record is practically unmerchantable. It is, of course, true that for many centuries lands have been transferred in England, whence we have, in the main, derived our system of real property law, without any considerable resort to a public recording scheme. But in this country the system of registration has become so completely established that the courts can take judicial notice of the fact that in the great majority of cases parties dealing in real estate rely for the proof of their titles upon the chain of title that will be disclosed by an examination of the records, and in a small degree, if at all, upon the possession of the original instruments composing that chain. In many instances, indeed, these instruments are not preserved for any great length of time.

It is also matter of common knowledge that in the city and county of San Francisco, at least, if not in other counties, the disaster of April last worked so great a destruction of the public records as to make it impossible to trace any title with completeness of certainty. That some provision was necessary to enable the holders and owners of real estate in this city to secure to themselves such evidence of title as would enable them, not only to defend their possession, but to enjoy and exercise the equally important right of disposition, is clear. These considerations are suggested, not with a view to arguing that the necessity for some act of this kind affords any ground for disregarding constitutional provisions, if the statute be found to conflict with such provisions, but rather as a guide to determine the real scope and purpose of the act, and to emphasize the rule so often laid down by all the courts that in passing upon the constitutionality of an act of the Legislature every presumption and intendment in favor of the validity of the enactment are to be given effect.

1. One of the principal objections made to the act is that by the decree persons who may have an interest in the land are deprived of their property without due process of law. This contention is based upon the proposition that the proceeding created by this statute is a proceeding in personam, and not in rem, and that in personal actions a binding judgment cannot be rendered against the persons to be affected without giving them personal notice of the proceeding and an opportunity to be heard. It is conceded by the learned counsel for respondent, as it needs must be, that, if this is strictly a proceeding in rem, such personal notice is not required. Undoubtedly the act, so far as the language of the Legislature can have this effect, attempted and intended to create a proceeding which should have the force and effect of a proceeding in rem. Section 1 describes the proceeding as "an action in rem against all the world." Section 11 provides that the judgment shall be binding and conclusive upon every person who at the time of the commencement of the action had or claimed any estate, right, title, or interest in or to the property.

It is, however, argued that, if the proceeding is in its essential features one in personam, the Legislature cannot, by merely designating it "in rem," cut off the rights of persons interested, without providing as to them such notice and opportunity to be heard as are requisite to constitute due process in personal actions. That the mere title or designation which is given by the Legislature to a proceeding cannot change its substantial character, or alter the rights of parties to it, is, of course, plain enough. What, then, in its essential characteristics, is a proceeding in rem? If, as contended by respondent, it is one "to enforce a liability for which the res is liable, irrespective of who owns it, such a liability that the res can properly be impleaded as the respondent who is liable" (quoting the language of Loring, J., dissenting, in Tyler v. Judges of Court of Registration [Mass.] 55 N. E. 812, 51 L. R. A. 433), the action provided for by the present statute does not come within the definition. But neither do some other proceedings conceded to be strictly in rem, such as the probate of wills, the distribution of estates, and the special proceeding created by section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to "ascertain and declare the rights of all persons" to an estate. Even though, viewed as a matter of historical analogy, there may have been at common law no proceeding in rem which was at all similar to the one here provided, it may be asked why the state, in exercising its control over the ascertainment and settlement of titles to real estate within its borders, may not create a suit in rem, in which the court assumes control of the land, and which has as its primary purpose the settlement of such titles as to all the world. In substance—and the constitutional requirement of due process deals with substance rather than form—the action does not differ in character from the action to determine heirship (Code Civ. Proc. § 1664), which has always been regarded as a proceeding in rem (see In re Blythe's Estate, 110 Cal. 231, 234, 42 Pac. 643), and sufficient to bar the rights of all persons claiming as heirs of the decedent, whether or not they are named in the complaint or personally served with summons. It may be conceded, however, that apart from an expression of Chief Justice Holmes in Tyler v. Judges, supra, there is no authority directly supporting the proposition that a proceeding of the kind created by this act is strictly in rem. And we need not enter into a further discussion of the point, since we do not consider it necessary in this case to determine whether or not the action is one strictly in rem.

In any view the proceeding contemplated by the act is quasi in rem—that is to say, the purpose of the proceeding is not to establish an "infinite personal liability" against any defendant—but is merely to affect the interest of the defendant in specific real property within the state which has at the outset of the proceeding been brought within the control of the court. It is thoroughly well established that the constitutional requirement of due process is as to such actions satisfied by a substituted service of summons, at least as to known and designated defendants who cannot be found within the state. The most frequently cited authority upon the question of the power of a state to affect the interests of nonresidents by judgments rendered upon a substituted service of summons is Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. Ed. 565. In that case the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Field, said regarding the question of jurisdiction in cases of service by publication: "Such service may also be sufficient in cases where the object of the action is to reach and dispose of property in the state, or of some interest therein, by enforcing a contract or lien respecting the same, or to partition it among different owners, or, when the public is a party, to condemn and appropriate it for a public purpose. In other words, such service may answer in all actions which are substantially proceedings in rem. * * * It is true that in a strict sense a proceeding in rem is one taken directly against property, and has for its object the disposition of the property without reference to the title of individual claimants, but, in a larger and more general sense, the term is applied to actions between parties, where the direct object is to reach and dispose of property owned by them, or of some interest therein. Such are cases commenced by attachment against the property of debtors, or instituted to partition real estate, foreclose a mortgage or enforce a lien. So far as they affect property in the state, they are substantially proceedings in rem in the broad sense which we have mentioned." Following the rules declared in Pennoyer v. Neff, it has universally been held that even in a purely personal action, where property within the state has been attached at the outset of a proceeding, the court may by publication of summons obtain jurisdiction to the extent of subjecting the attached property to the payment of the claim in suit.

The present proceeding has some of the characteristics of a suit to quiet title, a form of action well established as a branch of equity jurisdiction. While in the exercise of its inherent equity jurisdiction a court of chancery acts only in personam, it is no doubt competent for the Legislature, so far as the constitutional provision regarding due process of law is concerned, to confer upon courts of equity a jurisdiction which shall, as to property situate within that state, operate upon it in some way other than by merely directing the defendants to do or refrain from doing some act concerning the property. The state has power to enact statutes under which the interests of persons in property within the state shall be affected so far as that property alone is concerned, and the action to quiet title, although originally under the old chancery practice merely a personal action against the defendant, may by statute be so extended as to permit the court to bind the interest of the defendant in the property, even though such defendant may not have been personally served with process within the state. Arndt v. Griggs, 134 U. S. 316, 10 Sup. Ct. 557, 33 L. Ed. 918, was a case involving the validity of a judgment obtained against a nonresident on publication of summons under statutes of Nebraska similar to our own (Code Civ. Proc. § 738 et seq.), authorizing persons claiming title to real estate to bring actions against any person or persons claiming an adverse estate or interest therein for the purpose of determining such estate or interest and quieting the title to said real estate. The court said: "But it is earnestly contended that no decree in such a case rendered on service by publication only is valid or can be recognized in the federal courts. * * * The propositions are that an action to quiet title is a suit in equity, that equity acts upon the person, and that the person is not brought into court by service by publication alone. While these propositions are doubtless correct as statements of the general rules respecting bills to quiet title, and proceedings in courts of equity, they are not applicable or controlling here. The question is not what a court of equity, by virtue of its general powers and in the absence of a statute, might do, but it is, what jurisdiction has a state over titles to real estate within its limits, and what jurisdiction may it give by a statute to its own courts to determine the validity and extent of the claims of nonresidents to such real estate. If a state has no power to bring a nonresident into its courts for any purposes by publication, it is impotent to protect the titles to real estate within its limits held by its own citizens; and a cloud cast upon such title by a claim of a nonresident would remain for all time a cloud, unless such nonresident shall voluntarily come into its courts for the purpose of having it adjudicated. But no such imperfections attend the sovereignty of the state. It has control over property within its limits; and the condition of ownership of real estate therein, whether the owner be stranger or citizen, is subject to its rules concerning the holding, the transfer, liability to obligations, private or public, and the modes of establishing titles thereto. It cannot bring the person of a nonresident within its limits—its process goes not out beyond its borders—but it may determine the extent of his title to real estate within its limits; and for the purpose of such determination may provide any reasonable methods of imparting notice. The well-being of every community requires that the title to real estate therein shall be secure, and that there be convenient and certain methods of determining any unsettled questions respecting it." And in Perkins v. Wakeham, 86 Cal. 580, 25 Pac. 51, 21 Am. St. Rep. 67, this court, in applying the same rule to a similar case, said: "Unless the method of giving notice above prescribed [i. e., by publication under section 412, Code Civ. Proc.] is unreasonable or in conflict with some provision of the Constitution or principle of natural justice, it cannot be held invalid. In determining the question of its validity, the nature of the action and the effect of the judgment must be considered. While it is true, as a general proposition, that an action to quiet title is an action in equity which acts upon the person, it is also true that the state has power to regulate the tenure of immovable property within its limits, the conditions of its ownership, and the modes of establishing the same, whether the owner be citizen or stranger. While a decree quieting title is not in rem, strictly speaking, it fixes and settles the title to real estate, and to that extent certainly partakes of the nature of a judgment in rem." There may be some expressions in the opinion in Hart v. Sansom, 110 U. S. 151, 3 Sup. Ct. 586, 28 L. Ed. 101, which, on their face, conflict with the rule as declared in the two cases just cited. In Arndt v. Griggs, however, the court carefully explained the Sansom Case, and pointed out that that case had to do with the effect of a judgment obtained on publication of summons in a purely personal action. Similarly, in Lynch v. Murphy, 161 U. S. 247, 251, 16 Sup. Ct. 523, 40 L. Ed. 688, it was said: "The Hart Case was explained in Arndt v. Griggs, 134 U. S. 316, 10 Sup. Ct. 557, 33 L. Ed. 918, in which last case it was held that the duty of determining unsettled questions respecting the title to real estate was local in its nature, to be discharged in such mode as might be provided by the state in which the land was situated, where such mode did not conflict with some special inhibition of the Constitution and was not against natural justice; and we held that nothing inconsistent with this doctrine was decided in Hart v. Sansom." See, also, Roller v. Holly, 176 U. S. 398, 20 Sup. Ct. 410, 44 L. Ed. 520; Bennett v. Fenton (C. C.) 41 Fed. 283, 10 L. R. A. 500; Venable v. Dutch, 37 Kan. 515, 15 Pac. 520, 1 Am. St. Rep. 260; Dillon v. Heller, 39 Kan. 599, 18 Pac. 693; McLaughlin v. McCrory, 55 Ark. 442, 18 S. W. 762, 29 Am. St. Rep. 56; Harris v. Palmore, 74 Ga. 273; Lane v. Innes, 43 Minn. 137, 45 N. W. 4; Shepherd v. Ware, 46 Minn. 174, 48 N. W. 773, 24 Am. St. Rep. 212; Lantry v. Parker, 37 Neb. 353, 55 N. W. 962; Sloane v. Martin, 145 N. Y. 524, 40 N. E. 217, 28 L. R. A. 347, 45 Am. St. Rep. 630; Roller v. Holley, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 636, 35 S. W. 1074.

So far, then, as the procedure authorized by the act under discussion affects the rights of persons known and designated in the proceedings who could not, on account of nonresidence or for other sufficient reason, be personally served with summons within the state, it cannot, in view of these adjudications, be said that the service by posting, publication, and mailing fell short of that due process of law which is applicable to this sort of proceeding. The objection that under the act no persons need be named as defendants in the title of the action does not appear to us to have any bearing upon the question of due process of law, so far as known claimants are concerned. The constitutional guaranty of due process requires that in actions of this character persons whose interest in the land may be affected must be given such notice of the pendency of the proceeding and of the fact that their interests may be affected as is reasonable and appropriate to the nature of the case. If it be once conceded, as it must be, that such notice may, as to known claimants who cannot me personally served, be given by publication, we think it unimportant that the person to whom such notice is given is not named in the caption of the complaint or the summons. The law requires him to be named in the affidavits and in the memoranda attached to the summons. If any notice whatever reaches such person, it will be, whether through the posting upon the premises, or the publication, or the service by mail, a notice which contains his name and advises him that his interest in the described property is involved in the proceeding, and that, in order to defend such interest, he must appear and plead within a given time. We see no reason why, so far as such designated claimants are concerned, the notice prescribed by the act does not satisfy every requisite of due process of law.

The principal contention upon this question of due process is that the act is unconstitutional, in that it seeks to bar by the decree the rights of unknown owners; that is, those who are not alleged in the complaint or the affidavit to claim any interest in the property, and who cannot have any notice of the fact that their rights are involved other than the general notice given by the posting and the publication. If by a substituted service of any sort a court may be given power to adjudicate the rights of unknown claimants in a proceeding of this character, it seems plain that the notice to such claimants here provided is sufficient. All substituted service must rest upon the ground of necessity, and, where it is permissible at all, it must be such as would be reasonably likely to bring the fact of the pendency and the purpose of the proceeding to the attention of those interested. Where, as here, the summons describing the nature of the action, the property involved, the name of the plaintiff, and the relief sought is posted upon the property, and is published in a newspaper for two months, and a "lis pendens" containing the same particulars is recorded in the recorder's office and entered upon the recorder's map of the property, we cannot doubt that, so far as concerns the possible claimants who are not known to the plaintiff, the notice prescribed by the act is as complete and full as, from the nature of the case, could reasonably be expected.

Indeed, the learned counsel for respondent, while they make some criticism upon details of the act regarding the notice, take their stand upon a broader proposition, and contend that in a proceeding which is not strictly in rem it is not within the power of the Legislature to authorize on any form of process a decree which shall by its own force cut off the rights of persons not named or made parties to the proceeding. It is claimed that under the Constitutions in force in American jurisdictions, the rights of unnamed persons who may claim an interest in real estate cannot be cut off by any judicial proceeding, except by one which makes the adjudication against them final only upon their failure to come in and assert their rights within a specified time after the judgment or decree. In such proceeding, the decree does not operate ex proprio vigore, but becomes the starting point of a statutory period of limitation, and the right is extinguished by failure to assert it within this period. In a way, the procedure thus outlined is analogous to the common-law fine, but because such method of accomplishing the result may have been the only one known to the common law it does not follow that other methods may not be devised by the Legislature without exceeding the limits of due process of law. No doubt the forms of procedure in common use at the time the Constitutions were adopted must be taken to have been understood by the framers as embraced within the terms "due process of law." But in prohibiting the taking of life, liberty or property without due process of law those who adopted these Constitutions did not intend to provide that the details of practice and procedure then existing should forever remain unchanged. The Legislature may provide entirely novel and unprecedented methods of procedure, provided that they afford the parties affected the substantial securities against arbitrary and unjust spoliation which are embraced within the system of jurisprudence prevailing throughout the land. "It follows," say the Supreme Court of the United States in Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 4 Sup. Ct. 111, 28 L. Ed. 232, "that any legal proceeding enforced by public authority, whether sanctioned by age and custom, or newly devised in the discretion of the legislative power, in furtherance of the general public good, which regards and preserves these principles of liberty and justice, must be held to be in due process of law." It is not, therefore, a sufficient objection to the action created by this statute to say that no precisely similar proceeding was known to the common law.

Applying the principles which have led the courts in cases like Arndt v. Griggs and

Perkins v. Wakeham to sustain judgments quieting titles against nonresidents upon substituted service, why should not the Legislature have power to give similar effect to such judgments against unknown claimants where the notice is reasonably full and complete? The validity of such judgments against known residents is based upon the grounds that the state has power to provide for the determination of titles to real estate within its borders, and that, as against nonresident defendants or others who cannot be served in the state, a substituted service is permissible, as being the only service possible. These grounds apply with equal force to unknown claimants. The power of the state as to titles should not be limited to settling them as against persons named. In order to exercise this power to its fullest extent, it is necessary that it should be made to operate on all interests, known and unknown. As was said by Holmes, C. J., in Tyler v. Judges of the Court of Registration, 175 Mass. 71, 55 N. E. 812, 51 L. R. A. 433, in speaking of a statute which in the particular under discussion was similar to ours: "If it does not satisfy the Constitution, a judicial proceeding to clear titles against all the world hardly is possible; for the very meaning of such a proceeding is to get rid of unknown as well as known claimants—indeed, certainty against the unknown may be said to be its chief end—and unknown claimants cannot be dealt with by personal service upon the claimant."

Proceedings not strictly in rem, but intended to have the effect of barring unknown claimants who are brought in only by publication or other substituted service, are not entirely new in our Legislation. Leaving out of consideration proceedings for the probate of wills, for distribution of estates, escheat and tax cases, and the special proceeding to determine heirship provided by section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure, all of which are claimed by respondent to be distinguishable from the case at bar, in that, as claimed, they are proceedings strictly in rem, we find in our statutes, in sections 749 to 751 of the Code of Civil Procedure, enacted in 1901, a statutory action to determine adverse claims to and clouds upon title to real property as against known defendants, and "also all other persons unknown claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the complaint adverse to plaintiff's ownership or any cloud upon plaintiff's title thereto." It is true that the constitutionality of these sections has not yet been passed upon by this court. But that the state may confer upon its courts jurisdiction to declare title to real property within the state to be vested in the plaintiff as against other claimants, known or unknown, upon substituted service, has been held by the courts of several states in well-considered cases. In Shepherd v. Ware, 46 Minn. 174, 48 N. W. 773, 24 Am. St. Rep. 212, the court upheld a statute authorizing an action to quiet title and determine adverse claims, and providing for including as defendants, in addition to persons appearing of record or known to have a claim to the lands in controversy, "also all other persons or parties unknown claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real estate described in the complaint herein." Service was authorized to be made upon such unknown defendants by publication. A judgment obtained pursuant to the statute was held to bind persons not named in the complaint or personally served, the court saying: "The Legislature may, in its discretion, provide for substituted service in case of necessity, or where personal notice is for any reason impracticable, in an action where the controversy relates to property which is within the jurisdiction of the court, and with a reasonable exercise of such legislative discretion the courts will not assume to interfere." This case was followed in McClymond v. Noble, 84 Minn. 329, 87 N. W. 838, 87 Am. St. Rep. 354. In State v. Westfall, 85 Minn. 437, 89 N. W. 175, 57 L. R. A. 297, 89 Am. St. Rep. 571, the court said: "It is now the settled doctrine of this court that the district courts of this state are clothed with full power to inquire into and conclusively adjudicate the state of the title of all land within their respective jurisdictions, after actual notice to all the known claimants within the jurisdiction of the court, and constructive notice by publication of the summons to all other persons or parties, whether known or unknown, having or appearing to have some interest or claim thereto. The proceeding provided for by the act in question is such an one. It is substantially one in rem, the subject-matter of which is the state of the title of land within the jurisdiction of the court, and the provisions of the act for serving the summons and giving notice of the pendency of the proceedings are full and complete, and satisfy both the state and federal Constitutions. To hold otherwise would be to hold that the courts of this state cannot in any manner acquire jurisdiction to clear and quiet title to real estate by a decree binding all interests and all persons or parties, known or unknown." Tyler v. Judges of the Court of Registration, supra, was a proceeding brought to test the constitutionality of an act of the Legislature of Massachusetts providing a method of land registration based upon the "Torrens System," so-called. It was provided in the act that the decree for registration "shall bind the land and quiet title thereto," and "shall be conclusive upon and against all persons," whether named in the proceedings or not. The court held that the act did not violate the constitutional provisions as to due process of law. Chief Justice Holmes, who delivered the opinion of the court, expressed the view that the proceeding was one in rem in the most limited sense of the term. The majority of the court did not concur in this view, but did agree that whether or not the proceeding was strictly in rem the requirement of due process was satisfied by giving to parties known, or who by reasonable effort could be known, notice by personal service or its equivalent, and to parties unknown notice by publication. People v. Simon, 176 Ill. 165, 52 N. E. 910, 44 L. R. A. 801, 68 Am. St. Rep. 175, involved the validity of the act of 1897, establishing the "Torrens System" in Illinois. The law was upheld, and while the language of the opinion is not, perhaps, entirely clear, a careful reading of what was said on the point under discussion leads us to the conclusion that the court intended to hold, and did hold, that there was no violation of the Constitution in the provisions of the act, coupled with those of the general law of Illinois, authorizing service by publication as against unknown owners and nonresidents.

It is not to be denied that authority, and that of a high character, is cited in opposition to the views just expressed. The opinion of Justice Loring, dissenting in Tyler v. Judges, supra, and that of Vice-Chancellor Stevens in Hill v. Henry (N. J. Ch.) 57 Atl. 554, both relied on by respondent, are careful and elaborate expositions of the law. They rest their conclusion, however, upon the proposition that the proceeding in question is not strictly in rem. For the reasons heretofore stated, we do not regard this ground, if it be well taken, as determinative of the question involved. In State v. Guilbert, 56 Ohio St. 575, 47 N. E. 551, 38 L. R. A. 519, 60 Am. St. Rep. 756, the court declared the Ohio "Torrens Law" to be unconstitutional. While there is in the opinion some language which lends apparent support to the contentions of respondent, the fact is that the law there involved did not require personal service of summons or notice even upon resident claimants, whose existence, names, and places of abode were all known to the plaintiff or petitioner. The same defect attached to the statutes which were declared null in Brown v. Board, 50 Miss. 471, and Webster v. Reid, 11 How. (U. S.) 437, 13 L. Ed. 761. That, as to such defendants, a service by publication is not sufficient to constitute due process of law, in a proceeding not strictly in rem, must be admitted. And in this connection it may be well to notice the contention of respondents, that, by the terms of the act now under consideration, the plaintiff in the proposed action may include among "unknown claimants" those who, with reasonable diligence on his part, might have become known to him. It is no doubt true that so far as substituted service upon a class of unknown claimants is permitted at all, in proceedings which are merely quasi in rem, it rests upon the ground of necessity, and that this necessity will not justify the omission of personal service upon all who could with reasonable diligence be ascertained and found. This principle is recognized even in the cases which sustain the power to bind "unknown owners" by substituted service in actions of the character now under consideration. Tyler v. Judges, supra; Shepherd v. Ware, supra. But we think that, on a proper construction, the act under examination does require the plaintiff to designate and to serve as known claimants all whom with reasonable diligence he could ascertain to be claimants. It is not clear, as claimed by petitioner, that section 5 of the act requires, in the affidavit, a statement of the examination and inquiry made by plaintiff to enable him to aver that "he does not know and has never been informed of" any person claiming adversely. But, apart from the affidavit, the evident purpose of the act is to secure, so far as possible, actual notice of the proceeding to all known claimants—by personal service if they reside and can be found within the state, by mailing, if they cannot be so found or are nonresidents. We have no doubt that, where the statute is thus careful to secure actual notice to known claimants, it should not be construed as intended to permit a plaintiff to willfully or negligently close his eyes to the means of knowledge and thus secure a decree by publication and posting alone, as against persons whose identity he might have learned by the use of due effort. For the purposes of this statute the adverse claimants whom plaintiff "knows or of whom he has been informed" include all as to whom he would by reasonable inquiry have had knowledge or information. It is unnecessary to multiply authorities in support of the well-settled rule that "the means of knowledge is equivalent to knowledge." Civ. Code, § 19; Wood v. Carpenter, 101 U. S. 135, 25 L. Ed. 807; Shain v. Sresovich, 104 Cal. 402, 38 Pac. 51. The rule applies wherever the circumstances impose upon the party the duty of inquiry (Bank of Mendocia v. Baker, 82 Cal. 114, 22 Pac. 1037, 6 L. R. A. 833; Prouty v. Devin, 118 Cal. 258, 50 Pac. 380), and we are satisfied that the statute in question imposes upon the party seeking to proceed under it the duty of inquiry as to the names and residences of all persons who may claim an adverse interest in the property. Leigh v. Green, 64 Neb. 533, 90 N. W. 255, 101 Am. St. Rep. 592; Mulvey v. Gibbons, 87 Ill. 367; citing, further, Farnham v. Thomas, 56 Vt. 33. So construed, the statute does not, nor can an action prosecuted under it, deprive any person of his property without due process of law.

2. It is strongly urged for the respondent that the "action" contemplated by the statute is not a judicial, but an administrative, proceeding. The disposition of such proceeding being, by the act, conferred upon the superior court, it is claimed that there is a violation of the provision of the state Constitution (article 3, § 1) dividing the powers of government into three departments—the legislative, executive and judicial—and prohibiting the exercise by any one of these departments of functions appertaining to either of the others. It is also claimed as another result from the same premise that to divest property rights by a proceeding which is not judicial is not "due process of law." To maintain the position that the proceeding is not judicial, the argument is advanced that the jurisdiction of the court is (at least in cases where there is no "known" adverse claimant) invoked upon a mere allegation of the petitioner's right or title, without any assertion that such right is assailed or disputed by any one, and that in such cases the decree rendered is a mere declaration of right, made, substantially, upon an ex parte application. It is not to be disputed that, as a general proposition, the judicial function is the determination of controversies between parties, and that the courts will not concern themselves with settling abstract questions of law which may never be involved in an actual dispute regarding property or other rights. Quotations to this effect may be found in a multitude of cases, many of which are cited in the briefs. But it is not to be understood that it is never the exercise of a judicial function for a court to act upon the application of a party who seeks some form of relief, even though, at the outset of the proceeding, no person is named or designated as opposing the granting of such relief. "It is certainly clear as a general rule," says Selden, J., in Cooper's Case, 22 N. Y. 86, "that whenever the law confers a right, and authorizes an application to a court of justice to enforce that right, the proceedings upon such an application are to be regarded as of a judicial nature." In the present case there is a provision for notice to all persons interested in opposing the plaintiff's application, and an opportunity to them to come in and oppose it. There are, in our law, many instances of proceedings which are analogous to the one under discussion, and they have uniformly been regarded as judicial. Thus, we do not question that the superior court exercises judicial functions in granting letters of administration, or admitting a will to probate, or ordering the sale of property of decedents, or distributing estates of decedents, or determining and declaring heirship, notwithstanding the suggestion made in one of the briefs that probate proceedings are "administrative." At any rate, it cannot be denied that such proceedings are judicial, where, in response to the published or posted notice, some person interested appears to contest the application, although, at the outset, the petition does not, in any of the instances cited, disclose a "controversy," or an "invasion of the petitioner's right" in any sense in which such elements are not present in the action brought under the statute now being considered. A petition for change of name (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1275–1279) discloses neither controversy nor an actual or threatened denial by any one of petitioner's right, yet such proceeding is judicial. In re Societe Francaise, 123 Cal. 525, 56 Pac. 458.

Indeed, so far as this court is concerned, the question would seem to be foreclosed by the repeated decisions holding the proceeding for the confirmation of the organization of irrigation districts (St. 1889, p. 212, c. 178) to be judicial, and properly committed to the superior court for determination. Cullen v. Glendora Water Co., 113 Cal. 503, 39 Pac. 769, 45 Pac. 822, 1047; People v. Linda Vista Irrigation District, 128 Cal. 477, 61 Pac. 86; People v. Perris Irrigation District, 132 Cal. 289, 64 Pac. 399, 773; People v. Perris Irrigation District, 142 Cal. 601, 76 Pac. 381. In People v. Linda Vista Irrigation District, supra, this court adhered to its earlier views regarding the construction and effect of the confirmatory statute of 1889, notwithstanding the suggestion of Brewer, J., in Tregea v. Modesto Irrigation District, 164 U. S. 179, 17 Sup. Ct. 52, 41 L. Ed. 395, to the effect that the proceeding for confirmation presented a mere moot case, not calling for judicial consideration. But even the acceptance of the views of Justice Brewer would not require us to hold that the proceeding here involved is not judicial. The action or special proceeding now in question is devised, as has been stated, for the purpose of establishing a title which is in fact good, but which is not deducible of record. That a court of equity may remedy such defect by a decree, although there is no actual controversy as to the title, was held in Sharon v. Tucker, 144 U. S. 533, 12 Sup. Ct. 720, 36 L. Ed. 532, the court saying: "The title of the complainants is not controverted by the defendants, nor is it assailed by any action for the possession of the property, and this is not a suit to put an end to any litigation of the kind. It is a suit to establish the title of the complainants as matter of record—that is, by a judicial determination of its validity—and to enjoin the assertion by the defendants of a title to the same property from the former owners, which has been lost by the adverse possession of the parties through whom the complainants claim." See, also, Blight's Heirs v. Banks' Heirs, 6 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 192, 17 Am. Dec. 136. And this court has held that in an action to quiet title under sections 738 and 739 of the Code of Civil Procedure the absence of a finding that the defendants asserted a claim adverse to the plaintiff is immaterial. Bulwer Cons. Min. Co. v. Standard Cons. Min. Co., 83 Cal. 589, 23 Pac. 1102. "Even though the defendant makes no adverse claim," says the court, "third persons may regard plaintiff's title as being subject to an adverse claim by the defendant, which would be a cloud upon plaintiff's title, depreciating its value, and which he would be entitled to have removed by the decree of the court." The action here involved may well, as claimed by petitioner, be regarded as a suit to remove a cloud upon titles, the Legislature having power to declare what shall form such cloud (Clark v. Smith, 13 Pet. [U. S.] 195, 10 L. Ed. 123), and having in effect declared by this statute that the destruction of public records constitutes a cloud upon titles.

Again, it will be observed that in other states statutes providing for the determination of titles, under the Torrens system, by administrative officers, have been assailed and declared void upon the ground that the power of determining such titles was essentially judicial and to be exercised only by the courts. People v. Chase, 165 Ill. 527, 46 N. E. 454, 36 L. R. A. 105; State v. Guilbert, supra. The same view as to the nature of such functions was taken in Tyler v. Judges, supra; People v. Simon, supra; State v. Westfall, supra.

The argument, advanced with much force and ability, that even a judicial proceeding cannot divest property rights, in the absence of an allegation of a controversy between parties to the record, may be viewed as a restatement, in another form, of the objections to statutes authorizing judgments against "unknown owners." This contention, if adopted, would require us to hold that, except in proceedings strictly in rem, no statute can constitutionally authorize valid judgments as against persons not ascertained or made parties defendant by name or other specific description. For the reasons before given we cannot accept this conclusion.

3. Finally, it is said that the statute violates the provision of the state Constitution prohibiting the Legislature from passing local or special laws in certain cases. Among the subjects included in the constitutional prohibition are laws "regulating the practice of courts of justice" (Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 3), and "cases where a general law can be made applicable" (Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 33), and these are the provisions principally relied on. The questions thus raised are sufficiently serious and important to merit a full discussion, but by reason of the length which this opinion has already attained we are compelled to be brief in disposing of them. Unquestionably this statute does make a number of provisions regarding the practice in the actions or proceedings here provided for which are not to be found in other judicial proceedings in this state. For example, the complaint does not name any defendants, even though there may be known adverse claimants. The names of known defendants do not appear in the caption of the complaint or the summons, nor in the body of the summons. In other respects, too, the summons is different in form from that used in ordinary civil actions. The proceedings for publication of summons differ in various particulars from the general statutory methods provided for publication of summons by sections 412 and 413 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Thus no affidavit of diligence is required. The court is not authorized to designate a paper "as most likely to give notice" to the defendants. The order for publication is not required to direct the summons to be mailed forthwith to nonresident defendants. The period of publication is fixed by the statute at two months, and is not in the discretion of the court. The foregoing enumeration, while not complete, represents in a general way the nature of the differences to be found between the procedure here authorized and that prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure for ordinary civil actions. Do these differences render the act obnoxious to the constitutional provisions regarding special laws? This court has had occasion many times to consider what are special laws. "It is not necessary that a law shall affect all the people of a state in order that it may be general, or that a statute concerning procedure shall be applicable to every action that may be brought in the courts of the state. A statute which affects all the individuals of a class is a general law, while one which relates to particular persons or things of a class is special." McDonald v. Conniff, 99 Cal. 386, 391, 34 Pac. 71. The question of what is a special law as applied to the practice of courts of justice was carefully considered by this court in Deyoe v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 476, 74 Pac. 28, 98 Am. St. Rep. 73, and it is sufficient here to restate what was said in that case. "But the mere fact that it [i. e., a statute] operates only on one class of cases does not make it repugnant to the constitutional provision. Our statutes contain many provisions regulating the practice of courts of justice applicable only to certain classes of actions or special proceedings, made necessary by the nature of the objects and purposes of the various classes. The Legislature has the right to enact laws applicable only to one class of its citizens where the classification is authorized by the Constitution, or is based upon intrinsic differences requiring different legislation. The law in this regard was well stated by this court, through Mr. Justice Harrison, in People v. Central Pacific R. R. Co., 105 Cal. 576, 584, 38 Pac. 905, 906, where it was said: 'A law which operates only upon a class of individuals is none the less a general law, if the individuals to whom it is applicable constitute a class which requires legislation peculiar to itself in the matter covered by the law.' The class, however, must not only be germane to the purpose of the law, but must also be characterized by some substantial qualities or attributes which render such legislation necessary or appropriate for the individual members of the class. It may be 'founded on some natural or intrinsic or constitutional distinction' (Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 251, 27 Pac. 604), but the distinction must be of such a nature as to reasonably indicate the necessity or propriety of legislation restricted to that class." See, also, Rode v. Siebe, 119 Cal. 518, 51 Pac. 869, 39 L. R. A. 342. The classification must not be arbitrary, for the mere purpose of classification, but must be founded upon some natural or intrinsic or constitutional distinction which will suggest a reason which might rationally be held to justify the diversity in the legisation. Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 251, 27 Pac. 604; Darcy v. Mayor, etc., 104 Cal. 642, 38 Pac. 500. "If the individuals to whom the legislation is applicable constitute a class characterized by some substantial qualities or attributes of such a character as to indicate the necessity or propriety of certain legislation restricted to that class, such legislation, if applicable to all members of that class, is not violative of our constitutional provisions against special legislation."

Under these rules we think the proceeding created by the act in question is sufficiently distinct and different from ordinary civil actions covered by the general rules of the Code to justify the creation of a class which shall be characterized by the special rules of procedure here provided. As we have said, this act is intended to remedy an evil arising from an unusual circumstance, to wit, the destruction of the public records and the consequent inability to deduce a safe or merchantable title to real estate. Such inability furnishes a good reason for the creation of a procedure which shall enable owners of real estate to establish their titles, not only as against known adverse claimants, but as against even unknown and undetermined persons who may claim adversely. Many of the differences above referred to are rendered necessary by the fact that this proceeding seeks to bind such unknown claimants. Thus, since claimants can be brought in only by publication of summons, it would be useless to require the plaintiff to furnish to the court an affidavit upon which the court may determine whether or not summons shall be published. If it is to be published in every case, why should there be proof of special facts authorizing a publication? Again, the fact that the court or judge cannot know who may be affected by the proceeding seems to furnish a reason for not requiring the designation of any particular newspaper as "most likely to give notice to the person to be served." The provision that the summons should be mailed to nonresident defendants within 15 days, instead of forthwith, as required in ordinary actions, finds a reasonable justification in the fact that the summons so mailed must have attached to it a memorandum showing the date of the first publication. As the first publication may be some days after the order for publication, it might be impossible to attach this memorandum to the copy of the summons to be mailed, if such mailing were to take place forthwith.

The objections which are urged to the provisions of the statute authorizing a special form of complaint and summons may, we think, all be answered by saying that the proceeding in question differs so materially from most actions as to justify such peculiarities in procedure. The primary purpose of the proceeding is to determine the status of the title to specific property. While the rights of individuals are necessarily involved and adjudicated, this primary purpose is sufficient to justify a form of pleading and process which shall direct attention to the land to be affected rather than to the persons who may be interested in it. Our Codes are full of provisions making special rules applicable to different classes of cases, and it has never been supposed that such provisions are invalid merely because the procedure in each case is not in every particular exactly the same as for every other case. Thus, in actions for unlawful detainer, the summons is returnable not less than 3 nor more than 12 days from its date (Code Civ. Proc. § 1166), thereby reducing the defendant's time to appear or answer below the 10 days allowed in ordinary actions. The chapter providing for actions against steamers, vessels, and boats contains special provisions for the contents of the complaint (Code Civ. Proc. § 815), and for the service of summons (Code Civ. Proc. § 816). The summons in proceedings in eminent domain differs in various particulars from the form of summons in civil actions (Code Civ. Proc. § 1245). In proceedings relative to escheated estates the order requiring persons interested to appear and show cause why the estate should not vest in the state is published for one month, and parties interested have 40 days from the date of the order to appear instead of having 30 days after a publication for at least two months, as in other cases of publication of summons. All of these differences may be upheld upon the ground that the proceeding in question is of such a peculiar nature as to justify its classification for purposes of procedure. Without considering in detail every point in which this act is said to differ from the Code defining the general procedure in civil actions, we are satisfied that here, as in the Deyoe Case, the nature of the proceeding is such as to justify the Legislature in creating for it the special procedure prescribed by the statute. After all, the question of classification is primarily for the Legislature. The court is not to set aside a statute merely because in its view it may have been unwise or unnecessary to apply certain rules to one class of cases. Before the act can be declared invalid on this ground, it must appear to the court that there was no reasonable basis on which the peculiar legislative provision could have been made. We are not prepared to say that the needs which called this legislation into being, and the purposes sought to be accomplished, were not so peculiar in their character as to permit the Legislature to devise this remedy and these methods of seeking it.

It is not necessary to decide at this time whether parties not personally served may come in and defend within one year after judgment, as provided in section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Whether that section applies to proceedings under this act is a question of construction, which can best be considered when it arises in a case directly involving the point. We doubt that the interpretation excluding the right to come in would invalidate the act. If it should be considered to have such effect, that would be sufficient ground for construing the act so as to allow the application of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure—a construction that is certainly possible under section 12 of the statute.

The objection is made that the act is special because it applies only where the records have been destroyed by earthquake, fire, or flood. Possibly public records might be destroyed by other causes, but certainly the three agencies of destruction named are those which are most likely to occur in this state, and are the only ones which, so far as we know, have in our past history caused any considerable destruction of public records. These facts furnish ample ground for limiting the operation of the act to the cases to which it has been made applicable.
